What the Scottish Association for Mental Health has to say in its brief is well worth the Minister's attention when he is considering whether to extend the new clause. At page 2, paragraph 5, the brief states:

"It can surely be in nobody's interests that people who are managing to live with a major mental illness should be precipitated back into relapse, perhaps involving a costly hospital admission, and causing great distress to them, their families and friends. The Sheriffs Association, which represents all serving sheriffs in Scotland, supports this view, as does the Law Society of Scotland."

As has been mentioned, the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 provides a measure of protection to persons suffering from mental illness.

The same brief states in the following paragraph:

"Under the Disability Discrimination Act. It seems ironic that a Government which only last year published an Act outlawing discrimination on the grounds of disability, should now discriminate against people with mental illness, who are in theory protected by the Act."

Is there a discrepancy—I look forward to the Minister's answer—between the new clause and the relevant section of the Disability Discrimination Act? If there is, any anomaly should be eliminated in the interests of such people.

The brief continues:

"If the Government accepts that some learning disabled people might need vulnerable witness protection why can it not accept that some mentally ill people may as well?"

Has the Minister decided against extending the new clause on the ground that a case involving, for example, evidence given by someone suffering from schizophrenia or manic depression which leads to a conviction of the accused person might be appealed by the defendant's lawyers? I would not have thought that that would be the case. I cannot think of a case in Scotland or, indeed, south of the border in England and Wales where a conviction that involved the giving of evidence by a vulnerable witness using CCTV or evidence taken on commission has been appealed on the ground that the accused was unable to face one of the witnesses for the prosecution. While the measure being offered by the Minister today is to be welcomed, it is regrettable that it has not gone further in seeking to protect people who suffer from a mental illness.

I have already mentioned the fact that, in a few cases over the past 20 years, both here and in America, people have, for a while, been able to simulate the symptoms exhibited by genuine schizophrenics or manic depressives. However, such cases are extremely rare and should not deter the Government from extending this welcome measure.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: This issue should not be a partisan one that divides the House along party lines. It raises an important feature of the nature of criminal procedure in our courts and the extent to which we are willing to create circumstances in which any individual, whatever handicap he or she may be subject to, is able to contribute to the judicial process.

Like other hon. Members, I have received the brief from the Scottish Association for Mental Health, but I do not intend to refer to its terms in detail. The hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) read eloquently from the brief and the issues are clear and positive in the minds of those participating in this debate. The strength of the case made by the hon. Gentleman was if not overwhelming, at least of such a nature that the Minister should think carefully about whether he should take the matter away and give it further consideration.

The basis of the Government's opposition to the extension being proposed appears to rest in that rather hoary old statutory chestnut, the floodgates argument. In this particular case, though, as subsection (7) of the new clause makes clear,

"The court may grant an application under subsection (1), (5) or (6) above only on cause shown".

That is to say, the court has to be satisfied in any particular case that it is legitimate to go ahead in the light of the procedures set out in the new clause; and the court must have regard to the criteria set out there.

4.15 pm

Furthermore, in subsection (8), the court "may take into account" a number of additional criteria.

It seems to me that the floodgates argument lies behind the Government's attitude—but there are plenty of dams in the way of the flood to prevent abuse of the proposals. The Government seem anxious, however, that the provision, if enacted, would be the subject of abuse. So hedged about are the circumstances in which these procedures can be used, however, that there is no risk of any serious abuse whatever. That being so, why should those whose vulnerability may arise from a mental disorder be excluded from the personal advantages that the new clause seeks to create? The Minister would be well advised to give that serious consideration.

Section 271 of the 1995 Act stipulates that a person appointed as a commissioner

"must be, and for a period of five years have been, a member of the Faculty of Advocates or a solicitor."

So qualification to be a commissioner under current law, restated in this legislation, is merely membership of either the Faculty of Advocates or the Law Society of Scotland. If vulnerability conditions are to be extended so that more commissions may need to be held, the Government will be wise to think again about whether mere membership of one of those bodies is qualification enough.

I was once appointed a commissioner on behalf of the High Court to take evidence from a witness who was not expected to survive until the date of the trial. Indeed, that proved to be so. I remember that a difficult question arose about an objection taken to certain of the evidence being sought to be led. If, therefore, we are to extend the circumstances in which a commissioner may require to operate, it will be not just membership of these bodies but practical experience that will be important. So I suggest that the Minister consider qualifications by way of experience before extending the number of occasions when commissioners may be asked to sit in judgment.

I reiterate: this should not be a partisan matter. The speeches made thus far today have clearly shown the mood of the House. The Minister would do himself a lot of good—and would ultimately do the administration of justice a great deal of good—if he thought again about this point.

Mr. Canavan: I speak in support of new clause 7, which was so ably introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall). I did not serve on the Standing Committee dealing with the Bill, but I can well understand the desire to afford special protection in court proceedings to vulnerable persons, including taking evidence in advance on video recordings, giving evidence on live television, and the use of screens.

New clause 11 restricts the definition of "vulnerable person" to a child or "any person of or over the age of 16 years who appears to the court to suffer from significant impairment of intelligence and social functioning", whereas new clause 7 extends the definition to include vulnerable witnesses, which means

"a witness aged 16 years or over whom the court determines to be suffering from mental disorder as defined in section 1 of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984".

That seems to be a tight definition. As the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East (Mr. Campbell) just said, it would not exactly open the floodgates, so I cannot see the Minister's reasoning in resisting the new clause.

There is wide support for the principle of new clause 7 throughout the country, particularly among professionals and voluntary organisations that specialise in caring for people who suffer from mental illness. For example, a letter from Anne Wallace on behalf of Falkirk District Association for Mental Health says:

"It is the view of FDAMH that at present some individuals with mental illness find it impossible to appear in court as witnesses because of the possible stress of the court appearance and of fear of ridicule or intimidation."

Those feelings are echoed by the Scottish Association for Mental Health, which says in a letter:

"We have experience of the distress caused to people who are mentally ill when faced with court proceedings. One case which came to us was of a person being harassed in her home by a group of local teenagers. The police wanted to prosecute, but the woman was unable to cope with the prospect of confronting the teenagers in court and so the abuse continued."

If such circumstances are allowed to prevail, justice will be denied to many people with mental illness, with the result that crimes will go unpunished and many people will be denied the protection of the criminal justice system. Alternatively, they may be persuaded to go, or even be pressurised into going, to court to give evidence and the whole experience may be such an ordeal that they risk having a further mental breakdown.

The Minister is a reasonable man and I am sure that he does not want those circumstances to develop or be allowed to continue. I hope that he will be persuaded to think again and ensure that the courts give adequate protection to all witnesses, including witnesses who may be vulnerable because of a mental disorder.

I think that I heard the Minister say earlier that he was willing to consider the matter further and possibly introduce an appropriate amendment in the House of Lords. Why on earth has he not introduced an appropriate amendment in this House? What is wrong with new clause 7, which seems to be technically good, with no drafting faults? Why cannot the Minister just accept new clause 7 and help to ensure that people who suffer from mental illness and are called as witnesses in court have a much fairer deal?

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): May I add my own brief comments on new clause 7, which I too believe should not divide the House? Will the Minister answer some questions about vulnerable child witnesses who do not necessarily have any mental disorder? He will recall that the matter was raised in Committee, and I remember the Secretary of State nodding in agreement with me earlier when we discussed the matter in the Scottish Grand Committee.

I pointed out that there have been occasions when someone has been accused of committing dreadful crimes against a very young child, and the child's evidence has not been called, on the ground that he or she is too young. It is obvious that some people might choose such young victims for the very reason that the children are too young for their evidence to be listened to seriously in court. The Minister may remember that we discussed that in Committee.

There should be ways of ensuring that a child who is capable of giving a truthful account of events and who is capable of accurate recall should not have his or her evidence disregarded on the ground that he or she cannot grasp abstract concepts such as telling the truth and understanding an oath.

I see nothing in new clause 11 in that regard. If the Minister plans to take the issue forward in the House of Lords, I should be glad to hear from him about that tonight. I hope that he has not simply forgotten about the matter, which caused concern in Committee. The Bill should not complete its passage without addressing the possibility that the evidence of very young children might be disregarded because the children are so young.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham (Perth and Kinross): I shall speak to new clause 10, which is similar to new clause 7. Much of what I intended to say would echo what has already been said by other Opposition Members, so I shall not go over the same ground.

We support the principle of extending protection to adults with learning disabilities, for which the Government new clause provides. As has been pointed out, however, that still excludes people with mental illness. Opposition Members seek a provision to include such people.

I am unclear why the Government seem unable to accept that the mentally ill should be provided with that protection. I have listened to the Minister. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East (Mr. Campbell) echoed my impression that the floodgates argument might underlie the Government's attitude. Will the Minister tell us his specific concerns about extending the provision to include those who are mentally ill? I hope that he will accept that Opposition Members are genuinely puzzled about his refusal thus far to countenance that extension.

The concerns of various organisations have been rehearsed, and they are shared by Opposition Members. I ask the Minister to bear in mind the point made by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), that victims are witnesses too. When we speak of extending protection for vulnerable witnesses, we generally mean victims, although in some cases we mean witnesses in the strict sense of the word.

Where necessary, we should extend all the protection we can, within the law, to people who are vulnerable. I do not understand the argument that those who are mentally ill do not come within the group classified as vulnerable. I beg the Minister to tell us clearly what the problem has been thus far.

Dr. Godman: I remind the hon. Lady that more and more mentally ill people are living in the community as a result of so-called community care policy. If they are more vulnerable as a consequence—as many obviously are—they are surely entitled to the protection that we traditionally afford to children.

4.30 pm

Ms Cunningham: The hon. Gentleman makes an extremely good point, and I thank him for his timely intervention. An increasing number of such persons on the street means an increase in the likelihood of their appearing in court as vulnerable witnesses. As a consequence of the nature of the lives that many must lead, they increasingly appear in court as victims of crime or as witnesses to incidents.

We are discussing those with serious mental illnesses such as manic depression and schizophrenia, and I do not think that hon. Members would deny the serious effects of those illnesses on individuals and their ability to cope with ordinary, day-to-day life. If their ability to cope with daily life is severely affected—as it clearly is—they will not be able to cope with the extra stress of appearing in court.

The fact is that many people who do not have mental disorders find formal court proceedings very stressful. I refer not only to High Court proceedings for murder but to all sorts of proceedings. Elderly people may feel stressed if compelled to give evidence in court. My mother had to give evidence in a summary case and she was quite worried about the prospect. She is in her 80s and does not suffer from any illness or disorder. If ordinary folk suffer such stress, the pressure on someone who suffers from mental illness must be even greater. As other hon. Members have said, I fear that cases simply will not go to court because people are not capable of dealing with the stress or because valuable witnesses to serious incidents cannot be considered reliable witnesses during court proceedings. That means that their evidence may be lost in serious cases.

These issues are important to the way in which our law operates. We are very proud of our system of justice in Scotland. It has its faults—as does every justice system in the world—but we are justly proud of the way that the system in Scotland has developed, the traditions that have grown up over the years and the way in which it has been able to change and adapt to circumstances.

I urge the Government to take this commendable new clause on board, as it is important to stress protection for vulnerable witnesses. I shall not repeat the list of those who support the measure because other hon. Members have referred to them already. I support the earlier comments about new clauses 7 and 10 and the in-built protections to prevent the floodgates from opening—if that is the reason for the Minister's concern.

The Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984 and the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 already allow certain concessions, but the new clause has in-built protection that would allow the court to make the final decision. I think that the court can make such a decision—it already has that experience to a certain extent—and it should be allowed to do so.

Dr. Godman: If new clause 10 or new clause 7 is successful, does the hon. Lady anticipate that a commissioner taking evidence on commission from someone suffering from schizophrenia or manic depression would be advised by a medical practitioner? I am thinking of someone suffering from schizophrenia, who had been released into the community and had not taken his or her medication when called for interview by the commission.

Ms Cunningham: That is an important issue. In cases under the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984 or the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, if there is any doubt about an individual's mental state, the court has the opportunity to acquire medical evidence from a psychiatrist. It may be easier or harder to get evidence at particular times of the day or week or in particular situations.

As I have said already, I am puzzled why the Minister has thus far set his face against an extension to include those who are mentally ill. The majority of people would assume that those who are mentally ill would be considered vulnerable under anybody's classification and for any reason. I ask the Minister to consider the issue seriously.

Mr. McAllion: I also support new clause 7, spoken to so ably by my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), and oppose the new clause moved by the Minister.

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) raised a small but important point with the Minister, who promised to return to it, but he did not. It relates to the facilities necessary to implement the new clauses, and their availability in courts around Scotland. The Minister said that new clause 11 extended the existing provisions for evidence being given by children to a new category of vulnerable persons. By definition, that must mean that there will be increased demand for those facilities.

New clauses 11 and 7 would require a range of technical equipment to be available in Scottish courts. For example, subsection (2) of new clause 11 says:

"Proceedings before a commissioner appointed under subsection (1) above shall be recorded by video recorder."

The new clause goes on to say that the accused shall not be present during the proceedings,

"but shall be entitled by such means as seem suitable to the commissioner to watch and hear the proceedings."

He will therefore have to be in another room, perhaps in the same building, and have access to what is going on, perhaps by some remote audio-visual means.

The new clause goes on to say that those covered by the provisions can give evidence

"by means of a live television link."

It also says that screens will have to be provided so that the witness does not have to be in court at the same time as the accused, but that the accused must have some means of seeing and hearing the evidence.

A range of technical facilities must be made available. I discovered only this afternoon that Glasgow High Court does not have such facilities. Any trial there involving anyone who came under the new clause would have to go to Glasgow sheriff court, where the facilities are available. That would result in delays, because Glasgow sheriff court has a long backlog of outstanding cases. I do not know about Dundee High Court—I suppose that it meets in Dundee sheriff court, and that those facilities are available. When asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow how many courts in Scotland had such facilities, the Minister could not give a coherent or sensible reply—not unusual for him.

Dr. Godman: I can confirm that sheriff court No. 5 in Glasgow has CCTV. I have seen it in operation. My hon. Friend mentioned screens, which are a crude means of separating the witness from the accused in the dock. I would like the practice to be done away with in favour of CCTV in all courts, or evidence taken on commission.

Mr. McAllion: My hon. Friend makes a fair point, and I agree with him. I am not defending the arrangements set down in the new clauses: I am simply saying that the facilities that would allow them to be put into practice are not universally available in the courts of Scotland.

[Mr. McAllion]

I hesitate to make any public expenditure commitments, but the new clauses may involve such commitments. Perhaps the House could turn its attention to that.

Mrs. Fyfe: When I was a witness in Glasgow sheriff court recently, I noticed that witnesses for the prosecution and for the defence were still likely to encounter each other under the system. That causes great concern. Even with the provision of screens and remote television, considerable difficulty could be caused if there was any possibility of the witnesses seeing each other in court buildings.

Mr. McAllion: My hon. Friend has made a relevant point, to which I hope the Minister will reply when he winds up. Many years ago, I was a witness at Dundee sheriff court when my video recorder was stolen. At that time, witnesses for the prosecution and the defence, and the accused, were all kept in the same room to wait for the trial. The whole purpose of new clause 11 would be defeated if, before a trial had even started, vulnerable witnesses were expected to share accommodation with those accused of committing—in some cases—serious offences against them. I hope that the Minister will ensure that witnesses covered by the new clause will not come into any contact with those accused of offending against them.

The nub of the argument between Opposition and Government centres on the definition of the vulnerable witnesses who will be included in the new category. Both sides agree that a child should be defined as someone under 16; it is the Minister's new legal definition in new clause 11 that is at the heart of the debate. According to the new clause, a "vulnerable person" means

"any person of or over the age of 16 years who appears to the court to suffer from significant impairment of intelligence and social functioning".

As far as I know, that is a new definition. I have not seen it before.

I understand that the Minister consulted on what the definition should be—or, rather, that the Lord Advocate, on behalf of the Minister, carried out a quick consultation process between Committee and Report. On 20 December, in the run-up to Christmas, the Minister wrote to Committee members, kindly making available to us the consultation paper that the Lord Advocate had sent out. At that time, the Minister was referring to the "learning disabled". The Lord Advocate's consultation document argued against the definition suggested by my hon. Friends, referring to and stating:

"a suitable definition of 'learning disabled'",

"Section 1 of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984 . . . is not considered to form a suitable basis for such a definition because it describes an extreme and narrow range of mental disorders and, arguably, does not include people exhibiting the range of learning difficulties which would render witnesses vulnerable when giving evidence."

At the consultation stage, the Lord Advocate and the Government said that they did not want to adopt the definition in section 1 of the 1984 Act because it was too narrow, and would not cover enough witnesses who might be vulnerable in court proceedings. They wanted a wider definition, bringing in more people who might be vulnerable in such circumstances. The consultation paper itself suggested a definition that might be used: a witness suffering from learning disability would be "suffering from a state of arrested or incomplete development of mind which includes significant impairment of intelligence and social functioning".

Between consultation and Report, however, the Minister has changed the suggested definition. Out goes the phrase

"suffering from a state of arrested or incomplete development of mind".

The only phrase that is included in the new clause is "significant impairment of intelligence and social functioning".

The Minister must explain tonight why, between the consultation stage and his return to the House, he has dropped the phrase

"suffering from a state of arrested or incomplete development of mind".

Dr. Godman: Subsection (12)(b) refers to "social functioning". Could it not be argued that a person suffering from, say, paranoid schizophrenia was suffering from a "significant impairment" of social functioning?

Mr. McAllion: I would have thought so. Presumably, during the consultation period the Minister had a great deal of time in which to circulate the document to interested groups. Can he tell us how many people responded, whether any consultant psychiatrists or organisations representing them contacted the Government, and whether, if so, they have a view about the Minister's definition? I would have thought that that definition might or might not include someone suffering from schizophrenia, but that is a matter for a consultant psychiatrist rather than a court to decide. The Minister must tell us exactly what the position is.

4.45 pm

A number of hon. Members have asked whether the Government fear that the floodgates may open, and that too many people will seek protection under the new clauses. Is that why they will not accept section 1 of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984 as a definition? The Minister cannot say that that is the case, however, for his own consultation document makes it clear that he wants a broader definition. He must justify the phrase that he is introducing to Scottish law for the first time, and explain who will decide what constitutes

"significant impairment of intelligence and social functioning".

Will it be the court, or a consultant psychiatrist?

Mrs. Irene Adams (Paisley, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that witnesses who have been intimidated or threatened by the accused, or people connected with the accused, could describe themselves as not functioning very well socially? Nothing in the new clauses relates to people who have been threatened or intimidated during trials, or whom others have attempted to bribe.

Mr. McAllion: Not only do I agree; when my hon. Friend asked whether a witness who had been threatened could be described as suffering from impairment of social functioning, the Minister nodded. It now appears that threatened witnesses could qualify under the new clause, which widens the definition.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No.

Mr. McAllion: Now the Minister says, "No," from a sedentary position. Just a few minutes ago, he was saying, "Yes."

Dr. Godman: My hon. Friend mentioned the organisations that were consulted. In fact, the Lord Advocate consulted the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland, but failed to consult Scottish members of the Royal College of Psychiatrists.

Mr. McAllion: My hon. Friend highlights our problem in trying to decide between the two new clauses that have been tabled by the Government and by Opposition Members. The Minister is pushing ahead at breakneck speed. There has not been proper consultation: those who know best how witnesses should be categorised and defined in law have not been allowed their say in the law-making process.

The suspicion must arise that what the Government are about tonight is political posturing—that they are trying to talk tough on law and order before a general election, and are not even interested in trying to improve the law or introduce proper legal changes that would protect people in real-life circumstances outside the House. That reflects very badly on the Minister and the Government. The Minister's brother is right to say that he has had more than enough of the Tory Government over the past 17 years, and his younger brother is even more right to campaign for a Scottish Parliament, because if we had one, we would not be wasting our time here tonight.

We already have a legal definition of witnesses who may be covered by the new clause: the definition given in section 1 of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984. A consultant psychiatrist who works as a forensic psychiatrist, dealing with offenders, has told me that that is a generic term that is used in law. It defines two separate categories of people—those who suffer from mental illness, and those who suffer from a mental handicap.

Mental handicap means severe mental impairment. The Minister said that those people would be covered by new clause 11, but that those who suffer from a mental illness would not necessarily come within the new definition. As many hon. Members have said, that excludes from the protection of the clause a range of people who suffer from schizophrenia, manic depressive illnesses and many other illnesses.

All hon. Members who have spoken have made the point that the Minister must explain why people who suffer from mental illness are not being afforded the protection of the new clause. In the consultation paper that he distributed around Scotland, he said that the definition of section 1 of the 1984 Act, which included people with mental illness, was not wide enough, and that not enough people would be caught within it. Now he says that it is too wide. He must explain to us what has happened to change his mind.

The Minister tried to get himself off the hook by referring to section 259 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. He suggested that that part of the Act could be used to cover people who suffer from mental illness. Section 259 deals with hearsay evidence, and lists a range of people who need not give evidence for a variety of reasons. The first category is people who are dead—which I suppose is a reasonable ground for not giving evidence in court; no one would argue with that. People who are no longer in the United Kingdom are allowed to give hearsay evidence. People who have been identified as potential witnesses but who cannot be found are another good category. People who believe that, if they give evidence, they may incriminate themselves are also allowed to give hearsay evidence.

If the Minister is prepared to include people suffering from a mental illness within the definition of hearsay evidence, why is he not prepared to include them within the definition in the Bill? The Government's position is inconsistent.

Dr. Godman: In my comments, I was not criticising the responses of people who had been consulted. They were asked three questions, all of which referred to witnesses who may be categorised as learning disabled. I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that they were not given an opportunity to discuss other vulnerable witnesses.

Mr. McAllion: Absolutely. My hon. Friend is spot on. No Opposition Member would criticise properly qualified people for commenting on those issues. Our criticism is directly solely at Ministers, who are not listening to the voice of reason expressed inside and outside the House. Instead, they are pushing ahead with proposals that cannot be justified.

I received a letter from my constituent, Dr. Joe Morrow, who has spent some time working with people suffering from mental illness. He is concerned that the new clause does not include witnesses who are vulnerable as a result of mental illness. He tells me that he has direct experience of the extreme distress that is caused to people who are or have been mentally ill when they are faced with court proceedings.

Dr. Morrow is concerned about the people in residential care or in hospital, who may be abused and need protection to ensure that they are not intimidated in court by their carers or by those with power over them. The Minister should remember that people who suffer from mental illness need protection: they are often in an extremely weak position, whereas those who may have abused them are extremely powerful and strong.

Dr. Morrow says that, in most mental health legislation, the definition of mental disorder in section 1 of the 1984 Act is adequate. He asked me to make his plea—a plea that has come from hon. Members across the Committee—that the Minister's suggestion is not good enough. If, like his brother, he is honest and decent, he should listen to the Opposition.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am glad to respond to the debate. This is one of the most important discussions that we will have today, so it is vital that we get it right.

The hon. Members for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) and for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) raised the issue of separating witnesses from the accused. Where accommodation permits, every effort is made to keep witnesses for the prosecution and for the defence separate. Improvements are constantly being introduced, and every effort is made to keep vulnerable witnesses separate from other witnesses.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East asked about the availability of equipment for giving evidence. The need for additional facilities will be assessed in the light of demand. Commissions may be taken. In any suitable accommodation, screens are available for use in every court. Closed circuit television is available in every sheriffdom, and the need for further provision is kept constantly under review.

The hon. Member for Maryhill asked about children who may be too young to give evidence. That is a complex issue. There is no minimum age below which a child cannot give evidence: the issue is whether the child can competently give evidence. Any change would require wide consultation. I shall discuss that matter further with my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate.

The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East (Mr. Campbell) said that the criteria in section 271 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 provide sufficient safeguards against a floodgate of applications. There would be an intolerable burden on the courts if we were to leave it to them to apply those criteria to every case in which a witness was alleged to be vulnerable. Some means of preliminary assessment is essential.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) referred to the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, which focuses on discrimination in employment. It is not concerned with the rules of evidence, to which quite different considerations apply.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: The Minister dealt with my point by saying that there would be an intolerable burden on the court. If we have regard to the terms of the statute as proposed, an application can be granted only on cause shown, which means that each application must come to the court. There is no question of applications being granted on the nod or automatically. Every application will have to be heard by the court, even under the Government's proposal. So if that is his counter to the floodgates argument, I suggest that it may not be a very strong one.

Lord James Douglas–Hamilton: As I said, some preliminary assessment will have to be made. May I make it clear to the hon. and learned Gentleman—who has been an advocate depute, and has been engaged in prosecutions—what the prosecution's difficulty is. Successive Lords Advocate have been concerned that extended availability of vulnerable witness provisions could have a significant operational impact on the prosecution services, given the pressures that would be brought to bear on prosecutors by witnesses who sought to establish their vulnerability, so as to avoid having to give evidence to the court.

The hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) gave the example of an outrage, and stressed the importance of bringing the culprits to justice. I agree with him. We must balance the importance of seeing that justice is done with the need to ensure that unfairness is not meted out to vulnerable witnesses. We must get the right balance.

If a witness with schizophrenia were unable to give evidence, the hearsay provisions in the 1995 Act might be available. We expect that evidence of incapacity would require to be led; otherwise, there would be concerns that such witnesses would not be competent.

The hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) complained that we have tabled too many amendments. Some of our amendments are in response to legitimate points made by him, and 100 amendments were tabled by the Opposition. I stress that we have done our best to respond to the serious points made.

The hon. Gentleman said that a person with a mental health problem should be assisted by being allowed to give evidence by non-conventional means. I accept that stress can occur through the use of technology, but the hearsay evidence provisions should help many mentally ill persons.

I also accept the case for extending the child witness provisions to all vulnerable witnesses, but such an extension would be a radical departure from the long-standing requirement that witnesses must give oral testimony. We are gradually departing from that requirement, first for children and now for mentally handicapped people. We would need to take great care if we were to go further at this time, because such a step would be inappropriate without the utmost thought.

I am prepared to discuss the case for doing that for the mentally ill who are subject to hospital or other orders that have been made under the Mental Health Act (Scotland) Act 1984, because for that category of people the degree of mental illness is sufficient to have required an order. Of course that is a substantial point.

As the hon. Member for Dumbarton said, mental illness can fluctuate. Persons who suffer from manic depression can be perfectly normal for much of the time until the illness hits them.

Mr. Canavan: Will the Minister confirm that there is nothing technically wrong with new clause 7? Why is it unacceptable?

5 pm

Lord James Douglas–Hamilton: It is a matter of balance and judgment, but mental illness can easily fluctuate. Should a witness to a fatal shooting be excluded because he is not sufficiently mentally ill to be subject to an order? To exclude such a witness could be contrary to the interests of justice.

Mr. Canavan: We are not talking about excluding witnesses, but about giving them the opportunity to present their evidence in a manner that takes their vulnerability into account.

Lord James Douglas–Hamilton: I appreciate that, but we think that the "best evidence" rule should necessarily apply. I made it clear that I am prepared to discuss with the Lord Advocate the extension of revised section 271 to some mentally ill witnesses who are subject to orders under the Mental Health (Scotland) Act.

The hon. Member for Dumbarton raised the issue that arises from the Quickly case and the new clause that was considered in Committee, when I undertook to discuss with Enable how we might secure the best treatment for mentally disordered persons who were interviewed by the police. I met Enable in December, and wrote to members of the Committee on 10 January. As I explained in my letter, we are not persuaded that the statutory code is the best way forward. There might be some confusion between that code and the common law test that governs the admissibility of evidence.

I also explained that the Lord Advocate has said that he would issue instructions to chief constables setting out the circumstances in which the police will have to interview mentally disordered suspects in the presence of an appropriate adult. We shall also issue non-statutory guidance on this matter to chief constables and social work departments. I hope that that will meet our shared objective, which is that proper treatment should be given to the mentally disordered. I hope that the hon. Member for Dumbarton will not press the matter.

Mr. McFall: We are not persuaded by the Minister. He spoke about balance and judgment, but above all this is about justice. Under the new clause, people with learning disabilities who have to appear as witnesses will be protected, but that does not apply to people with mental illnesses. Such protection should be available to both categories of people.

The measure would apply to people with inborn learning disabilities but not to adults who would have some difficulty in attending court because they suffer from brain damage, head injuries, dementia or a severe illness. Voluntary organisations have persuaded us of the merits of our proposal, and we shall press new clause 7 to a vote.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): We are in some difficulty, because there is a debate in progress on new clause 11. It is the lead new clause, and the one that I must put to the House. If it is accepted, new clause 7 will fall.

Mr. McFall: Why?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Because it is incompatible with new clause 11.

Mr. McFall: In that case, we shall vote against new clause 11.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time.

The House divided: Ayes 269, Noes 228.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should like your advice.

I have just discovered that on Friday, while I was here, along with many other hon. Members, trying to do something about cold weather payments and the wind chill factor, a Minister visited my constituency, but did not have the courtesy to inform me that she was going there. Her visit was televised in my constituency and she attended at least three functions there. Unfortunately, I am not able to raise the matter with the person in this House, because she lost her seat at the last election. I should be grateful, therefore, for clarification from you on how I can make representations to the Baroness—the former right hon. Member for Wallasey—who visited my constituency on Friday without informing me.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Madam Speaker has made it clear that all Ministers should inform hon. Members when they visit their constituencies and that all hon. Members should also have the courtesy to do the same if they visit another constituency. I am sure that the right hon. Lady will read Hansard tomorrow.

New clause 8

RELEASE LICENCES

'4.—(1) This section applies to all prisoners sentenced to a term of imprisonment or terms of imprisonment totalling four years or longer and who are not released on:

(a) life licence; or

(b) supervised release order; or

(c) compassionate grounds.

(2) A prisoner to whom this section applies shall be released on licence which shall (unless revoked) remain in force until the entire period specified in his sentence (reckoned from the commencement of the sentence) has elapsed.

(3) A person released on licence under subsection (2) above shall comply with such conditions as may be specified in that licence by the Secretary of State.

(4) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (3) above and to the power of the Secretary of State under subsection (5) below to vary or cancel any condition, a licence granted under this section shall include a condition requiring that the person subject to it—

(a) shall be under the supervision of a relevant officer of such local authority, or of a probation officer appointed for or assigned to such petty sessions area, as may be specified in the licence; and

(b) shall comply with such requirements as that officer may specify for the purposes of the supervision.

(5) The Secretary of State may from time to time under subsection (3) above insert, vary or cancel a condition in a licence granted under this section, but no licence condition shall be included on release or subsequently inserted, varied or cancelled except after consulting the Parole Board.

(6) For the purposes of subsection (5) above, the Secretary of State shall be treated as having consulted the Parole Board about a proposal to include, insert, vary or cancel a condition in any case if he has consulted the Board about the implementation of proposals of that description generally or in that class of case.'.—[Mr. McFall.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. McFall: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

We have tabled the new clause because we want to enhance public safety. The Government's proposals do not do so, but our provisions will strengthen that aspect of the Bill. The Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993 provides for non-parole licences, under which any prisoner sentenced to more than four years but not granted parole can be released on licence until the sentence expiry date. The arrangements in that Act enhanced public safety as well as rehabilitation.

The Bill alters those arrangements, as only life parolees and those made subject to a supervised release order by the sentencing court will now be under direct supervision. The sheriff or judge must say at the time of trial that the long-term prisoner will be subject to a supervised release order. All other long-term prisoners will have no supervision, but will be liable to recall following a further offence.

We are surprised that the Government are diminishing the public safety aspect, as well as diminishing the potential to help people to be rehabilitated back into the community. After implementation of the 1993 Act, the new parole licences came into effect in May 1995, so there has been no time to evaluate them. The Minister of State, who is dealing with this Bill tonight, put through those measures in the 1993 legislation, with the support of the Opposition.

In our opinion, public safety will be increased if all long-term prisoners are supervised until their sentence expires. Longer-term prisoners include those who have committed very serious offences and could constitute a further risk. Why will the Government allow those individuals to be released into the community again—or allow the possibility of their release—without that supervision? Surely the Government are putting public order at risk—a risk that they should not take.

The new clause covers those sentenced for the offences of dishonesty and of theft by housebreaking, and especially repeat, serious and violent offenders—one category that has been increasing. The professional criminal and thief would, therefore, be brought into mandatory supervision on release, giving the public that protection. That comfort must be available. It is the Government's duty to provide it and, through the new clause, we are pressing them to take heed of it.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: We believe that the public are best protected by targeting supervision on those identified as posing a risk, which is the most effective way of deploying resources.

The public rightly expect to be protected and rightly expect those charged with the protection to focus on offenders who may endanger them. Attempting to supervise everyone regardless of risk or need, as the new clause sets out to do, would deflect attention away from those offenders who pose a threat. That is not the best way to protect the public. Supervision can achieve its objective only if it is focused and targeted. Near misses are not good enough.

The Bill will allow the sentencing court to identify offenders whom it considers may pose a risk to the public on release and impose a supervised release order on them. We have also provided the Crown with a right of appeal in those cases where it thinks a supervised police order should have been made but was not.

Dr. Godman: Is the Minister's position on this important issue supported by members of the parole boards, or do they have serious reservations?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I cannot tell the hon. Gentleman exactly what each member would say, but I believe that targeting supervision would be regarded as a common-sense measure, and having an untargeted, unfocused approach would not meet the requirements.

We are not persuaded that the approach proposed in the new clause would be effective, so I ask the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) to withdraw the motion.

Mr. McAllion: I am disturbed by the Minister's remarks and the cavalier fashion in which he dismissed the new clause. For example, he said—I do not think that anyone will disagree with this statement, anyway—that we have to target such resources as we have in the probation service and local authority social work departments on those offenders who pose the greatest risk to people in the community. He then dismissed the new clause, saying that it would cover everyone. I direct his attention to the first sentence of the new clause, which states:

"This section applies to all prisoners sentenced to a term of imprisonment or terms of imprisonment totalling four years or longer".

Some years ago—in 1994, I think—in the White Paper that the Minister issued, as the Minister with responsibility for law and order in Scotland, he pointed out that, in courts, a distinction is made between offenders who are dealt with under the summary procedure, which is usually regarded as involving less serious crimes, and offenders dealt with under the solemn procedure, which involves very serious crimes indeed.

Under the solemn procedure, prisoners can get sentences of three, four or five years, so, by the Government's definition, all those offenders who are sentenced to four years or more are guilty of extremely serious offences. The Minister may think that those who commit serious offences are not a threat to society, but I think that most people in Scotland would disagree.

Supervision on release was covered in the White Paper, and there the Minister struck a very different note from the one that he struck a few moments ago. He said:

"Protecting the public did not end with clarity in sentencing", and I agree with him. It is not enough to play the game played by the Secretary of State, who poses as a tough guy who will deal with the criminals by making sure that they spend more time in gaol. We must go further than that to protect the public in Scotland from the serious criminals who would be covered by the new clause.

5.30 pm

In the White Paper, the Minister said:

"The public need to be reassured that the Government is doing all it can to prevent further offending."

If the Minister wanted to do all he could to prevent further offending and to protect the public, he could begin by reading the new clause, which deals with those matters, but he took a different line a few minutes ago.

In the White Paper, the Minister also said:

"To this end we are making early release from custody contingent not only on good conduct in prison, but also on participation while in custody in appropriate strategies to address and change offending behaviour."

Nobody would be too concerned about that remark. He continued:

"The responses to the Government's consultation exercise strongly supported the principle of release on conditions intended to enhance public protection."

The Minister said that the response to the consultations was a demand for release on condition, to ensure that offenders who came out of the gates were properly monitored and looked after, and that probation officers and social workers were available to deal with them during the period in which they were still in the community serving the part of their sentence that had not been served in gaol; but now he shrugs off the idea with a few casual remarks. The new clause would cover just about everything to which he referred.

Does the Minister not know that the vast majority of those in Scotland's prisons are serving sentences of less than four years and that only the most serious offenders are serving sentences of four years or more? He is telling us that it is all right for serious offenders to be allowed back into the community without supervision. Perhaps he is concerned that it would might cost money to look after them properly and to protect the public, but that is not what he or his colleagues will say when they go back to Scotland to fight the general election; then they will say that law and order is a priority and that the Government spare no expense to maintain it and to ensure that people throughout Scotland are safe in their communities. The Government have the nerve to dismiss a new clause that would do precisely that.

Only when a serious offender reoffends will the Government do anything about it. They have shown themselves to be weak, not strong, on law and order. Unless the Minister changes his tune, everyone back in Scotland—not least his family—will look at him and say, "Failed again, Minister. You've got it wrong once again."

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Govan): One of the Government's main roles should be the protection of the public. I am not convinced that the Government are taking the new clause sufficiently seriously from that perspective. I can understand why the Government want to economise on the supervision of prisoners once they have been released, but they should take much more seriously the need to ensure that people released in such circumstances are provided with support, which would result in fewer of them reoffending and enhance public safety.

We would support the system proposed by the Government, with some targeting, but proposed subsection (4)(b) specifically says that the person released

"shall comply with such requirements as that officer may specify for the purposes of the supervision."

That would obviously allow the supervising officer an enormous degree of discretion. It would ensure, for example, that people were seen to be taking steps to address their offending behaviour and perhaps, with the help of the supervising officer, to find employment or obtain further educational qualifications that would make them more employable and therefore less likely to offend.

All the evidence shows that those who are most likely to reoffend are those on the very bottom of the employment ladder. The amount of supervision and assistance that can be provided by a local authority officer, to encourage someone to seek employment, careers advice, education or training, is quite considerable. People who are released from prison and who are not immediately in danger of reoffending might drift back into criminal behaviour simply because they are alone and lack supervision.

The Government should take more seriously the need to safeguard the public, and should not ignore our constructive proposals.

Dr. Godman: I support the new clause. I am pleased that my hon. Friends want the parole board to have an important function in such cases. To my mind, the Minister and his officials have in recent times sought to reduce the important role played by the parole board in dealing with people released into the community. As my hon. Friends have said, it is important for the parole board to play a central part, and it is perhaps even more important for the public to be protected.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: As I stated earlier, we believe that supervision is most effective when focused. The courts are required to focus supervised release orders on precisely the category referred to: those who are convicted of rape and other violent offences.

Local authorities cannot supervise all released offenders to the level needed to ensure public safety. The task cannot successfully be spread across all offenders. Since the publication of the White Paper, we have adapted our proposals on supervision. Supervision, through supervised release orders, will be mandatory for serious sex and violent offenders, and at the discretion of the court in other cases.

For those not subject to supervision, the provisions of clauses 33 and 34 provide an incentive to good behaviour on release. The hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) mentioned the potential to help. That is not diminished by the Bill. The national standards for the supervision of released prisoners provide that all persons released from custody can, within 12 months of their release, seek support and assistance from the local authority.

We believe that the provisions in the new clause would be undiscriminating, and therefore wasteful of resources, and that the courts are well able to recognise those offenders who represent the greatest risk to the public.

Mr. McAllion: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. In the White Paper—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the Minister giving way?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No, I had finished.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In that case, I call Mr. John McFall.

Mr. McFall: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The Minister says that he cannot spread the provisions because it would be too expensive, but that supervision would be mandatory for serious sex and violent offenders. He should understand that we are saying that those long-term prisoners who have committed serious offences should be subject to supervision. If, as I believe, he is saying otherwise, he is showing disregard for public safety. The Opposition want those individuals to be supervised.

It is no use for the Minister to say that the provision cannot be mandatory and cannot apply across the board. If it was good enough for the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Bill, introduced by the Minister and approved by the previous Secretaries of State—the right hon. Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Lang) and the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind)—why is it not good enough for the Minister and the Secretary of State today? Will the Minister maintain the provisions of the 1993 Act?

The 1993 Act was implemented after the right hon. and learned Member for Pentlands, when Secretary of State for Scotland, established Lord Kincraig's committee to consider parole and other issues. It took three years, if I remember correctly, to report back to the Government, but its recommendations were accepted by all parties. I was leading for Labour in the Committee that considered the Bill when the Minister asked us to accept them. He said that all long-term prisoners needed supervision. We took him at his word; why is he breaking it now?

Mr. McAllion: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way, unlike the Minister, who rather uncharitably refused to give way to me earlier.

In their latest figures, which cover 1994, even the Government accept that 83 per cent. of prisoners in Scotland serve sentences of less than six months. The number of people who will be affected by new clause 8 is small. It is beyond comprehension why the Government should resist the idea of supervision of serious offenders when they are released back into the community. The Minister mentioned some of the cases that will get automatic supervision; should he not also mention the cases that will not be covered by his provision but would be covered by ours?

Mr. McFall: My hon. Friend makes a good point: 83 per cent. of offenders are in prison for less than six months, and there is no supervision for them when they get out. Why should that principle apply to those who serve long sentences and to violent or serious offenders?

The Minister begs the question when he says that it is up to the court. Can he imagine a sheriff—or, more likely, a High Court judge—giving a 10-year sentence and saying, "Well, my boy, lest I forget, you should be subject to a supervisory release order when you come out"? There is every chance that judges will not utter those words, which means that such people will be a danger to the community when they come out. The Secretary of State smirks at that, but the 1993 legislation was introduced by his Government and made those very points. Why is he introducing this Bill against the wishes of his hon. Friends, the Kincraig committee and others? It must be recorded that the Bill is being introduced by the Secretary of State at a whim. He consulted no one.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Forsyth): I am surprised, after all this time, that the hon. Gentleman has not got the basic substance of the Bill into his mind: the point is that people should spend longer in prison as a result of their sentences and should not be out in the community under supervision. We believe that they should be in prison. The provisions for supervision after they have served the sentence of the court are an additional protection. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would understand that.

Mr. McFall: The right hon. Gentleman is being patronising. We are talking about long-term prisoners who are released under provisions made by the Government. The Opposition believe that, when the Government decide to release such prisoners, they have a duty to the public to ensure supervision. I hope that that gets through to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Davidson: Is it not a bit much for the Secretary of State to argue that he is interested in increasing sentences, and that we are not, when it was Labour who demanded in Committee that the sentence available to judges for the third convictions of drug traffickers aged over 21 should be increased from seven to 10 years? The Government defeated that proposal in Committee. We are interested in increasing sentences for such people. Does my hon. Friend agree that the main reason for the Government's refusal to accept the new clause was let slip by the Secretary of State when he said that local authorities could not supervise to the level required? Does that not show that it is a question of finance and nothing else?

5.45 pm

Mr. McFall: I agree with my hon. Friend.

I remind the House that it was the Opposition who brought up the cases of Gavin McGuire and John Cronin, who were released from prison. We want adequate supervision for such people. They were released under provisions introduced by the Government. We want long-term supervision, not the blemishes on the criminal justice system that the Government have allowed. That is why we have tabled new clause 8. We want increased public safety.

Mr. Davidson: Does my hon. Friend agree that part of the Government's defence of their refusal to accept new clause 8 is based on the fact that violent or sexual criminals have been dealt with elsewhere? However, crimes such as burglary will not be treated seriously enough by the courts; supervision after release will not be mandatory. The Government are releasing burglars into the community without the requirement for supervision. On top of all their other charters, we now have the burglars charter. Burglars are to be released without supervision, which will ensure that the public are put even further at risk.

Mr. McFall: I agree with my hon. Friend. That is an important point and the Minister could comment on the issue of people convicted of burglary.

It appears that the Government are not much concerned about people who are not only social nuisances in their communities but a danger to them. We want to take back to our communities the message that the Government take the issue seriously and will ensure supervision for such people when they are released from prison. The Government's intransigence blows a hole in their law and order credentials. The Secretary of State tells us that the Tories are interested in law and order, yet they have allowed crime to rip over the past 18 years in Scotland. New clause 8 would ensure that, when such people are let out of prison into the community, the message goes out from the House that the Government take the issue seriously. The Government have fallen down in their duty. That is why we press new clause 8 so vigorously.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: With the leave of the House, I shall respond briefly.

We have, of course, adapted our proposals since the publication of the White Paper. There will be control through a supervised release order where the courts determine that the offender will be a risk. In cases where the courts have not identified the offender as a risk, clause 34 will be a significant disincentive to reoffending. It provides that, if someone reoffends during a fixed period after his release, he will be liable to a heavier penalty for the new offence.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Davidson) said that the Opposition wanted to increase the minimum sentence for a third conviction for drug trafficking to 10 years for adult traffickers, but they also suggested reducing it to five years for those under 21. We believe that that would have weakened law and order.

Mr. McAllion: The Minister tried to calm our feelings by referring us to clause 34, which provides that people released under licence but without supervision who reoffend will be subject to stiffer sentences. He is making the tragic mistake that legislators have made since the 19th century: he believes that tougher and tougher sentences will reduce crime. Most criminals do not believe that they are going to be caught. The sentence that might result from being caught does not enter their considerations. They have to be looked after in the community. The Secretary of State is wrong if he thinks that locking them up in gaol for long periods is the answer. At some point, they have to come out again. If they reoffend, crime will inevitably rise. That is why we have tabled the new clause.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: That was very much the voice of old Labour. We strongly believe that it is necessary to target those concerned and not act regardless of risk or need.

Mr. Davidson: With the permission of the House—

Hon. Members: No.

New clause 9

WOMEN OFFENDERS

'.—(1) After section 24(8) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 there shall be inserted the following subsections—

"(9) The court shall grant a bail application by a woman unless it is satisfied it is contrary to public safety or the interests of justice to do so.

(10) The court shall specify its reasons for a refusal of any bail application made under (9) above."

(2) After section 204(2) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 there shall be inserted the following subsection—

"(2A) A court shall not pass a sentence of imprisonment on a woman of or over 21 years of age unless the court considers no other method of dealing with her is appropriate; and for the purpose of determining whether any other method of dealing with her is appropriate the court shall obtain (from an officer of the local authority or otherwise) such information as it can about the offender's circumstances; and it shall also take into account any information before it concerning the offender's character and physical and mental condition.".'.—[Mr. McFall.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. McFall: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The Secretary of State for Scotland made a statement last week on 16 January on the subject of the suicides at Cornton Vale prison in Stirling. It was made only after more than a year of campaigning by myself and others on the subject of suicides in that prison. The Minister knows that, tragically, one of my constituents lost her life—she was one of the six young women who committed suicide; the last one to attempt to take her life also resided in my constituency. Therefore, as well as having a party interest in the subject, I also have a personal one.

In his statement last week, the Secretary of State mentioned a number of the measures that are included in the new clause; we welcomed his comments on them, as we have been appealing to him to take action. Our only regret is the length of time and the amount of pressure that it took before the Secretary of State finally decided to act. On the same day as he made the statement, he responded to the chief inspector's report on Edinburgh prison and said that both cases had nothing to do with him. The new clause will ensure that such cases have everything to do with the Secretary of State, because the prevention of suicides—particularly of young women—has everything to do with the Secretary of State and is his responsibility. He has accepted the proposition of a bail hostel in Glasgow and the appointment of individuals to carry out work on addictions and to hold psychiatric sessions in the prison.

Dr. Godman: The new clause is designed to keep women out of Cornton Vale. In the light of what my hon. Friend said about his constituents, is he satisfied that those with suicidal tendencies receive adequate care and attention when they are incarcerated in Cornton Vale? Is he satisfied with the Government's anti-suicide measures?

Mr. McFall: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. When I was in America last summer on home affairs business, I visited prisons on the east coast. In every prison I visited, I asked about its suicide policy and the number of suicides. Hardly any suicides had been recorded in any of those prisons over the past 10 or 15 years, because they had adopted appropriate suicide prevention policies. There is no doubt that appropriate measures were not in place at Cornton Vale—largely, I believe, because the Scottish Prison Service regarded it as something of a backwater and left it to get on with the job on its own. As a result, the proper procedures and measures were not implemented.

I have visited that prison twice in the past six months, most recently on 29 November. The governor, Kate Donegan, showed me around and I was impressed by the remedial work being undertaken there. However, she mentioned that many of the young women there are vulnerable and that it is hard for the prison authorities to deal with such problems. In his report on the prison, Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons in Scotland, Mr. Clive Fairweather, said that suicides would not end at what he described as "the death-culture prison" until more appropriate measures were implemented. We have campaigned long and hard to make the Secretary of State understand and do something about the issue of women prisoners, especially those at Cornton Vale.

The new clause would strengthen bail provision in Scotland.

Dr. Godman: The chief inspector of prisons voiced similar concerns in his report on Greenock prison. The problem that we are debating is not confined to Cornton Vale; it affects prisons throughout Scotland. As Mr. Fairweather pointed out, the problem may be part of a rising tendency among young people in Scotland to commit suicide. Nevertheless, does my hon. Friend agree that much more needs to be done to protect vulnerable people?

Mr. McFall: I agree entirely. Only two years ago, a young constituent of mine, Gerry Deary, committed suicide in Greenock prison. The need to do something for young people is urgent. The chief inspector's reports on Cornton Vale, Greenock and Edinburgh prisons contain comments expressing professional discontent with the Government's handling of the situation in prisons. I accuse the Government of dereliction of duty in that respect.

Mr. Fairweather's report on Edinburgh prison, which came out on Friday, reveals an intolerable situation. He points out the current dangers within the prison and describes a flashpoint atmosphere which could erupt in the future. The Secretary of State and the Minister of State take a smug attitude; they sit on their hands and do nothing. The new clause would ensure that they address the problems at Cornton Vale and elsewhere and ensure that we have good order in our prisons.

Imposing good order is not some sort of do-gooding measure. Good order ensures that we do not have riots, that money is not needlessly spent clearing up behind them and that lives—whether those of prison officers or solicitors visiting prisons—are not put in danger. It is in the cause of good order that the new clause has been tabled.

Dr. Godman: This is an important issue and many people would benefit from the new clause if it were passed. Not long ago, in Greenock prison, two prisoners committed suicide within 25 hours of each other. Such tragedies have a distressing effect on prison officers, especially those directly involved—that is, those who discover the bodies. Suicides in prisons are terrible both for staff and for fellow prisoners.

Mr. McFall: Again, I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. It is a pity that the Secretary of State for Scotland, in whose constituency Cornton Vale is located, is not here to listen to the debate because he would learn from it. He sat in on earlier debates; yet he does not attend a debate which directly affects his own constituency. We should ask why that is. For the past year, we have been chasing the Secretary of State, asking him to address these issues and to acknowledge his responsibilities. We are debating a clause which relates specifically to his constituency, but he is not here to listen to our proposals. Opposition Members have visited prisons and spoken to members of the Scottish Prison Service because we have an interest in the issue. I want the Secretary of State to show the same degree of interest.

Mr. Wallace: The hon. Gentleman emphasised the difficulties at Cornton Vale and referred to last week's report on Edinburgh prison. Under the Bill, prisoners will have to earn days of remission. Does he agree that that will be much harder in prisons where there is overcrowding and no opportunity for rehabilitative work and that that will add to the tensions and pressure in Scotland's prisons, including Cornton Vale?

Mr. McFall: The hon. Gentleman is entirely correct. We all have long memories and we remember when the former Secretary of State, now Lord Younger of Prestwick, abolished parole. We remember the problems that that caused in Peterhead prison and elsewhere. We are dealing with a fragile situation.

Only this weekend, I received a communication from the Parole Board for Scotland telling me that the Government's intentions in respect of prison officers assessing prisoners for early release were a dangerous proposition. We want the Minister and the Secretary of State to understand that those with an interest, professional or otherwise, in the criminal justice system have the best interests of the prison service at heart, but they are not being heeded. I am putting forward the new clause with that in mind.

The new clause would strengthen bail provision in Scotland to ensure that women are remanded in custody prior to trial or sentencing only when they pose a danger to public safety or where it is in the interests of justice to remand them. Those who are dangerous should be imprisoned, but those who pose no danger should not. That echoes the sentiments uttered by Mr. Clive Fairweather when he investigated Cornton Vale.

The new clause would also ensure that no woman was sentenced to detention or imprisonment until and unless the court had considered a full social inquiry report on her background and personal and domestic circumstances, including an assessment of any drugs dependency or mental health problem. It would also ensure that the court had considered all community-based disposals before making a decision to send a woman into custody.

I want to share with the Minister the feelings of my constituents, Jim and Anne Bollen, who tragically lost their daughter Angela in Cornton Vale. In the privacy and intimacy of their home, Mr. Bollen said to me, "Mr. McFall, she would not have committed suicide if there had been a proper community disposal available for her. She was no danger to society—she was a danger to herself and a problem to her family. If the courts had recognised that, they would have been assisting us. Instead"—here Mr. Bollen pointed to his three-year-old granddaughter—"my wife and I, at our age, have the responsibility for that child for the rest of our lives."

In their eyes, the irresponsibility of the criminal justice system is answerable. The responsibility for that comes back solely, fairly and squarely on the Government. The Secretary of State cannot get out of that, despite his assertions to the contrary. Anyone who considers the macho approach to law and order displayed in the Secretary of State's article in The Sun today knows that the Government are responsible for conditions in prisons. We shall be unrelenting in our efforts to ensure that the Government take their responsibilities seriously. [Interruption.] The Secretary of State is now taking his seat—that is a welcome sight.

The new clause has been introduced to open up the debate on how women offenders should be dealt with in Scotland—in the light of 12 suicides or attempted suicides within 18 months at Cornton Vale and incidents at other prisons. We must also remember that the chief inspector of prisons pointed to the tinder box environment in our prisons. The first four suicides at Cornton Vale involved young women remanded prior to trial. Clive Fairweather made it clear in his report that many of the women remanded to Cornton Vale should not have been there, and need not have been there had bail hostels been available.

As I said earlier, I welcome the Secretary of State's announcement last Thursday of funding for Glasgow city council's bail proposals. In partnership with the Church of Scotland and the Scottish Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders, Glasgow will quickly bring 15 bail beds on stream. I also welcome the additional money being made available to develop a new 15-bed bail hostel in the west of Scotland. The reason for the pressure is that many of the young people remanded to Cornton Vale come from the west of Scotland. That issue may be worthy of further examination.

I note that the Secretary of State said last week that additional money is being provided to deal with the drug-related problems experienced by a very large proportion of the prison population. I know that an addiction worker is being provided at Cornton Vale, as well as drug workers in the prisons in Glasgow.

There is also the question why so many young women from the west of Scotland find themselves in Cornton Vale. Is there a difference in drugs policy between the west of Scotland and the east of Scotland? The research money available should be used to examine that issue.

Dr. Godman: In the scheme of things that my hon. Friend is outlining, he has emphasised the importance of social background reports. Does he agree that a competent social worker can produce a good report within a few days of being given the task?

Mr. McFall: I agree with my hon. Friend. I am making the point that the court has a responsibility. A number of courts needs to undergo an attitudinal change. Of course, there is also a responsibility on the social workers to produce good reports.

In the annual criminal justice planning statement submitted to the Secretary of State on 1 August 1996, Glasgow city council asked for an extension to the bail information and bail supervision service to cover the stipendiary court in Glasgow. In fact, a similar request had been made by the outgoing Strathclyde regional council in 1995. The Secretary of State's response last week, though welcome, was therefore most definitely belated. However, it is an acceptance of the request by Glasgow city council and, formerly, Strathclyde regional council.

The agreement to fund additional prison, court and community-based posts to assist and improve assessment of drug-misusing women offenders will provide an infrastructure of services for which I have long asked. However, that is not enough. The law needs to be strengthened. No woman—arguably, no person—should be remanded in custody other than where it is in the interests of justice to do so or where public safety requires it. If that is so, the law should state it.

Current bail law is to be found in part III of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. Sections 23 to 33 of that Act outline the bail process, procedures and conditions and how bail applications are to be dealt with. However, the provisions covering whether or not to grant bail other than for certain very serious crimes are always at the discretion of the court. Three times in section 23 the law states that the sheriff "at his discretion" may grant or refuse a bail application. That includes cases on summary procedure as well as those on petition.

The new clause would retain full judicial discretion over whether to grant bail to women, but shifts the presumption to one of bail normally being granted unless an exception can be justified. The exceptions are public safety and the interests of justice. Where the exception is to be exercised, the new clause requires the court to specify its reasons. Thus, the new clause gives a clear lead.

What are the numbers involved? The 1995 prison statistics bulletin, issued by the Scottish Office in October 1996, reveals that in 1995 a total of 876 women were remanded in custody—739 prior to trial and 137 awaiting sentencing. Clive Fairweather, the chief inspector of prisons, says that many of those women should not have been so remanded. The new clause will help to reduce the numbers if women remanded in custody to those cases where it is necessary for public safety or in the interests of justice.

Parliament has already decided in the 1995 Act that certain categories of person cannot be sentenced to detention or prison without a court first having to consider a report prepared by local authority social workers. Those categories are, first, all persons under 21 years of age, murder alone excluded and, secondly, all persons of whatever age facing custody for the first time. The new clause would widen those categories to include all women offenders. No probation order and no community service order can be made unless the court has first considered a social inquiry report. That is what the 1995 Act requires. How can a court, when dealing with a woman over the age of 21, consider a community-based disposal instead of prison if it does not even ask for a social inquiry report?

The prison staff and social workers know that many of the women sent to Cornton Vale need not be there, and I am sure that the Secretary of State also realises that. They know that many of them have a drugs problem. The facts have been emphasised time and again. The new clause would ensure that no woman could be sentenced to imprisonment in Scotland without a court having to consider, first, whether there is no other way of dealing with the woman in the community, secondly, the personal, family and domestic circumstances and background of the woman and, thirdly, an assessment of the woman's drug dependency, where necessary. Only by being required to obtain a social inquiry report can a court honestly make such an informed decision.

I have investigated the numbers that might be involved. The 1995 prison statistics bulletin states that in 1995 some 1,293 women were sentenced to custody. Of those, 146 were under the age of 21. Of the adults, 634 were admitted for non-payment of a fine. We hope that the growth of supervised attendance orders as an alternative to prison for fine default will reduce that number. If I remember correctly, both the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Scotland have said that they will try to do something to reduce the number of individuals going to prison for fine default.

The Minister may recollect that, when we debated the issue previously, we said that a woman with two children could be sent to prison for not paying a fine of £80 when it would cost the state more than £2,000 to keep her and look after her children. Surely, as we approach the 21st century, we should be more civilised and look for a more appropriate way of dealing with the non-payment of fines.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that we are doing everything in our power to extend supervised attendance orders throughout Scotland, specifically to deal with the point that he has made?

Mr. McFall: I agree. Confronted with those figures, however, the Minister may realise that not enough has been done and that the problem needs more urgent attention.

I can only hope that the growing use of supervised attendance orders as an alternative to prison for fine defaulters will reduce the numbers that I have given. We are still left with 513 other adult receptions, some of them repeat receptions—that is to say, of the same women. Others will be in custody for the first time and will be the subject of social inquiry reports. In some cases the courts, at their discretion, may have asked for such reports. The point is that the numbers involved are not great. As the Secretary of State conceded in his statement last week, it is therefore not a resource issue. Six hours spent on each social inquiry report represents fewer than 3,000 social work hours per year, so the total cost would be the equivalent of two full-time social workers.

This is a simple, but practical, measure. I am aware that many of the issues that I have raised may apply equally to male offenders, but their numbers are much greater—8,217 custodial sentences in 1995—so there may be feasibility problems in terms of social work resources and court time for repeat appearances. Today's debate is designed to highlight the position of women offenders in Scotland, so if the Minister asks why we have not dealt with men, too, perhaps implying that the measure is discriminatory, I would reply that we have initiated the debate in the aftermath of the 12 attempted or successful suicides in Cornton Vale prison in an 18-month period.

I remind the Secretary of State that it was his own appointee—Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons, Clive Fairweather—who highlighted the problems of women in prison in Scotland and whose report to the Secretary of State called for alternatives to prison. Many of these women, he said, should and could have been dealt with in the community. His report cannot be ignored. No prison for men has as bad a problem as Cornton Vale, so special measures are needed to deal with a unique problem.

Of course, many of the issues discussed today apply just as much to male offenders, but just because we cannot deal with the entire problem at once does not mean that we should be prevented from solving part of it. I believe that the measures announced to Parliament by the Secretary of State last week will be helpful. Meanwhile, the cost of doing nothing hitherto has been the lives of six young women in the Secretary of State's own constituency, and attempted suicides by a further six. Surely that will move Ministers to implement in full the proposals in the new clause for a supervision order to be considered by the courts before any woman can be sentenced to prison in Scotland. That, surely, is not too much to ask for.

Dr. Godman: Is not suicide more prevalent among remand prisoners than among those serving sentences of imprisonment following conviction in the courts?

Mr. McFall: That is certainly true—hence the new clause. Last week the Secretary of State showed that he realises that bail hostels are not particularly costly. Indeed, a 15-bed hostel with 24-hour staff cover will cost less than £200,000 a year to run. I believe that the Scottish Office has promised Glasgow city council almost 100 per cent. funding. I am pleased about that, but there is a need to do more.

I offer the House the new clause in the hope that the Government will listen constructively. We must move forward in a non-partisan fashion to remove the blight of the past 18 months from the Scottish criminal justice system.

Ms Rachel Squire (Dunfermline, West): I fully support all that my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) has said. This weekend, while I was thinking about what to say in this evening's debate, by one of those strange coincidences, I was contacted at my surgery by the family of a young woman who is in Cornton Vale prison and whose case highlights a number of the reasons for new clause 9.

Hon. Members may have heard of the case of Louise Clarke; she and her family are constituents of mine. She is in prison because she was convicted of the culpable murder of her partner and sentenced to five years. I am not speaking in support of culpable murder, but my constituent's case shows just what can happen to people in Cornton Vale who are awaiting a court appearance or—as in Louise Clarke's case—who have been convicted and given a sentence.

Louise Clarke murdered her partner after years of domestic violence. She met him first when she was 14 years old. She had been referred to him because he, a community worker in a position of public trust and responsibility, was supposed to help her cope with the break-up of her parents' marriage. He then blatantly abused that position of trust and responsibility. Aged 38, he took full advantage of a 14-year-old girl. Eventually she moved in with him, whereupon she was subjected to several years of domestic violence—until she finally attacked and killed him.

I do not condone murder; I do emphasise that many of the young women in Cornton Vale prison are, like Louise Clarke, as much the victims of their circumstances as were those against whom they perpetrated their crimes. Like many other young women in that prison, Louise Clarke grew up being subjected to violence and abuse. She needs full support and rehabilitation to help her adjust to living a normal life and, hopefully, a happy and healthy life when she is eventually discharged.

Many of my constituents and others feel that Louise Clarke's sentence was most unfair, given the circumstances. Indeed, her family and friends handed into the Secretary of State for Scotland a petition with more than 2,000 signatures. Although the Secretary of State was not there to receive it himself, it was handed to representatives of his office some weeks ago but the family and friends concerned have yet to receive even an acknowledgement.

Mrs. Adams: Does my hon. Friend agree that sentences passed on women are often much harsher than those passed on men who have committed a similar offence?

Ms Squire: Yes. A man in circumstances similar to those of Louise Clarke would have been dealt with far more leniently.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I simply want to say that I am sorry if the hon. Lady's constituents did not receive an acknowledgement of their petition. It has been the policy in the Scottish Office, as a financial saving measure, not to acknowledge correspondence and representations when they are received, but to wait until there is a substantive response. However, we have just changed that policy, although it does involve additional cost, for the very reason that the hon. Lady gave—it causes concern to people who think that nothing is happening because they have received no acknowledgement. I shall look into the case that the hon. Lady raises.

Ms Squire: I thank the Secretary of State. I am sure that the family, friends and several hundred people who signed the petition will be glad to hear his statement.

Mrs. Fyfe: A little earlier, my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, North (Mrs. Adams) said that a woman is likely to receive a harsher sentence than a man for a similar crime, including murder. That may come as a surprise to at least some of our colleagues but it is certainly the case. Women Members of Parliament probably follow those matters a bit more closely because we receive many letters about them. For example, I recall a case in an English court where a man got away with murdering his wife because she nagged him. Here is a case of a woman who suffered domestic violence for years and years before she finally snapped and committed murder. It is obvious that the woman is not a danger to society but that years of abuse drove her to those desperate straits. It was therefore completely unjustified to give her a harsh sentence.

Ms Squire: I thank my hon. Friend for those sentiments. I am confident that my constituents and the woman's family will take great comfort from her comments, with which I fully agree.

Such cases show the importance of greater monitoring of people placed in a position of trust and responsibility, particularly for young people. I know that that matter has been raised in the House.

That case emphasises the importance of prison and other staff being available for rehabilitative work with the women at Cornton Vale prison. My constituent's mother emphasised that the Cornton Vale staff were very understanding and supportive of her daughter, but she made it clear that the pressures and strains on staff meant that sufficient time and resources were not available.

Indeed, the staff must at times feel that they are as much prisoners of the regime in which they work as the prisoners themselves. They are imprisoned by overcrowding, insufficient staffing levels and too few resources. As was said earlier, they work in a tinderbox environment, which puts tremendous stress and strain on them. It does not allow them the job satisfaction that they would receive if they could offer the support and rehabilitative services necessary to ensure that women prisoners were discharged to lead full, happy and healthy lives.

Dr. Godman: Does my hon. Friend agree that one consequence of the new clause would be to lift some of that burden from the hard-working staff at Cornton Vale?

Ms Squire: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend. The new clause would benefit all the women at Cornton Vale prison, both prisoners and staff.

Earlier in the debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), in response to something that the Minister said, mentioned the role of highly skilled and qualified social work staff in providing rehabilitation and support services, and their involvement in the rehabilitation of young women such as those at Cornton Vale. I am extremely concerned by press reports over the weekend, which show that the Government are determined to add to their privatisation list by privatising social work services and removing the highly trained and qualified group of staff available to work with young women in prisons and elsewhere. Doing so will benefit the private sector rather than provide the high-quality, professional support and rehabilitative services that are needed if we are to reduce our prison population and create a safer and more stable society for everyone.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: Part of the debate so far has concentrated on the sentencing of women offenders. I do not wish to trespass on that aspect, but I urge caution in attempts to compare one case with another. There is no doubt that the circumstances of each criminal case are almost always unique. For example, while the family of the person convicted may consider a sentence to be unduly harsh, the family of the person who died may have a diametrically different view.

It is legitimate to argue that, so far as possible, there should be greater consistency in sentencing. The fact that the former Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Ross, is now to have responsibility for the continuing professional education of judges seems a substantial and worthwhile step in the right direction. Perhaps out of that and other such initiatives, greater consistency may emerge.

We must also be careful not to form our judgment on the basis of newspaper reports of various cases. Often an important factor, tending towards leniency or suggesting that a more severe sentence should be imposed, is omitted from the report.

I shall begin my substantive remarks by congratulating the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), who I see has slipped out for a moment, not just on the way that he proposed the new clause, but on the remarkable determination he demonstrated in ensuring that his constituents, to whom he referred in his speech, were afforded legal aid for the purpose of representation at the conjoined fatal accident inquiry that is to be held into the deaths of three unfortunate young women at Cornton Vale.

It was extraordinary behaviour on the part of the Scottish Legal Aid Board—the legal aid authorities in Scotland—that legal aid was not immediately allowed when an application for that purpose was made to it. It is difficult to conceive of any issue in which an individual has a greater interest than in being represented at an inquiry whose purpose is to seek to determine the cause of death of that individual's daughter, in this case.

I was a member of the old Legal Aid Central Committee and for a year before entering the House was a member of the Scottish Legal Aid Board. From time to time, I had to deal with such applications or appeals in relation to such applications. I find it extraordinary that the board should have taken the view that it took. I hope that we will see no repetition of that. The board operates under statute. If its conduct is unreasonable, it will be open to judicial review. We would all regard it as an unnecessary waste of public funds if applicants for legal aid were compelled to go the Court of Session seeking judicial review of what seemed patently unreasonable decisions. In that regard, we should all recognise the determination of the hon. Member for Dumbarton, and congratulate him.

Dr. Godman: I offer the hon. and learned Gentleman my compliments on his remarks about the Scottish Legal Aid Board. I hope that they are brought to the board's attention. In the near future, there is to be yet another fatal accident inquiry into yet another suicide at Greenock prison. I hope that the board will act much more sympathetically than in the case to which the hon. and learned Gentleman referred.

Mr. Campbell: The hon. Gentleman contributes often to these debates and, on this occasion as on many others, he makes a perceptive and constructive contribution.

Cornton Vale prison was designed in the 1960s and built in the early 1970s. Its design and construction were a direct response to the physical inadequacy of Gateside prison in Greenock, in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, where the physical conditions were generally regarded as wholly inappropriate for the proper treatment, care and imprisonment of female offenders.

It is now 30 years since the original conception of Cornton Vale. In the aftermath of the most recent suicide, I put forward the view, not as a panacea or an easy response, that it was now time to consider whether

Cornton Vale is a suitable institution, in terms of its physical characteristics, for the care of those who are on remand or those who have been imprisoned.

I am not an expert in penology of this kind, but if the physical characteristics of Cornton Vale are inappropriate, we should not shrink from considering whether to close the facility and build somewhere else something that contains the physical characteristics appropriate to deal with the young women on which much of the debate has centred.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): Does the hon. and learned Gentleman accept that Cornton Vale will not have been enhanced by the fact that the Secretary of State proposes to give over one of the wings to young offenders? That would reduce the complex, where I used to be a prison visitor, to two thirds of its previous size, and mix the prisoners, placing women prisoners and young offenders side by side.

Mr. Campbell: The hon. Gentleman has an advantage over me if he has been a prison visitor at Cornton Vale; I have visited it only in a professional capacity, and therefore may not have seen all parts of it, as the hon. Gentleman has.

When a series of suicides has occurred, as has been the case, one must be willing to think the unthinkable. My argument is that we need a root-and-branch approach to the question of how we deal with women who are caught up in the criminal law system, whether on remand or after conviction. If, as a result of such a review, it became clear that the physical characteristics of Cornton Vale were inappropriate, as Gateside was in the 1960s, we should be prepared to take the step of closing the facility and building a more appropriate one.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I do not doubt the hon. and learned Gentleman's good faith, but has he considered how the staff of Cornton Vale would react to the statement, from a man of his standing, that the prison should be closed? Those who are constituents of mine were extremely upset about it. I do not know whether they speak for the Prison Officers Association, but the hon. and learned Gentleman's statement was a terrible blow to morale. On reflection, does he not think that he should have spoken privately to Ministers, rather than publicly?

Mr. Campbell: I stand by the judgment that I made. I do not say that we should close the prison. I say that, if the prison's physical characteristics are inappropriate to the proper treatment of women in the criminal law system, we should consider creating a prison in which there are such physical characteristics as enable us to deal with them.

There is little doubt that a prison where there have been the tragic circumstances and the number of suicides that have occurred at Cornton Vale is not fulfilling its responsibility, however sincere and competent the staff are. We should be willing to consider root-and-branch alternatives.

Dr. Godman: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Campbell: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will allow me to make progress, as I know that others wish to speak.

We need a new regime for the treatment of women on remand and after conviction. We must acknowledge that the responses and requirements of women who find themselves in conflict with the criminal law, and the way in which they should be dealt with, are entirely different from those of men who find themselves in conflict with the criminal law. I make that judgment from my own professional experience, but it is supported by much of the recent evidence of the kind of people who have been driven to the terrible solution, if that is the right word to use in this context, of taking their own lives.

The matter is one of considerable importance. The fact that the new clause would discourage the placing of women in prison, either on remand or after conviction, in my judgment represents a proper approach which should commend itself to the House.

The hon. Member for Dumbarton pointed out that many women receive custodial sentences for fine default. We have seen anecdotal, front-page stories about women who were sent to prison because they did not have a television licence and could not afford to pay the fine levied upon them. Such people should not be in prison. If Ministers will not accept that argument, I am pretty sure that the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Hurd), who recently became president of the Prison Reform Trust, will sympathise with it.

The Minister is about to leap to his feet and say that the Government share my view. If that is so, why are so many women sent to prison for fine default? It is because our system is insensitive: it does not contain a sufficient range of means of dealing with people who find themselves in that position. For that reason, I hope that the new clause will commend itself to the House. It is a forerunner of our treating women in the criminal law system in a way that they unquestionably deserve in the manner of a truly civilised society.

Mr. Canavan: I support new clause 9, which was moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall). Scotland has one of the highest prison populations per capita of any country in Europe. When I hear the Secretary of State speak, I sometimes get the impression that he wants to increase rather than decrease our prison population to such an extent that the construction of prisons may be the only growth industry in Scotland.

Cornton Vale has inevitably been mentioned. I do not have any up-to-date, detailed information about that prison, but many years ago it was in my constituency and I visited it occasionally. No prison is a nice place—I do not suppose that they are meant to be—but it is nonsense to believe the claptrap peddled by some elements of the media that prisoners are living in the lap of luxury. Loss of liberty is obviously the greatest deprivation experienced by anyone who serves a prison sentence.

Some 20 years ago, Cornton Vale was one of the most modern and most civilised prisons in Scotland. I have visited quite a few prisons since then, and some seem Victorian in their conditions. If the Government were serious about penal reform, they would try to make conditions in our prisons more humane, so that ex-prisoners would not harbour such anti-society and anti-establishment feelings.

Although Cornton Vale was, by Scottish standards, civilised and reasonably humane 20 years ago, I am alarmed by what has occurred in recent times. I think that the Secretary of State, as the Minister responsible for prisons in Scotland and as the constituency Member of Parliament, should take a more active interest in what is going on. It is unacceptable that six young women in Cornton Vale have committed suicide in the past 18 months—an average of one death every three months—and the situation warrants inquiry at the highest level.

Most of the young women imprisoned at Cornton Vale are very vulnerable—many are teenagers who were convicted of drug-related offences. For many, a custodial sentence at Cornton Vale was not the first option of the sheriff or the judge who sentenced them. As the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) and others have said, many initially received non-custodial sentences, such as fines, because the judiciary deemed those penalties most appropriate in the circumstances. However, default in the payment of fines led to their imprisonment in Cornton Vale.

New clause 9 seems to present a reasonable alternative. It places an obligation on the court to "grant a bail application by a woman unless it is satisfied it is contrary to public safety or the interests of justice to do so."

It also places an obligation on the court not to pass a custodial sentence on a woman unless

"the court considers no other method of dealing with her is appropriate".

It emphasises bail and non-custodial sentences rather than detention and prison sentences.

I admit that, for males and females, prison sentences are appropriate and inevitable in some cases. For example, a custodial sentence is appropriate if someone commits a terrible crime of violence and poses a danger to society. I am convinced that the majority of prisoners at Cornton Vale could receive non-custodial sentences that would be more appropriate to their crimes—particularly when they represent no great danger to public safety. I hope that the Government will consider the new clause seriously and construct bail hostels and alternative forms of accommodation as the new clause suggests. Too many young women have died in Cornton Vale, and it is time for the Secretary of State to act in the interests of justice.

Mrs. Fyfe: If the Minister rejects new clause 9, I imagine that he will do so on the ground that it relates only to women offenders. He may believe that it should be rejected on the ground of equal treatment. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) said, statistics show that, over the years, far fewer women than men have committed serious crimes resulting in gaol sentences. The conduct of men in prison tends to be different from that of women: whereas women tend to turn violent feelings inwards and harm themselves, male prisoners may be more likely to act aggressively against other prisoners. For those reasons, we must look afresh at the treatment of women who are remanded in prison or who are serving prison sentences. That is why I support new clause 9.

Some hon. Members have said that by far the most common crime among women serving prison sentences is fine default. It may seem obvious, but women do not carry a gene for fine default; there is nothing in female DNA to make it more likely. It is a crime of poverty. Women are more likely to fall foul of the law in that way because they tend to have lower incomes than the male half of the human race. As other hon. Members have said, it is unreasonable that those women have to spend time in gaol when there are other ways of dealing with such crime. Taking those women out of the system would ensure that there were far fewer women serving sentences in Cornton Vale.

There is only one women's prison in Scotland, demonstrating how little need there is for prison places for women in Scotland. It is important, however, to consider the research carried out in the United Kingdom. I should be glad if research into the issue were conducted in Scotland. Research in England has shown that courts have taken a sterner view of women breaking the law than of men breaking the same law. I do not know whether that happens in Scottish courts, but we should find out. It certainly seems so, with so many women in prison simply for failing to pay a fine. That says something about the courts' attitude.

Other hon. Members have talked about the deaths of women on remand. That is a tragedy for the young women concerned and it is appalling for their families, who see them go to prison on remand for a relatively trivial offence—I believe that that was true of all the cases—with dreadful results that could not normally be foreseen.

Some of the deaths have been linked with drugs and suicidal tendencies. Rather than attempt to create a round-the-clock suicide watch in prison, we should ask whether people who are so prone to suicide should be in prison. Men or women, should they not be in the care of a mental hospital? Even in mental hospitals, it is difficult to ensure the safety of prisoners determined to commit suicide. If a mental hospital, with all its experience of such cases, finds it difficult, it is only to be expected that prison warders will find it even more difficult to tackle the situation.

I have already said that women are more likely to turn violence on themselves than on others. When I visited Cornton Vale some years ago with my hon. Friends the Members for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) and for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty) and others some years ago, one of the warders said that they had had cases of women prisoners slashing their wrists with broken teacups, but the women did not attack others. That was typical conduct of women who were severely upset by being in prison. The loss of liberty is bound to affect anybody—man or woman—and is very difficult to deal with. Knowing that women prisoners might turn violence on themselves, we must consider how many of them should be dealt with in other ways rather than imprisonment.

On my visit to Cornton Vale, I was amazed to discover that actions that could have improved circumstances were not being taken. I know that there have been some improvements, but I should like the Minister to address some of the issues. Even education and training opportunities were limited compared with those available to male prisoners. Little was being done to help those women to rehabilitate themselves into civil life and stay out of trouble.

Incredibly, the reason given was that there were so few women prisoners. The fact that women tend to be by far the more law-abiding sex is held against those who commit crimes. As there are so few of them, they get fewer opportunities to find activities that would help them to be useful members of society when they leave prison. I remember that there was a very limited curriculum.

[Mrs. Fyfe]

Work opportunities at that time did not extend far beyond sewing shrouds, which I would have thought would have depressed any young woman intolerably. The authorities could have exercised a bit more imagination than that.

Complaints have been expressed over the years about attitudes to prisoners. I know that some feel that prison staff have come in for much unjust criticism. We also hear from prisoners and ex-prisoners that they felt the regime to be too harsh. We should consider that and look into the day-to-day conduct of prison life.

We have talked about public safety. It is important to remember that we are not saying that someone who is a danger to public safety should be freed, but a bail application should be granted for those who are safe to be let out. I find it fantastic that we even have to argue the case, because we have all heard of rapists and others who were a danger to society being let out on bail and allowed to roam about, yet a woman who has not paid a fine is considered too great a danger to society to be allowed out.

With so few women in Scotland having served a gaol sentence, it should not be difficult to research these questions and decide on the best approach. What offences should land people in gaol? In what circumstances should bail be granted? Are we certain that there is fair treatment between the sexes for offenders? The narrow research base should make it simple to carry out that work and ensure that the system is truly just to women offenders in Scotland.

Mrs. Adams: I support new clause 9 and hope that the Government will seriously consider what my hon. Friends have said. It is clear that not nearly as many women commit crimes as their male counterparts. Someone once said to me that if there were no men, the world would be a crime-free place full of fat, happy women. That might well be true. Women are certainly not as oriented towards committing crime, but statistics in England show that they appear to be treated more harshly than men for the same crimes. I hope that the Minister will seriously consider treating women differently in the prison and criminal justice systems.

The Minister may argue that treating women differently would be discrimination in their favour. I make no apology for asking him to do that, because women behave differently from men. When they break the law, it tends to be trivial, or at least non-violent, offences. They tend not to commit violent offences, and when they do, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, West (Ms Squire) said, it is often in circumstances in which there has been a great deal of domestic violence, resulting in the woman eventually breaking and retaliating for the first time, frequently after many years of abuse.

Women in prison tend to be there on minor charges, often, as my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) and others have pointed out, for defaulting on fines on trivial issues such as television licences.

In such cases, not only the women concerned but their families are often affected. It is inhumane to punish women to such an extent, but it is also uneconomical. Women are being imprisoned, usually for some weeks, for minor crimes such as defaulting on a £100 fine for failing to pay for a television licence. We may have to keep such women in prison for two or three months, and, moreover, we may have to support their families. Children often have to be taken into care, and the need for support frequently does not end when a woman is released and the family are back together.

Ms Rachel Squire: I support what my hon. Friend says. Some years ago, I had to deal with a family in which the mother of three children had been given a prison sentence. Tremendous efforts were made to ensure that the children could continue to live in the community, with full support from the social services, while awaiting their mother's eventual release. Fortunately, one of the children was 16 years old at the time. As my hon. Friend has said, support was also needed after the mother's release. This important matter needs to be taken fully into account.

Mrs. Adams: I agree.

Families often enter a vicious circle that they cannot break. The children as well as the mother are in the system and cannot escape from it, and that frequently leads to their committing offences in future. Such a system is not economical. It does not do society any good, and it certainly does not do the women involved any good.

Women prisoners often come from difficult backgrounds, and what they have done may relate to their particular circumstances. Many more women with psychological problems are in prison than we would expect, and many are dependent on drugs—not only illegal but prescribed drugs to which they have become addicted. We are not helping such women; we are simply locking them up.

We know that women do not do well in prison. They often do less well than men. I wonder whether that is because the woman in a family is often the responsible person—the person who looks after the household accounts, and runs the domestic side. In locking up such women, we are not only shutting them away from their families but taking all their responsibilities from them. Women often find it difficult to cope with that.

The Minister must look carefully at new clause 9. He must obtain social background reports on women who enter the prison system, and note the number of women prisoners who have been imprisoned for trivial, minor offences such as fine default. I know that, in some instances, he has tried to address the issue, but I do not think that we are currently going far enough.

We should treat women prisoners differently from their male counterparts. They are usually in prison for very different reasons, and the circumstances that landed them there are usually very different. We should not be locking up non-violent women who have committed minor offences, sometimes creating the spiral that leads whole families into not just the social work system but the criminal justice system.

Mr. McAllion: No doubt the Minister will argue—as my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) suggested—that one of the objections to the new clause is that it relates only to women prisoners. No doubt he will say that suicides occur in men's prisons as well, and of course he is right, but I agree with my hon. Friend that women are far more likely than men to turn violence against themselves.

Before I became a Member of Parliament, I spent a number of years as a teacher in a list D school in Dundee, which looked after young male offenders. In fact, the boys were aged up to 16, so perhaps they were not as young as all that. I can recall no occasion on which any of the young inmates turned violence against himself rather than the other boys—or, indeed, the staff, including me on a number of occasions. On one famous occasion, a bowl of hot soup was thrown over me.

Towards the end of my time at that school, I was transferred for some of the week to work in a list D school for girls. It was obvious to me immediately that the girls at that school—Balgay in Dundee—were prone to trying to cut their wrists and push their wrists through windows in an attempt to communicate their problems to those around them. Anyone who works with young offenders, or in the Prison Service itself, could describe such behaviour to the Minister, and I am sure that for a long time he has been advised that women prisoners are much more likely to damage themselves and commit suicide. I hope that he will take that into consideration in his reply.

Back in February 1996—at least according to a Government White Paper—random mandatory testing for drugs was introduced in Cornton Vale. That was another of the great ideas that the Secretary of State for Scotland has from time to time to show that he is a tough guy when it comes to law and order. I am sure that he sees himself as a Jimmy Cagney figure, sorting out the bad guys throughout Scotland; but most people in Scotland see him as a Baldrick figure from "Blackadder Goes Forth". Not only is he small, and not only does he look like Baldrick, but he clearly has "cunning plans" which never come off.

This plan certainly did not come off. Nearly a year later, the chief executive of the Scottish Prison Service tried to explain the spate of suicides that had taken place at Cornton Vale in the following terms: the cause, he said, was the higher rate of drug-taking by women prisoners, and the breakdown of their life style. There we have it—yet another Government initiative that has not worked. Once again, the Government are trying to respond to a crisis that was created because they had not the foresight to deal with the circumstances that were to lead to that crisis in the longer term.

When the Secretary of State for Scotland made a statement to the House on 16 January saying what he intended to do about the crisis at Cornton Vale, he made it in the form of a written answer—as is fairly usual among Scottish Office Ministers nowadays—rather than laying himself open to questions from Scottish Opposition Members. He opened that statement by saying:

"The care of prisoners and the prevention of suicide in prisoners are operational matters for the chief executive of the Scottish Prison Service".

There we have it again—the right hon. Gentleman trying to distance himself from any responsibility for what may be going on in Scottish prisons, and saying, "It is nothing to do with me, guv; it is down to the chief executive of the Scottish Prison Service. If there is anything wrong, it is his fault, not mine." That is a despicable attitude for Ministers of the Crown to take, particularly given that the chief executive, unlike hon. Members, cannot answer back to the Minister concerned and hold him to account.

Most of us would have no problem with the actual measures set out in the written answer. The right hon. Gentleman refers to "new arrangements for the induction of remand prisoners."

That is a good idea. More time out of the cell for prisoners in Cornton Vale is another good idea. He also refers to "increased access to education, physical training", and access to groups such as the Samaritans, Rape Crisis and Women's Aid. That is all good stuff. He says that extra staffing and more money—these days we do not hear about that from either side of the House—have been provided to address

"the drug-related problems experienced by a very large proportion of the prisoner population."—[Official Report, 16 January 1997; Vol. 288, c. 307.]

He also mentions additional psychiatric sessions and five additional posts for drug reduction work.

7.30 pm

That is all fine: no one complains about that. That is the sort of initiative that we want for women in Cornton Vale. The new bail hostel in Glasgow, which provides 15 beds, is another good initiative. But what about those women who are in Cornton Vale but who should not be? The Secretary of State's written answer completely ducks that question. Many women are in prison who should not be. The great thing about the new clause is the principle that there should be fewer women in prison. We should do everything in our power to stop women being sent to prison. That goes against the Government's thinking.

The Secretary of State has already boasted that he wants more offenders banged up in more prisons for a much longer time. The Scottish Prison Service has had to face an outbreak of suicides, especially at Cornton Vale, and hostage taking in male prisons. The Secretary of State faces growing discontent in the Scottish Prison Service among staff and prisoners, but his solution of banging up more people in more prisons only makes the problem worse.

The White Paper spoke about a new accommodation block in Greenock prison, which will have 60 new cells in two galleries. We were promised a new private prison at Kilmarnock—provided by and staffed by the private sector—offering another 500 places. The White Paper says that, after the election, the Government will have to contract out the construction of more prisons to other private sector providers. With all those grand plans to turn Scotland into a great prison yard, does the Minister intend to build any more prisons for women, or is Cornton Vale considered to be sufficient to cope with the demand for places for women prisoners in the future? What is the Government's thinking? Do they share the Opposition's view that we should send fewer women to prison? If they think that more and more women should be sent to prison, there are likely to be more suicides in prison.

It is ironic that, at a time when the social fabric in Scotland is being dismantled by the Government, they want to build more prisons. The social fabric is essential to the health of local communities. As schools, community centres, leisure facilities and swimming pools are taken away from local people, their communities become less welcoming, darker and much more dangerous places. The social fabric of Scotland is being torn apart, and the Government's only response is to build more prisons and to bang up more people. That will lead to the problems that we are experiencing in Cornton Vale.

It is all very well for the Minister to say that the Government have introduced a series of measures to stop drug taking inside Scottish prisons—drug taking was one of the main reasons for the suicides. Mr. Frizzell, the chief executive of the Scottish Prison Service, has spoken on the record about drug taking. An article in the press says:

"Addressing the problem of drugs in Scottish prisons, Mr. Frizzell said prisons should not be fortresses. He added: 'It would be very difficult to keep drugs out. There is a whole culture of drug-taking that is very hard to deal with.'"

Mr. Frizzell is at the cutting edge, and has to deal with situations inside prisons. He says that it cannot be stopped, but the Minister says it can. He says that for purely political reasons, because of the general election, although he knows that drug taking will continue in prisons. If it does continue, more people will be in difficulty, and more women prisoners will take their own lives.

The extra 15 beds in the bail hostel in Glasgow are welcome, but Glasgow and Edinburgh already have bail hostels, whereas there is none anywhere else in Scotland. Ministers and other hon. Members must realise that Scotland is not just the central belt or the Glasgow-Edinburgh axis: there is a large part of Scotland outside that axis which should also be taken into consideration. People from Dundee, Aberdeen, Ayrshire and elsewhere will ask where the bail hostels are for their areas. We do not want everyone to have to troop down to Glasgow or Edinburgh because there is no provision elsewhere in Scotland.

Mr. Connarty: The title of this Bill was of interest. It became known as the Dostoevsky Bill, and I said that it could be Dostoevsky's masterpiece "The Possessed". Having taken it through Committee and seen how it has come out, I think that it should rather be compared with "Charlie and the Chocolate Factory", because it is just a confection to satisfy certain cravings on the right wing of people's thoughts. Incarceration—slamming people up and making it hard on them—satisfies people's deep longing to feel more safe and secure than they feel after 17 years of Conservative Government. The Secretary of State fits my idea of a political Willy Wonka turning out sweets and casting them to all sorts of people in society to try to win them over in his favour. The Bill contains mostly bitter sweeties—as we know them in Scotland.

I hope that the Minister will take a serious look at new clause 9, because it is positive and chimes with people's concerns about crime. People also have deeper concerns about how we should treat vulnerable people—who may also be offensive towards others—as well as try to protect society from their negative influences. That is what new clause 9 is about. It calls into question the appropriateness of prisons, including Cornton Vale. Scotland has only one prison for female, long-term prisoners.

Cornton Vale prison is not the worst female prison: I have visited Holloway. It is a pity that the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East (Mr. Campbell), who spoke about Cornton Vale continuing, is not present, because I can tell him that Holloway is one of the most frightening places where any human being can be incarcerated. It was designed as a hospital and has a wing which is full of women psychiatric patients. It was like visiting Bedlam. I am glad to say that we have nothing like that in Cornton. Perhaps there is a lesson to be learned. If the clause is accepted, it could later be included in the legislation covering the rest of the United Kingdom. If it is appropriate to prevent women from going to Cornton Vale, which was designed in the 1970s, it is all the more appropriate to prevent women from being sent to the hell of Holloway prison in London, especially if they are vulnerable or known to need psychiatric treatment.

I have publicly criticised the changes that have been made at Cornton. I do not accept the excuses given for using one of the blocks for young offenders. Mixing the two regimes, even if there is a big fence between them, will heighten the inappropriateness of sending vulnerable women to Cornton Vale. The physical nature and the regime of the prison was included in the excellent inspector's report in 1996—he visited the prison between 19 and 30 May 1996. Every page of the report gives more weight to new clause 9. Given the condition of Cornton Vale in 1996, it is not a place where we should put anyone if it were inappropriate and if another form of disposal could be found.

The report was in response to three suicides. Annex 6 shows that, by the time the report was produced, there had been four suicides and three other attempted suicides—mostly by hanging. There have now been six suicides. It is worth while looking at the different sections—page 9 deals with drugs and page 10 gives an analysis of drugs. Most people who go into Cornton have had some contact with drugs. In Cornton, as in other prisons, because cannabis can be traced in the bloodstream for up to 30 days, people are switching to harder drugs, such as heroin, which is out of the bloodstream in two days. The drug regime is getting harder, and some users are becoming more determined.

Page 14 clearly shows that there is concern among the staff as well as among the prisoners about suicides. When we put vulnerable people into such pressure situations, particularly those who are on remand, it seems that women, as hon. Members have said, tend to commit self-harm. New clause 9 has a great deal of merit, because we should not place people in such establishments.

I should like to comment on the staff and their responses. My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) spoke about some of the sweeties that the Secretary of State gave people in a sudden rush. The Secretary of State, whose party has been in government for 17 years and who has represented Stirling since 1983, suddenly initiated a spate of amendments affecting the regime in that prison. The ratio of male to female staff has been increasing. The inspector found that inappropriate and something has been done about it. Bail hostels are being provided, as are regimes for dealing with drugs, and all this has been done in a rush before the election. It is all about casting sweeties to people in the hope that they will forget the massive failures in the treatment of women prisoners.

There is clearly a malaise among the staff, and it has been reported. Pages 103 and 104 of the inspector's report show that the staff complained about too little training and many staff members said that they felt extremely isolated in the prison and were undermined by the suicides. They found that the regime was inappropriate for them to create a caring atmosphere. All that strongly argues that the new clause is the most appropriate way to deal with women who do not require to be incarcerated. I hope that the Government will see the logic of that and will accept the new clause.

Dr. Godman: By way of preface to a couple of questions to the Minister and before my speech in support of the new clause, I should like to say that any soft or sentimental feelings that I had about crime or criminals were knocked out of me by my service in the Royal Military Police and as a member of the local committee of Edinburgh prison.

Is it right that recent suicides in Cornton Vale prison are far in excess of the suicide rate among women of a similar age in Scotland, whereas, however sad it may be, the incidence of suicide among male prisoners tragically reflects a growing tendency towards suicide among young, disturbed males in Scotland?

My second question relates to Cornton Vale and alternatives to it. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East (Mr. Campbell) reminded us that Cornton Vale was a replacement for Gateside prison in my constituency. A friend of my wife and myself was an officer at Gateside and Cornton Vale and said that the latter was a vast improvement on the former and that the best option would be a new prison for women. What is the Minister's view on the feasibility of a new prison for women? Perhaps he favours the dispersal of women prisoners to local male prisons. What is the attitude of the Scottish Prison Service on dispersal?

The new clause would benefit both prisoners and women prison officers. It would certainly relieve much of the strain felt by the latter in their attempts to look after the former in difficult conditions. Today a young woman whom I know and who lives in Inverclyde has been remanded on bail by a sheriff in the west of Scotland. Although the case is sub judice, I feel able to say that that sheriff made a sensible decision. On the whole, sheriffs make such decisions in bail applications by women. But we need more than the discretion of sheriffs and I support the new clause because, as I say, it will benefit women prisoners and prison officers.

As the Minister knows, there is to be yet another fatal accident inquiry into the suicide of a young person in Greenock prison. Our prison staff do a fine job in difficult conditions, but they require more resources and facilities.

Lord James Douglas–Hamilton: I pay tribute to Governor Kate Donegan. I have visited Cornton Vale, as has the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty), whom I accompanied. I have visited the prison a number of times since then, as has my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I offer my condolences to the families of those who have died, and I am concerned about the number of suicides at Cornton Vale.

Last year we announced our intention to use the empty spaces in Cornton Vale for male young offenders so as to reduce overcrowding elsewhere. That accommodation has been segregated from the rest of the establishment by a fence, but because of the current pressures on Cornton Vale, the transfer of male young offenders has been postponed for the present to allow the governor and staff to concentrate on improving the women's regime.

Mr. Connarty: Does the Minister accept that in the inspector's report the staff said that more women than they expected were under observation? They said that one of the reasons for having prisoners on the upper floors, although they would have preferred them on the lower floors, was overcrowding. At the same time, the prison wing that has been mentioned was left empty for the transfer of young offenders.

Lord James Douglas–Hamilton: I have no doubt that the governor and the chief executive of the Scottish Prison Service will take into account the needs of women in Cornton Vale and the need to avoid overcrowding, especially among vulnerable young prisoners.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) spoke about suicidal prisoners being in mental hospitals. If a medical officer considers that a prisoner requires hospital treatment, that will be arranged. However, the problem is not that simple. Some suicidal prisoners do not exhibit symptoms which cause medical concern. The Scottish Prison Service suicide prevention strategy is being revised to help staff better identify prisoners who may be at risk and the service will draw on the recommendations of reports by Professor Gunn of the Institute of Psychiatry and Dr. Power of the university of Stirling.

Courts are currently required to obtain social inquiry reports in all cases where a custodial sentence has been imposed on offenders up to and including the age of 20. Those must also be obtained when persons of 21 or over are facing a sentence of imprisonment for the first time. Some 28,000 are requested each year by the courts, at an average cost of £211 per court.

The Government and the Scottish Prison Service have implemented a range of measures to tackle these issues. We have implemented or are implementing the vast majority of the recommendations in last year's report by Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons. That move has introduced new arrangements for the induction of remand prisoners, has resulted in extra time out of cells and has increased access to education, physical training and other opportunities. Some outside agencies are now working in prisons, and remand prisoners now share a cell to encourage mutual support.

All those measures are designed to alleviate the problems that prisoners, and especially those on remand, might experience. It is by that route that action should be taken rather than by requiring courts to limit their considerations on the basis of gender. New clause 9 would fetter unduly the discretion of the courts, which already take into account the factors identified in the new clause in reaching decisions on bail. In taking those decisions, the courts must have regard to public safety and the administration of justice, and the range of penalties available for the breaching of bail orders reflects that.

The courts also have responsibility for dealing with bail offenders. We have heard Opposition proposals for tough action on bail bandits. The courts at present have the discretion available to them to refuse bail where the accused has a record of bail abuse. By limiting that discretion to instances where public safety or the interests of justice apply, the courts may not have the same freedom to remand women in custody where they consider such action to be most appropriate.

The hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) asked about the discretion of the courts. A court must grant bail unless, in the exercise of its discretionary right of refusal, it is of the opinion that, in looking to the public interest and securing the ends of justice, there is good reason why bail should not be granted. This approach applies to both men and women. I must tell the hon. Member for Dundee, East that bail beds are provided in Aberdeen and Dundee, and we expect a new hostel to open in July this year. [Interruption.] I can tell the hon. Member for Dundee, East that I do not doubt for one moment that the interests of Dundee are important.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced last week, the Government have extended the bail information scheme to include the stipendiary magistrates courts in Glasgow. We have offered £50,000 to convert properties operated by the Church of Scotland and the Scottish Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders for use as bail accommodation. Officials are discussing with Glasgow city council financial support for the addition of 15 bail bed spaces. The availability of those spaces will assist the courts in releasing an accused person on bail where the only reason for refusing bail is that the accused does not have a normal place of domicile. The hon. Member for Dundee, East will be glad to hear that similar proposals are being discussed with Dundee city council.

Much has been written recently about the link between suicides and drugs. While those who may have been taking drugs or who have life style breakdowns are susceptible to suicide, there is a range of possible explanations for the recent suicides—including depression and a lack of hope for the future on the part of the inmates. I can tell the hon. Member for Dundee, East that mandatory drug testing is providing a clearer picture of drug taking and has provided a clearer message that drug taking will not be tolerated. It is helping staff to target support measures on those prisoners who need help in tackling their drug problems. Some women prisoners have said that being placed on a testing programme has helped them resist the pressures to take drugs.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East referred to some of the measures that were announced recently, and I will not go through them again. I can tell the hon. Member for Maryhill that an independent researcher is undertaking a six-month study to obtain detailed information on the extent and type of drug and alcohol misuse among women prisoners before and after conviction. This will help to provide information to assist the targeting of resources for the future.

More funding is being made available, in addition to the extra staffing provided last year, to address the drug-related problems experienced by a large proportion of the prison population at Cornton Vale. A further addictions worker post has been approved, together with additional psychiatric sessions. Proposals from the governor to increase access to drug reduction programmes in prison and to recruit additional registered mental nurses have been approved. All of those measures will expand the programme that is in operation. Tackling drugs in prison is not the only part of the equation and, to be effective, there must be adequate through care on release. We are discussing with local authority and voluntary agencies what steps may be taken to ensure that this is available, and such discussions are going on in Glasgow.

Any suicide is a tragedy, and although the intention behind the new clause is worthy of support, we do not believe that the proposed details are appropriate for the reason that I have given—that they involve a statutory discrimination in favour of women. That runs contrary to the principle that has informed Government policy for many years—that persons should not be discriminated against because of their sex.

Mr. McFall: This useful debate has done the House proud—particularly as the Secretary of State and the Government have been strangely silent on the issue for far too long. If the debate has assisted the process of doing something regarding the position of women prisoners in Scotland, that is all the better. I thank the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) for his remarks in what has been a good debate. We are unconvinced by the Government's position. There is a gaping hole in the criminal justice system regarding women which has to be rectified, and we shall press the amendment to a vote.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

IMPRISONMENT FOR LIFE ON FURTHER CONVICTION FOR CERTAIN OFFENCES

Mr. Wallace: I beg to move amendment No. 243, in page 2, line 16, leave out from 'that' to 'may' in line 20 and insert

'it would be in the interest of justice to impose a sentence, other than the sentence required by subsection (2) above, it'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also the following amendments: No. 148, in page 2, line 17, after 'circumstances', insert

'whether relating to the offence or to the offender'.

No. 244, in clause 2, page 4, line 31, leave out from 'that' to 'may' in line 35, and insert

'it would be in the interest of justice to impose a sentence, other than the sentence required by subsection (2) above, it'.

No. 149, in page 4, line 31, after 'circumstances', insert

'whether relating to the offence or to the offender'.

No. 150, in clause 3, page 5, line 30, after 'circumstances', insert

'whether relating to the offence or to the offender'.

Mr. Wallace: The amendment would ensure that the element of discretion afforded to the judiciary in the two clauses relating to automatic and minimum sentences was concerned with the interests of justice rather than trying to find or establish exceptional circumstances.

I want something more akin to a presumptive than an automatic life sentence, because it is our contention that the provisions in the Bill as it stands amount to an unreasonable fettering of the judiciary. Our constitution, unwritten though it is, proceeds upon a separation of powers among the judiciary, the Executive and the legislature. It has always been clear that Parliament must legislate for sentences, but the Bill seems to be moving towards putting the judiciary in a sentencing straitjacket.

It is significant that in more than one of our debates today the Minister has objected to or opposed certain moves on grounds of the need to provide the judiciary with discretion. There have been newspaper reports recently that the Secretary of State is planning to introduce training for judges, but training would not be needed if the discretionary element in sentencing were removed.

In many cases in which an automatic life sentence would follow a second offence, the courts already have power to pass life sentences if they believe that the circumstances, the seriousness of the crime or the dangerous nature of the person who committed it make that appropriate. If a court has regard to all the circumstances of a case and yet believes, despite having the opportunity to pass a life sentence, that a fixed sentence is more appropriate, it would surely amount to injustice if a more harsh sentence—a life sentence—had to be passed.

From an earlier response of the Minister's, we know that there have been relatively few appeals by the Lord Advocate against a sentence that he considered too lenient. The figures in the White Paper show that, of 1,407 people convicted between 1990 and 1994 of an offence within the categories designated in the Bill, 75 per cent. received custodial sentences. The other side of that coin is that, despite the nature of the crimes, 25 per cent. of cases were regarded by the courts, when they had been made aware of the full circumstances of the offence and of the offender, as not meriting a custodial sentence. If a life sentence may have to be imposed even in circumstances in which the courts do not believe that any custodial sentence is appropriate, that can lead only to injustice.

In many of the 75 per cent. of cases to which I referred, there would be lengthy fixed sentences and the period in prison would be followed by long periods of supervision under licence, during which the offender could be recalled. I understand the Secretary of State's argument to be that prisoners would be released only on licence if a life sentence had been imposed, and that they could be recalled at any time. If reoffending is predictable and prisoners are under supervision, why is the power of recall not used even under the present system? Even with an automatic life sentence, it is quite foreseeable that the parole board would nevertheless opt for release in circumstances in which it did not predict any reoffending, and we should be in much the same position as at present.

There is a strong argument that what the Government are proposing in this exercise in machismo could weaken public protection. It could lead to an increased risk of wrongful acquittals. I will give an example of circumstances in which an acquittal might take place if an automatic life sentence loomed.

Many offences involving violence and serious violence occur within the family. That is deeply to be regretted, and it does not excuse such crimes, but the fact is that witnesses could be deterred from giving evidence if one member of the family would, on conviction, receive an automatic life sentence. Many a jury might be deterred from convicting if it believed that, in all the circumstances of the case, an automatic life sentence would be disproportionate. In many such cases, counsel representing the accused could draw to the jury's attention the consequences of a guilty verdict, and what might appear to be a shadow of a reasonable doubt might well become a substantial reasonable doubt.

Many more cases are likely to go to trial as a result of the Bill, increasing the number of victims of crime who have to go through the trauma of giving evidence. There could also be more examples of plea bargaining. One of the crimes that will lead to an automatic life sentence on a second offence is an assault

"with an intention to rape or to ravish the victim."

It is not unforeseeable that, to secure a conviction, that offence might be reduced through plea bargaining to a plea of guilty of indecent assault, with all the offence that that might cause to the victim.

The qualifying offences are full of anomalies. One is "Robbery, where at some time during the commission of the offence, the offender had in his possession a firearm or an imitation firearm."

I do not in any way seek to diminish the seriousness of such an offence, but someone who had a toy gun in the boot of a getaway car used in the commission of an offence could, if that were established, be guilty of an offence that would lead to an automatic life sentence. If, however, a combat knife had been brandished in the face the person being robbed, that would not lead to such a sentence. Such anomalies are liable to bring the law into disrepute.

The amendments also deal with drugs offences and the mandatory seven-year sentence. I have no truck with those who peddle drugs; they are some of the most evil perpetrators of crime. The right hon. Member for Fareham (Sir P. Lloyd), in discussing similar provisions for England and Wales, said:

"For example, young drug addicts who sell small quantities of drugs to other addicts will get the same sentence as professional drug pushers."—[Official Report, 19 June 1996; Vol. 279, c. 908.]

That is the sort of consequence that can arise and that will be regarded as unjust, not only by those who have to serve the sentences but by their families. It will bring the law into disrepute. Many small-time drug addicts will be less likely to co-operate with the police in assembling cases against major drug pushers if the consequence of co-operation is an automatic sentence of seven years or more.

The Minister may argue that the Government make some provision for flexibility by referring to "exceptional circumstances". The Lord Chief Justice south of the border has said that "exceptional" is a word that can be given a very narrow definition and suggested that psychiatric problems or threats of suicide may not be "exceptional circumstances". I doubt whether provocation would be regarded as an exceptional circumstance, but it has been relevant in some high-profile cases of murder and in England of manslaughter or in Scotland of culpable homicide where seriously abused wives have killed their partners. The fact that there have been so many such cases means that such circumstances are not exceptional, so courts will not be able to exercise discretion and ensure the justice that the public demand unless the discretion implicit in my amendment is accepted.

The Government introduced unit fines, but had to abandon them when the courts were obliged to levy fines that were disproportionate to the offences committed.

[Mr. Wallace]

If the Bill becomes law, I predict that within months there will be a public outcry about an automatic life sentence which will be regarded as manifestly unjust.

I conclude with the words of the 1990 White Paper, "Crime, Justice and Protecting the Public", which stated:

"The Government rejects a rigid statutory framework, on the lines of those introduced in the United States, or a system of minimum or mandatory sentences for certain offences. This would make it more difficult to sentence justly in exceptional cases."

In times past, the Government recognised the strength of the arguments against what they propose in the Bill. One can only conclude that with a general election looming they would rather be seen as tough on crime than as having a proper regard for the best interests of a civilised and just criminal justice system.

Mr. McFall: I commend the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) for his eloquence and agree with much of what he said. We raised these issues in detail with the Minister in Committee.

On "exceptional circumstances", I refer the Minister to the debate in Committee on the Crime (Sentences) Bill, when the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence) said:

"The words 'exceptional circumstances' will present an immediate and fundamental problem for the courts. We cannot foresee the problems that many phrases will cause. Had we foreseen problems with some phrases, we would have acted at the appropriate time. However, we can clearly foresee a problem with the phrase 'exceptional circumstances'."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 12 November 1996; c. 22.]

We pressed the Minister on that point in Committee, but he said that he did not wish to limit judicial discretion. He made that comment immediately after limiting the judicial discretion with mandatory sentences. The problem of "exceptional circumstances" remains to be cleared up. It is not enough for the Government to say that it is up to the judge to decide what are exceptional circumstances if they are not laid out in the Bill. The Government say that it is a matter for judicial discretion, but if that is so, why was judicial discretion taken away in the first instance?

In Committee the Minister said that he did not want to define "exceptional circumstances" because it would limit judges' discretion. However, this aroused concern even among Conservative Members, such as the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), who asked whether "exceptional circumstances" applied to the prior qualifying offence or only to the offence under consideration.

The hon. Member for Perth and Kinross (Ms Cunningham) suggested that judges would be loth to define "exceptional circumstances" because they would be open to the right of appeal and their decisions might be challenged on appeal. There was much concern about that problem, not least from the Law Society of Scotland. It is incumbent on the Minister to explain the Government's thinking on "exceptional circumstances". For the life of me, I cannot understand why the Government are reluctant to elaborate.

The Pepper v. Hart case in 1992 meant that courts and others outside Parliament could refer to our debates to understand the intention of legislation. It is important to make the intention clear. I ask the Minister to address that and to ensure that he gives a satisfactory response; otherwise, judges will keep to the status quo and make no comment. The Government's aim in the Bill will thus not be realised, and I trust that he does not want that.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In answer to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), I believe that the number of appeals made by Law Officers against too lenient sentences is in the region of 15.

Amendments Nos. 243 and 244 concern the circumstances in which courts may exercise their discretion not to impose an automatic life sentence or a minimum of seven years imprisonment for a third or subsequent conviction for class A drug trafficking offences. The amendments would seriously undermine the purpose of the Bill, which is to protect the public from violent or serious sex offenders and recidivist drug dealers. They would replace the "exceptional circumstances" test in relation to the court's discretion not to impose an automatic life or minimum mandatory sentence with a different and much wider test. The exceptional circumstances test would allow the courts to impose a different sentence only where unusual circumstances exist.

The purpose of clauses 1 and 2 is that life sentences or custodial sentences of seven years or more should be imposed as a matter of course in the generality of the cases; otherwise, they will not have the desired protective and deterrent effect. The tests proposed in the amendments go far beyond that by, for example, allowing the courts to impose a different sentence if they think that it would be anomalous to impose a minimum sentence. They might allow a judge not to impose a minimum sentence in a case in which he would otherwise have been minded to impose a different penalty. That would make nonsense of clauses 1 and 2.

Clause 1 deals with criminals who have already been convicted of serious offences such as rape, or of robbery with a firearm, but go on to commit a further such offence. Such criminals have shown by the nature of their offences and by their inability to desist that they are a threat to public safety. Only automatic life sentences can deal satisfactorily with the risks that they pose to society.

Clause 2 deals with drug dealers convicted of a third or further class A drug trafficking offence. We believe that not to impose a severe determinate sentence on such persons would not provide the protection that the wider community deserves from such people.

Mr. Wallace: If I follow the Minister's argument, will he say whether he thinks that I am offering a fair summation of it? Judges have immense experience and are paid substantial salaries to exercise their judicial discretion. As a result of the Government's proposals, they may have to impose sentences that are harsher than they believe to be necessary in the circumstances. Does the Minister believe that that is justice?

8.30 pm

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I believe that the public deserve the additional protections that automatic life sentences would give in the case of repeat offenders. That would be particularly relevant in cases such as that of Maguire, who would have been caught by an automatic life sentence the second time he offended.

Mr. McFall: I should like to add to the question just posed by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland about judicial discretion. The Minister has cited the exercise of such discretion in exceptional circumstances, but has not allowed for it in the case of mandatory sentences. Is he saying that he does not trust judges and that there have been problems in the past as a result of their decisions?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am not saying that. We believe that the clauses should necessarily provide a discretion for a different sentences to be imposed when there are exceptional circumstances. I am content to leave that discretion to the courts. I have no doubt that the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland could argue eloquently in court if he believed that exceptional circumstances existed. In my view, the right balance has been struck and to go further would undermine the effectiveness of clauses 1 and 2.

By singling out particular circumstances, we do not wish to fetter the courts' discretion to decide what are exceptional circumstances and how they should be weighed. I therefore ask the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland to seek leave to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Wallace: The Minister's reply comes as no real surprise to me, as we are all aware that the Government are going through a window-dressing exercise in trying to appear tough on crime. I do not believe that the proposals will have the effect in practice that the Minister pleads for them.

I have already said that, if a prisoner who has been released on licence under supervision ought to be recalled, then he should be recalled. Equally, if there is an omission to recall him on the basis that he is likely to reoffend, it is equally likely that he will be released by the Parole Board with the consent of the Secretary of State and then reoffend. I do not believe that the Government's proposals would provide the type of safety for the public that the Minister says that they will deliver.

The Minister has completely overlooked the fact that discretion is already exercised by judges to impose a life sentence where they think that there is a strong likelihood that a person will reoffend due to his dangerous proclivities. The Minister has outlined circumstances in which judges and the courts will be obliged to mete out sentences harsher than those that judges' long judicial experience lead them to believe it would be in the interests of justice to deliver.

The Bill may give the Government a few cheap headlines in the weeks running up to the election, but I fear that the consequences in the medium term—and possibly in the short term—will be a series of high-profile cases which will show that what has been done by the Government is ludicrous. Sentences will be imposed that bear no proportion to the crime committed. That will bring our criminal law into disrepute and will undermine the thrust to tackle crime. I therefore insist on pressing the amendment to a vote.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Roger Knapman and
Mr. Gyles Brandreth.

Question accordingly negatived.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 3, line 13, at end insert—

'3A. Clandestine injury to women or an attempt to cause such injury.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 125 and 3.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Amendment No. 1 fulfils a Government undertaking given in Committee to accept in principle an amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Perth and Kinross (Ms Cunningham), which sought to add "clandestine injury" to the list of offences that could on conviction lead to an automatic life sentence. It differs from that amendment only by giving the offence its full name and by providing for the inclusion in the list of convictions for an attempt to commit the offence as well as for the offence itself. Amendment No. 3 is consequential on amendment No. 1

Amendment No. 125 is a response to comments made by Opposition Members in Committee, but in this case in relation to the list of offences contained in what is now clause 44. Amendment No. 125 would remove the words "towards a child" from the description of lewd and libidinous practices, and is paralleled by Government amendment 94.

Mr. McFall: I thank the Minister for listening to the views of Opposition Members in Committee and tabling the amendment. It is important that the crime of clandestine injury is included. Similarly, I thank the Minister for listening to our views on the definition of offences perpetrated against children. The Opposition are content with the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 125, in page 3, leave out lines 31 and 32 and insert—

'8. Lewd, indecent or libidinous behaviour or practices.'.— [Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

MINIMUM SENTENCE FOR THIRD CONVICTION OF CERTAIN OFFENCES RELATING TO DRUG TRAFFICKING

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 91, in page 4, line 6, leave out 'this section' and insert

'section 2 of the Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Act 1997'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 92, 228 to 231, 256, 42, 43, 235, 257, 258, 98, 104, 236, 237, 83 to 85, 87, 100, 101, 88 and 89.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: These are minor technical and drafting amendments.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 92, in page 4, line 14, leave out 'this section' and insert

'section 2 of the Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Act 1997'.— [Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

'(2) In section 196 of the 1995 Act (sentence following guilty plea)—

(a) the existing words shall become subsection (1); and

(b) at the end there shall be added the following subsection—

"(2) Where the court is passing sentence on an offender under section 205B(2) of this Act and that offender has pled guilty to the offence for which he is being so sentenced, the court may, after taking into account the matters mentioned in paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (1) above, pass a sentence of less than seven years imprisonment or, as the case may be, detention but any such sentence shall not be of a term of imprisonment or period of detention of less than five years, two hundred and nineteen days.".'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 31, 255 and 32.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Amendments Nos. 2, 31 and 32 deal with the ability of the court to take into account a plea of guilty, and the stage in proceedings and circumstances in which it is made, in determining what sentence to pass under clauses 1 and 2.

What is now section 196 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 makes it clear that the court is able to take into account a plea of guilty in determining what sentence to pass on, or other disposal or order to make in relation to an offender. That operates as a disincentive to postponing a guilty plea until the day of the trial, to the great inconvenience of witnesses, police and jurors. It also acknowledges the possibility that a guilty plea may be regarded as a mitigating factor in sentencing, because it may imply an acceptance of responsibility and contrition on the part of the offender and may spare the victim and other witnesses from having to give evidence.

On further consideration, it appears that the provisions of section 196 of the 1995 Act may not apply to sentences imposed under clauses 1 and 2 as drafted. Although those clauses provide for automatic life and mandatory minimum sentences, there is no reason in our view why the court should not be able to take into account a guilty plea where those sentences would apply on conviction. The amendments would ensure that that is possible.

Dr. Godman: The Minister spoke of contrition and how that may assist the courts. I have no doubt about that. However, what about a case involving severe sexual assault? I hope that no leniency would be shown in such a case, no matter when the accused agreed to plead guilty.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has raised that issue. It is important to spare the victim the trauma of having to go through a case and have every sort of falsehood thrown at her. She may dissolve in tears—I have seen it happen. We are saying that, if the accused shows contrition by pleading guilty at an early stage and therefore does not put the victim through the process of having to put up with a great deal of abuse and falsehood in court, that is a factor that the court legitimately should be entitled to take into account.

Mr. Wallace: What consideration have the Minister and his colleagues given to the opinion of the recently retired Lord Justice-Clerk Ross, in the case of Strawhorn and McLeod, about inducements to plead guilty at an early stage?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I would not describe the measure as an inducement to plead guilty. I believe that it could be taken into account as a mitigating factor—which is rather different—if the accused faced up to his responsibility and, instead of making false accusations against a victim, did not put her through that trauma. A court should be entitled to take that into account. As I said, section 196 of the 1995 Act makes it clear that the court is able to take into account a plea of guilty in determining the appropriate sentence. After all, if a person who has committed a very serious crime tells a pack of lies, that is a different situation from that of a person who admits his transgressions and shows some contrition.

Clause 3

IMPOSITION OF SUPERVISED RELEASE ORDERS ON CONVICTION OF QUALIFYING OFFENCE

Amendment made: No. 3, in page 5, line 43, after 'paragraphs 3,' insert '3A,'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 4, in page 6, line 10, leave out 'one sixth' and insert 'one quarter'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 238 and 240.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Amendment No. 4 will increase the maximum period of supervision that courts may impose for offenders released from prison to the greater of two years or one quarter of the sentence. That corresponds to a similar amendment incorporated in the Crime (Sentences) Bill in respect of offenders in England and Wales. It is in response to concerns expressed by both sides of the House that the limit of one sixth presently contained in the Bill may not be sufficient to provide adequate safeguards for the protection of the public.

"(b) notwithstanding (a) above, in relation to a probation order with an additional restriction of liberty requirement—

(i) evidence of the presence or absence of the offender at a particular place at a particular time may, subject to the provisions of this section, be given by the production of a document or documents bearing to be—

(a) a statement automatically produced by a device specified in regulations made under section 229C of this Act, by which the offender's whereabouts were remotely monitored; and

(b) a certificate signed by the person responsible for monitoring the order that the statement relates to the whereabouts of the person subject to the order at the dates and times shown in the statement;

(ii) the statement and certificate mentioned in sub–paragraph (i) above shall, when produced at a hearing, be sufficient evidence of the facts set out in them;

(iii) neither the statement nor the certificate mentioned in sub–paragraph (i) above shall be admissible in evidence unless a copy of both has been served on the offender prior to the hearing and, without prejudice to the foregoing, where it appears to the court that the offender has had insufficient notice of the statement or certificate, it may adjourn a hearing or make any order which it thinks appropriate in the circumstances.".'.

No. 219, in schedule 1, page 71, line 45, at end insert—

'(21A) In Schedule 6 (discharge of and amendment to probation orders) there shall be inserted after sub–paragraph 3(2) (c) a new sub–paragraph as follows:—

"(d) so that the probationer is thereby subject to a restriction of liberty requirement for any period or periods exceeding 12 months in all.".'.

Mr. McFall: We want restriction of liberty orders not to stand alone but to be part of the probation and supervision process, together with social inquiry reports. That will enable us to focus on the right people.

The research to date shows that such targeting is essential. As it stands, it is not clear from the Bill whom the provision is directed at, and whether it is to apply in solemn, summary or district courts. Experience world-wide with tagging is varied. Sweden has used it perhaps the most successfully. The Swedish experience shows that success is more likely if tagging is used for a very short period; if it is part of a treatment programme; and if the person concerned enjoys a stable environment and has the will to go along with the tagging.

Amendment No. 136 would allow the High Court, the sheriff court and the district court to make restriction of liberty orders in a wide variety of circumstances. There is currently no guidance on which offenders or offences should be the target of such orders. The Bill merely states that they should be used when the court deems them the most appropriate method of disposal.

On Second Reading, the Secretary of State and the Minister of State frequently reiterated their intentions. Such orders are best used when the alternative would be a short period of custody. In Committee, we pressed the Minister on that; if tagging is to be used, then it should be used as an alternative to custody when the judge or sheriff states that someone who would otherwise be given a gaol sentence may be given a tagging order instead—we want the orders restricted to that.

As I said, the Bill gives no guidance to the judiciary or to sheriffs. We therefore conclude that it is untargeted and that it will cause confusion about the purpose of the disposal. Moreover, the Bill contradicts the Government's attempts to achieve greater consistency in sentencing. Linking a restriction of liberty order with a probation order will ensure a proper assessment by means of a mandatory social inquiry report. That will facilitate the targeting of the disposal, in the interests of the community, the offender and the offender's family, in such a way as to advance the prospects of successful compliance.

Research in the United States and Sweden has shown that electronic monitoring is most likely to succeed when it is attached to a programme of probation or supervision. In that way, surveillance is supported by constructive intervention designed to reduce offending behaviour. Electronic monitoring by itself would preclude the regular personal supervision that could deal with offending behaviour. Public safety—the theme of all our amendments and new clauses—will be enhanced by the dual approval of monitoring and direct supervision.

Linking restriction of liberty with probation ensures public and democratic accountability. The supervising officer will be accountable to the local authority as well as to the court and, through the Secretary of State, to Parliament. In that way, the disposal will be free of commercial considerations.

I wonder how much notice the Secretary of State has taken of the international experience of tagging, which is used in New Zealand, Singapore and other places that I mentioned earlier. Of the pilot schemes operated in Sweden, the Netherlands, America and Western Australia, the Swedish experiment seems to be the most successful. It combines electronic monitoring with intensive supervision and was initially operated in six probation districts. Offenders sentenced to up to two months in prison are allowed to apply to serve their sentence in the community under intensive supervision and with electronic monitoring. They must be of fixed abode, have a telephone, and be in employment or education.

Between 1 August 1994 and 31 July 1995, 637 offenders were eligible under those criteria and nearly 70 per cent. of them applied for the project. A total of 396 applications were approved; 50 per cent. were drink drivers; 20 per cent. were violent offenders, often committing drink and drug-related offences; and 30 per cent. were convicted of other offences, including theft and refusing to do military service. By the end of the period, 311 people had completed their supervision satisfactorily; 23 offenders had had their supervision terminated by reason of misconduct; and 62 were still under suspension.

The Swedish scheme is considered to be a moderate success and has been expanded to include anyone serving three months anywhere in the country, although the maximum tagged period is expected to be four months. However, the level of technical faults was much higher than expected and the issue of false violations has still not been resolved.

Experience is much more plentiful in America, where about 600 schemes operate. Although I hold the Minister to his remark in Committee that this will be a pilot scheme, lessons could be learned from the American experience, about which a six-year study has been made. It suggests that one main reason for failure was lack of staff resources in the probation service. Even one of the manufacturers was reported to have said:

"reliable equipment alone will not ensure a successful programme".

He asserted:

"The involvement of professional social workers is key."

The success of the schemes that have been running was said to involve the following components: first, clear, well-defined objectives for using the system; secondly, strong involvement and support from the probation and parole service; thirdly, careful screening of the participants using well-defined selection criteria; fourthly, the provision of support programmes; fifthly, strong Government commitment; and, sixthly, reliable equipment. Neither the Minister nor the Secretary of State commented on any of those issues on Second Reading or in Committee. If the Government are to go ahead with such a scheme, it is important that those objectives are laid out, and this is where they should be debated.

There seems to be some evidence about the likely criteria for success. That is important when it comes to targeting the type of individuals whom the Government would like to see on an electronic tagging programme. Offenders must have a settled address with a telephone installed. They should be employed. Tags should not be used for any offender with a history of violence in the household, and tagging works best for offenders "who already have some internal control and just need an extra nudge".

Those criteria are supported by the Swedish findings, where three criteria for success emerged. Tagging works only if it is for a very short period, the offenders are well motivated and in stable life situations, and tagging is part of a treatment programme.

I hope that the Minister of State will address his remarks to those findings. If he tells us that the measure is being introduced in the dying weeks of a Parliament just for the sake of introducing it, that is not good enough. The measure must be shown to have merit.

The Secretary of State turns his nose up. No information has been forthcoming from the Government about the target population, what they hope to achieve, who will be involved and what resources will be made available to the service—the building blocks fundamental to the success of the programme.

[Mr. McFall]

The Opposition tabled amendments in Committee to ensure that there would be a supervisory element and a probationary aspect to the programme. With that in mind, I invite the Minister to comment.

9.15 pm

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Opposition's amendments Nos. 128 to 131, 136 and 137, to which the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) spoke, and the other amendments would unhelpfully limit the use of electronically monitored restriction of liberty requirements, so that in Scotland such an order could be made only as a condition of a probation order.

Our proposals would allow a court to deal with an offender by making a restriction of liberty order alone, or by making a restriction of liberty order together with a probation order. The Opposition amendments would withdraw the first of those options. As a consequence, a court would not be able to make a free-standing restriction of liberty order, even if it considered that to be the most appropriate option. That would be hard to justify, and I would not recommend accepting those amendments to clause 4.

I shall deal now with the Government amendments in the group. As was said in Committee, in some cases the effectiveness of electronically monitored disposals may be enhanced if they are associated with the sort of supervision offered by probation. On that basis, the Bill provides for a facility which enables a probation order to be associated with a restriction of liberty order. Government amendments clarify how that facility will operate.

Mr. Davidson: The amendments moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) are useful, as they strike at the centre of the Government's proposal by probing the way in which the Government intend to use restriction of liberty orders.

The Minister's response to my hon. Friend's excellent argument suggested that orders made without probation will be a cheap way of dealing with someone who should be punished by being sent to prison. In those circumstances, a restriction of liberty order without supervision misses the point.

I recognise that the clause goes beyond the idea of electronic tagging. Under subsection (2)(b), for example, a person could be instructed not to attend football matches, if he had been convicted of an offence arising from his attendance at such a match. Clearly, electronic tagging would not be suitable in those circumstances. That person should not simply be left and trusted not to go to matches. Provision should be made for some form of probation or supervision, to ensure that the restriction is not seen as a soft option. There is genuine anxiety that, if restriction of liberty orders are unpoliced, they will be seen as a soft option.

Does the Minister accept my hon. Friend's contention, arising from practice elsewhere, that success is likely where the restriction is for a short period, and where the person concerned is well motivated? Other evidence suggests that restriction of liberty works best if the person is in a job and if the restriction is part of a comprehensive treatment programme. The order seems tailor-made for many middle-class people. Is it intended to distribute restriction of liberty orders evenly throughout the population, or will certain social criteria be taken into consideration?

We have already discussed the increasing number of women who experience serious difficulties in prison. I think that restriction of liberty orders may represent a reasonable alternative to imprisonment in some circumstances, depending on the nature of the offence. People would require a degree of supervision—perhaps they should have some form of probation—but the Minister did not touch upon that aspect. I ask him to clarify those points in his response.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am glad that the hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Davidson) supports restriction of liberty orders—as he has done more than once before. I make it clear that we are particularly guided by the experience of the pilot scheme in England, which has proved a success. The technology is seen to be reliable and it has worked effectively. The courts have made extensive use of the option and we can see no case for denying it to Scottish courts. Of course, there will be a pilot scheme and, depending on how it works, the option could be extended more widely thereafter.

The Opposition amendments would make a restriction of liberty requirement a condition of a probation order instead of a discrete disposal. While I do not object to considering that approach in the longer term, it raises some practical issues that must be resolved beforehand. I shall examine them quickly.

First, an issue arises because responsibility for supervising a probation order rests with a local authority officer while responsibility for the electronic monitoring of any restriction of liberty condition would rest with a person nominated by the Secretary of State. Therefore, in fulfilling his duty to supervise a probation order, the local authority officer would have to rely on someone over whom he had little direct control to monitor one of its conditions.

Mr. McFall: Could not the Secretary of State nominate a local authority officer?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: We would first have to assess and evaluate the success of the pilot scheme—which is what we intend to do. My second point is that evaluation will be extremely difficult. It may be difficult to ascertain whether any shortcomings are due to electronically monitored requirements or to the general order. I believe that it is necessary to proceed as I have recommended.

Amendment made: No. 105, in page 6, line 20, after '(1)' insert

'Without prejudice to section 245CC of this Act,'.—[Mr. Carrington.]

Amendment proposed: No. 245, in page 6, line 20, leave out

'of 16 years of age or more'.—[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 246 to 250, 252 and 253.

Mr. Wallace: I shall resume my seat if I have the wrong amendment. Amendment No. 245 would delete the reference to persons of 16 years and over, which would have the effect of extending the tagging provisions to those aged under 16. I find it absolutely extraordinary that a measure that has received considerable publicity and marks an important departure in the treatment of juveniles in Scotland should be moved formally by the Minister without any attempt to justify the measure to the House. It is quite extraordinary behaviour from the Minister.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: If the hon. Gentleman will sit down, I shall happily explain exactly what it means and then he may resume his speech.

Mr. Wallace: I rather suspect that you would rule that out of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as the intervention would be too long. Nevertheless, the fact remains that the Minister has moved a major amendment formally.

I shall explain briefly why my party opposes the measure. As I understand it, the option of tagging children under 16 will be available only to the courts. The Minister assured the Committee that the electronic tagging exercise would be run as a pilot scheme, but at the same time as running a pilot scheme, he is trying to extend its provision.

More seriously, in Scotland we have a distinctive scheme of juvenile justice, in which the overwhelming number of young offenders are referred to a children's hearing. Only a handful of those under 16—no doubt the Minister will be able to give us the figure—have been referred to the criminal courts in recent years. I have strong doubts that electronic tagging is an appropriate disposal for those whose offences are such that it is thought right to determine them in the criminal courts rather than the children's hearing system.

We are embarking on a costly scheme for children under 16 when a pilot scheme is still in operation. I suspect that it is being implemented where it is most inappropriate, and the Minister has not given any explanation. We look forward to hearing one.

That is the pattern of so much of the Bill—it has been done to give the Secretary of State a cheap headline. It sounds as though he is tough, but in this case he has misread the situation and is trying to introduce electronic tagging in cases for which it is wholly inappropriate. I look forward with interest to hearing how the Minister tries to justify the proposals, when he finally gets round to doing so. He will need a good argument to persuade us that the proposals are appropriate and amount to anything more than an exercise in window dressing.

Mrs. Fyfe: I agree whole-heartedly with the comments of the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace). Government amendment No. 247 says:

"the court shall obtain and consider information about that offender's family circumstances" before making a restriction of liberty order. Would that include finding out whether the offender had younger siblings who were likely to admire the older brother or sister for having such an imposition placed on them and might look up to them as a hero because of that mark of distinction? I wonder whether such information on an offender's family circumstances might include the attitude of his schoolfellows. The same problems might apply to them.

As has been said already, the measure has attracted widespread publicity. Senior police officers have said that they find it wholly objectionable and impractical and that being tagged could result in some young ne'er-do-weels having more street cred. It is remarkable that the Minister should move the amendment formally without any word of explanation.

Mr. Wallace: The hon. Lady and I, together with the Minister, sat on a Committee considering the Children (Scotland) Bill two years ago. The Committee took evidence and sat for many weeks considering appropriate measures for young children. Does the hon. Lady recall—I certainly do not—any suggestion by the Government that such a measure was appropriate or necessary?

Mrs. Fyfe: The hon. Gentleman has raised an interesting point, and he is correct. At no time was it suggested that this was an appropriate course of action for under-16 offenders. The Committee was united in welcoming the fact that the hearing system had worked so effectively over the years and, as the hon. Gentleman has just pointed out, few cases involving under-16s were considered serious enough to be dealt with in a court. The relevance of the amendment is highly questionable.

With such widespread critical comment on the proposals, including from the police, why is the Minister pursuing the amendment? In particular, given that we have agreed that a pilot scheme should go ahead in relation to adult offenders, what is the purpose of opposing such a scheme for under-16s? Are the Government waiting to see the outcome of the other scheme?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) raised the objections of the police to extension of the scheme to children's panels. We listened to the responses, and we are not doing that. We believe that electronically monitored disposals will provide a useful means of dealing with offenders. The Bill currently limits the use of such disposals to offenders aged at least 16. We considered that we should also examine the potential in relation to younger offenders.

In November, we issued a consultation paper seeking views on that, specifically in the context of our children's hearing system. The consultation period ended on 4 January, with most respondents expressing reservations about the use of electronic monitoring by children's hearings. Various reasons were given. It was suggested that such a disposal would be out of keeping with the ethos of the hearing system, for example, and that it should be piloted with adult offenders in the criminal justice system first. We took account of the views, and of the fact that, even if given the power, hearings would probably make little use of it until its value had been proven in the criminal justice system. We therefore concluded that the Bill should not make electronically monitored disposals available to children's hearings.

9.30 pm

Mr. Dalyell: I feel that it behoves those of us who did not serve on the Committee to be a bit reticent at this stage of the Bill's passage, but may I ask what advice the Government are receiving from the police?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I understand that the police were reserved about the extension of the power to children's panels. The responses were overwhelmingly opposed to it, and we listened to those responses. It has been suggested—by, for instance, the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall)—that relatively few people under 16 would come before the courts, and, in fact, that is so. In 1994, only 171 young offenders had a charge proved against them in court. Nevertheless, in some such cases, the courts might consider an electronically monitored restriction of liberty order—perhaps in conjunction with a probation order—to be an appropriate disposal, for example in the case of a football hooligan or a persistent shoplifter.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Will the Minister tell us in a little more detail the exact nature of most of the cases that were taken to a juvenile court rather than a children's panel? The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) made a good point: he said that it seemed to him that any case that was referred to a court rather than a children's panel was likely to involve an offence to which a restriction of liberty order would not be appropriate.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: That is not necessarily so. The cases that go before the court are the more serious—

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: Will the Minister give way?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Let me finish. I have not had a chance to answer the question.

It may well be that, for a football hooligan, a person who has committed an assault in certain circumstances or a persistent shoplifter, a restriction of liberty order, coupled with a probation order, might be more appropriate than prison. We consider that that option should be available. We think that a pilot scheme is the correct way to proceed, and that such a scheme should be properly evaluated and assessed in due course.

Mr. McFall rose—

Mr. Wallace rose—

Ms Cunningham rose—

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I give way to the hon. Member for Dumbarton.

Mr. McFall: I thank the Minister.

The Minister referred to the 171 children under 16 against whom a charge had been proved. He knows that 25 of those were detained, and that 46 cases were admitted to children's hearings. The penalty in most of the remaining 100 cases was split between probation, in 32 cases; financial penalties, in 30 cases; and caution and admonition, in 32 cases. Only a small number of young people—25—went to court. Does the Minister agree that those would be very serious offenders, and that tagging would therefore be inappropriate? I am perplexed about why the Government introduced such a measure, and the statistics make their case even weaker.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I merely suggest that the option should be available to the courts. I cannot conceive of all the circumstances that will arise, but it is a useful option. The hon. Member for Dumbarton said that young persons should not be sent to prison for fine default, for example, but should have the option to serve non-custodial sentences in the community.

Ms Cunningham rose—

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I must proceed and spell out our intentions.

We have decided that courts should be able to use restriction of liberty orders for young offenders whom they sentence. Although that group of people may be small in number, they are often guilty of particularly serious offences that seriously disrupt the lives of people in their communities. I accept that, in some cases, their offences will definitely warrant a custodial sentence. In other cases, it may be preferable to confine them to their homes and to use electronic monitoring to ensure that they stay there.

If a young offender is confined to his home, and that confinement is monitored rigorously by electronic means, he cannot be out on the streets disrupting the community by serious acts of violence or dishonesty. It may also help the young offender to break free from the malevolent influence of older offenders with whom he has been mixing.

Some Opposition parties are not enthusiastic about the use of electronic monitoring, especially for young offenders: objections to it have been made throughout the passage of the Bill. Indeed, the Opposition objected on Second Reading, and their objections lay at the heart of the reasoned amendment that would have killed the Bill stone dead. We do not want to deny the courts the option of tagging when dealing with young offenders who commit serious and disruptive crimes. Such a disposal could provide a measure of protection to the public, enabling the offender to address the offending behaviour without having to resort to a custodial disposal. We believe that that would be a useful option in some cases, and I commend the Government's amendments to the House.

Ms Cunningham: I was trying to intervene on the Minister to ask him to tell us how many of the 171 young offenders to whom he referred will be affected by the proposal. If only 25 of that 171 end up in court, how many of that 25 will be affected? Are we talking about two or three individuals next year? Is that what it is all about? The people of Scotland have a right to know that the Government, while supposedly making some wonderful gesture for the future of criminal justice, are in reality introducing a proposal that will affect only two or three of that 25. I want a direct response to my question.

It is interesting that the Government have introduced the Bill supposedly in response to a consultation process. The proposal has met with widespread opposition from children's agencies, local authorities and the police, but the Minister has not mentioned that. The Scottish Child Law Centre considers that one of the main problems of the scheme is that it is not based on an understanding of children's offending behaviour. A spokesperson for the centre said:

"Children's offending can often be linked to difficult circumstances at home, possibly even involving abuse. . . Giving parents a key role in enforcing compliance with the scheme may be tying the child to an abusive relationship which could be the whole reason behind the offending."

We must deal with that issue.

Mrs. Fyfe: The hon. Lady has raised an important point. Not a minute ago, the Minister said that tagging could ensure that the child stayed at home, which is precisely where abuse, if there is any, is likely to take place.

Ms Cunningham: The hon. Lady is right. The child's home may be the problem, but the Minister does not address that issue. Branding children in that way may make it much more difficult for them to change and to learn from their mistakes.

I should like to hear the Minister address the issues that have been raised by the police. I understand that they expressed concern that, obversely, the tags may be a status symbol for some children and will have the opposite effect to the one claimed by the Minister. Did the police say that? If the potential for encouraging disruptive behaviour presented by such a status symbol is enough for the police to express concern, why are the Government pressing on with the measure?

In Committee, the Minister said that there must be consultation about young persons and added that he had nothing further to say other than that he would assess the responses. From what he has said in today's debate, instead of assessing the responses, he has ignored them, and that is not a responsible way for the Government to behave. I hope that the Minister will deal directly with the issues and give direct answers to questions.

Mr. Davidson: The Minister asks the House to support the amendment, but, given the nature of past discussions, we are entitled to ask for clarification of the offences that he thinks might be suitable for disposal by tagging. I am no clearer than when the Minister opened the debate what offences he has in mind and how many young people he envisages under the existing pattern of offending will be affected by such a method of disposal.

I was interested in what the Minister said about youngsters who disrupt life in their communities. I can understand why he thinks that tagging, presumably along the lines of some sort of curfew order, might be appropriate. If that is what he has in mind, he should spell out the procedure by which it would be deemed suitable for a youngster to be placed under such a curfew order in one area rather than another. Perhaps such curfew orders are not the sort of procedure to which the Minister thinks tagging orders might apply.

The Government seek cheap headlines by wanting to be seen to be tough on crime by young people, but they are not dealing seriously with the problems that are faced by young people, or with the scale of the difficulties. In my area, a number of young people engage in repeated acts of burglary. They break and enter garden sheds, destroy gardens and break greenhouses and so on. I am not sure how the possibility of a tagging order would deter or prevent someone from destroying greenhouses or breaking into houses.

How would it work in practice? Many burglaries take place at night or during the day when youngsters have absconded from school. Would such offences be the subject of a tagging order? If not, what sort of offences would be involved?

Some youngsters in my area have repeatedly caused damage costing enormous sums by simply going along the side of a school and smashing every window in sight. They similarly destroy the windows in community centres. The Secretary of State nods. He obviously understands the situation. How would the introduction of tagging affect offenders of that sort?

The police spent a great deal of time trying to catch some youngsters in my area. They were eventually caught and taken to an institution, from which they repeatedly absconded because it was not secure. There were not enough places in secure establishments for those youngsters to be detained. The Government have not proposed an increase in spending on secure units for young people, but are instead going for the cheap gimmick of tagging rather than seriously addressing the difficulties. Considerable police time is wasted chasing youngsters who abscond from non-secure establishments, and it greatly undermines the credibility of the police and the system in general when youngsters are seen to be back out on the street a short time after they have been disposed of by the court.

Mrs. Fyfe: Has my hon. Friend noticed that Government amendment No. 246 sets time limits on the tagging? Those time limits may be a response to the critical comments that have been heard on the subject in the past few months. But if they are imposed—regardless of whether there has been any change for the better in the behaviour of the young person—the whole system will have been brought into total disrepute, as any punitive system, whether in schools or elsewhere, must be aimed at changing behaviour.

Mr. Davidson: That excellent point is well made by my hon. Friend, and I look forward to hearing the Minister's response. All the evidence we have heard of on how tagging dealt with adults elsewhere suggested that the period of tagging should be short, that the people involved should be well motivated, and that tagging should be part of a comprehensive pattern of treatment.

The difficulty with many of the youngsters to whom we are referring is that they are extremely badly motivated and anti-social. I am not convinced that tagging will work with the worst of youngsters—if I can use that term—who will have been before the courts for the worst of offences. I do not know how something that may be seen as a relatively soft option will help in those circumstances.

Colleagues have asked whether tagging will effectively stigmatise or brand the youngsters. Branding seems to me to be a trifle severe, and I presume that that was not a serious suggestion. However, I recognise that tagging might well become a status symbol, and I am not clear whether the Government have taken that into account. The Minister has not referred to it, but he must be aware that many youngsters dare each other to go further and further down the anti-social route. It can be a case of, "You break one window and I'll break two. You break two and I'll break three." How will the Government overcome the problem that tagging will be seen as a mark of honour or achievement?

The Minister must be aware many parents in the community are not worried by the anti-social behaviour of youngsters, but—in some circumstances—see it as a badge of manhood. I am aware of youngsters who are encouraged in anti-social behaviour against other families in the area by their parents, who are engaged in a vendetta by proxy. The adults are well aware that gaol sentences could be imposed upon them were they to act as their youngsters do. What is there in the Government's proposals to deal with that?

The Government's proposal is designed to look good in the press, but it does not seriously address the real difficulties posed by a minority of extremely anti-social youngsters. If the Secretary of State wants to consider a method of restricting liberty, he should—rather than look to the new Tory symbol of tagging—go back to an old Tory symbol of penal servitude, the ball and chain, which at least would restrict youngsters and prevent them from running about the community. I look forward to the Secretary of State using that old Tory proposal as part of his general election manifesto.

Mr. Dalyell: I am extremely puzzled by this discussion, and I want to ask the Minister one question—where on earth did this notion of electronic tagging come from? I cannot believe that it came from the civil service. I was not on the Committee, but some of us have served on many Committees—including Kincraig—and tagging was always excluded in the past. By what alchemy did this idea infiltrate St. Andrew's house? I put forward one possible candidate— [HON. MEMBERS: "Name him."] I am not going to, because it is a lobby—the lobby of the commercial security manufacturing interests. They are certainly at it. Some people could potentially make a good deal of money out of it.

The proposal has a lot to do with posturing or, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) put it, with "tokenism". That is what it is about because, if children's panels are excluded, jolly few are involved. Who dreamed this up?

Mr. Connarty: Anyone who looks at the record of the Standing Committee will see that I was firm that I found this proposal one of the most abhorrent of the Government's proposals for Scotland, even for adults. I have no doubt that the Government feel that they must do something because of the attacks that they have made on the structure of society and support for the family in the past 17 years. They are beginning to be aware that many factors in society have led to family breakdown, or even aberrant behaviour among parents, which is copied by children, many of whom live in dire poverty and under tremendous stress, who feel great anger against society for having failed them and their children.

The general spirit of the Bill seems to be that we must lock those people away for as long as possible, or that, with tagging, we should lock them into the very families and social units that may be failing them in the first place. The main theme is to keep them out of the hair of the middle and upper classes—the political classes the Government represent—who do not live in the schemes in which many of those children are first failed, then learn their social behaviour, and kick out against society. The middle and upper classes do not have to live among the tenements and the walk-up flats where many single-parent families are dumped because there is nowhere else for them, where they lose hope and where their children get out of control and become a major problem.

I see the Secretary of State having a good laugh. As we know, there are not that many schemes where he lives. The area in which he has chosen to put down his roots does not have that many people living in densely populated areas, either in Scotland or in London—whichever roots he feels most strongly these days.

The reality is that, if they take the trouble to visit them, many Conservative Back-Bench Members will find all this social malaise in the communities that they represent. The idea of tagging people and restricting them to live in that environment as adults is bad enough. It is bad because it does not work, it is expensive and it does not constrain their behaviour. Tagging can pinpoint them for a short time, but people find ways of getting out of the surveillance, and if they want to continue with their aberrant behaviour as adults, they will.

The idea of introducing the amendment for children of 16 years or below is even worse. How low does the Secretary of State expect it to go? If a family breaks down and children of eight, nine and 10 years old find that doing something anti-social is a way of working against society, is the Secretary of State suggesting that they will be tagged? Is he suggesting that eight-year-olds, six-year-olds or five-year-olds will be tagged—held in the home, under surveillance with an electronic bleeper on them, or whatever other technique we are going to use, until they are released into the nursery, only to continue their behaviour there?

That shows the fundamental flaw in all the theory behind the Bill. It is not about amending the wrongs that society has caused, or amending the behaviour of those who then retaliate against society. It is about locking them away somewhere for a short time or a long time. In the case of the children, it will be six months at home, presumably, with their tag on, and, if they leave between certain hours, a bleeper will go off and Group 4 or Securicor will rush in to find out where they have gone.

Tagging would not tackle the root problem, which is that, if young children are misbehaving in a regular anti-social pattern, something needs to be done about the environment in which they live. That must be done either by supporting the family or by finding some other area of care to supplement the family and turn failure into success; but that is not in the Government's mind.

In Committee, I said that I was struck sometimes when I saw social workers abandoning supervision orders on children who were no longer co-operating. They walked away from those children, and I am extremely angry about that. I have written a letter only today about one such case in my constituency. I would be much more interested in the Government introducing some structure in social work departments to supervise children and to give them a place where they could learn good behaviour and find something useful to do, perhaps after school. That would provide a better solution to their psychological and social problems than locking them in with the family in which those problems arose and putting a bleeper or buzzer on them. It is all wrong: the idea does not attract me for adults, and it appals me for children. I think that it also appals most of the public.

The Government have gone over the top, into what I have called a science fiction nightmare. For children, it is even worse. Someone asked where the idea came from, but I remember reading about it in 10-cent DC comics. It is Judge Dredd in the form of the Secretary of State for Scotland—although I recently saw a cartoon trying to claim that title for the Prime Minister.

The idea is an aberration and has not worked where it has been tried. The Government have caused most of the problems by exacerbating the feeling of alienation and the sense that society has failed people so badly that it is all right for them and for their children to kick back at it. I put it on record that I do not think that it is right to kick back against society. It is not right to attack or terrorise neighbours, or to break into shops and continually offend other people, but we must do something positive about it, not something silly and nonsensical that underlines the fact that in the Government's eyes there are two sections of society: those who are doing all right and those whom it is advisable to keep away from the people who are doing all right because they might cause some problems.

Have the Government ever thought that, if we took those people to our bosom and worked with them to turn them into positive citizens, we might save the next generation instead of locking it up? I hope that the amendment is kicked out, for the nonsense and the insult that it is.

Mrs. Adams: Is not this another case of "The higher you build the walls, the faster I will run"? The amendment would confine children to deprived areas, when we should be trying to get them out of those areas as often as possible. Often the problem is that those children never see the outside of those areas, and they should not be confined to them for ever.

The proposal would punish families who are already severely punished by poverty. Their greatest crime is that poverty has been visited on them and they cannot break out of it. We are telling children under 16 that they will never be allowed to break out of that circle.

Dr. Godman: I was not on the Committee, so perhaps my hon. Friend can tell me whether the Minister told members of the Committee where the clamping—presumably around the ankle—of the young offender would take place. Is it to take place in a police station or the youngster's home, and would the Group 4 people be escorted by police officers when carrying out the task? That is a practical question, unlike the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) about who was the intellectual who came up with the idea. Where would the clamping be done?

Mrs. Adams: As far as I could gather in Committee, the clamp would be something like a wrist watch or an ankle watch.

Mr. Davidson: Or even an ankle chain.

Mrs. Adams: Yes, even an ankle chain. The offender would be confined to the place—the home—for about 12 hours. It would be linked to something like a modem, which would have to be installed in people's homes by the Government. That would not be cheap. If someone moved outwith the radius permitted, the bleeper would go off.

Mr. Maxton That is interesting. To have a modem, one must have a telephone line, and therefore a telephone. Many of the homes of the children we are discussing cannot afford telephones. Will the Government provide free telephones to everyone?

Mrs. Adams: We raised that point in Committee and were told that the Government would provide telephones, but only a single line for the modem.

Mr. McFall: May I take the matter a stage further? If telephone lines are to be installed, what would happen if people did not pay their bills?

Mrs. Adams: We never got round to that. We were told that, once again, the taxpayer would meet the cost of installing—

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

To be read the Third time on Tuesday 28 January.

Oral Answers to Questions

HEALTH

Capitation Funding (Nottingham Health Authority)

1. Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what level of capitation funding the Nottingham health authority will receive in 1997–98. [10356]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Horam): In 1997-98, Nottingham health authority will receive an integrated allocation of £285.6 million—a cash increase over this year of £12.1 million.

Mr. Tipping: Will the Minister confirm that, under the capitation formula, Nottingham will next year receive a growth in funding of 0.34 per cent. over this year? Given that fact, will it not take another seven years for it to reach 100 per cent. formula funding? The Queen's medical centre has not carried out non-urgent operations since November. Should not Nottingham people and Nottingham health services receive a fair share of the cake?

Mr. Horam: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says, but I note that Sir David White, the chairman of Nottingham health authority, said that Nottingham's funding in the next year is in line with that authority's proposals for development, and that

"Due to a better than expected national settlement for the NHS and the case put forward by the authority . . . I am happy to say that the prospects for the development of our local services—and the maintenance of excellence—looks more certain for next year."

While I understand what the hon. Gentleman says, we can offer him much faster progress in seven years. The hon. Gentleman should be worrying about the Labour Government after the next general election. Will they be able to maintain the progress that we have made in the past 18 years?

Sir Jim Lester: Does my hon. Friend understand that those of us who seek the return of a Conservative Government recognise that both parties acknowledge that Nottingham needs the additional money? The settlement is a step in the right direction, but it is only one step and we want considerably more money, year on year, to restore us to the correct position of parity with other similar teaching areas.

Mr. Horam: As I said in reply to the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping), he has got a far better deal out of this Government than he will ever get out of a Labour Government. Progress was made last year and this year, and will be made next year—if a Conservative Government are re-elected, funding for health authorities will ensure that progress is made in every year to come. I am sure that my hon. Friend looks forward to the re-election of a Conservative Government.

National Health Service Funding

2. Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received from the Centre for Policy Studies concerning the future funding of the national health service. [10357]

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): I have received no such representations.

Mr. Loyden: Will the Minister confirm that a pamphlet recently issued by the Centre for Policy Studies, the author of which was a special adviser to the former Secretary of State for Health, now the Chancellor of the Exchequer, proposed that future policy on the NHS should involve the introduction of top-up fees and vouchers? Does not that show that it is now undeniable that a Conservative Government serving their fifth term would abolish the national health service as we know it and as its founders intended it to be?

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman asks me about the future funding of the national health service. The Government's policy on that is set out not by the director of the Centre for Policy Studies, but by the Prime Minister. He set it out clearly at the Conservative party conference, when he laid down a challenge, which the Labour Front Bench has so far refused to take up. A re-elected Conservative Government will increase real-terms funding for the health service through the life of the next Parliament, year by year by year by year by year. When will we hear from Labour Front Benchers how they will match that pledge?

Mrs. Roe: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Centre for Policy Studies document "A Conservative Agenda" congratulated the Government on their record of increasing NHS funding since 1979? Does he agree that it is only against a background of guaranteed financial growth throughout the next Parliament that the NHS can continue to thrive?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is precisely right. The CPS made another suggestion—that we should abolish the regional health authorities. The Government have already done so and delivered as a result £100 million of administrative savings. That was done over the opposition of Labour's Front Benchers, who would be taken a great deal more seriously on the question of administrative savings if they ever voted for one, instead of voting against them.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Secretary of State and I probably agree that the health service needs more money, although we would disagree about how much. I would argue for more than he would and both he and I would argue for more than the Labour party would.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Where did the hon. Gentleman get that line from?

Mr. Hughes: From Labour's figures.

Laying that argument to one side for the moment, will the Secretary of State accept that there is one area on which we can agree immediately—that, for one year, we could halt all closures while an independent body such as the King's Fund assessed demand and supply in the health service, so that we could at least agree on the facts before returning to the debate about money?

Mr. Dorrell: With great respect to the hon. Gentleman, I do not believe that it is in the interests of the health service or, most important, its patients to freeze the development of the health service. We need to have a service that uses a growing budget, year by year, to deliver improving service to patients. That is the commitment that the present Government give. The commitment given by the Opposition is that they invite patients and the health service to rely on the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), who told Pulse,

"I'll fight my corner for NHS funding."

We know what that means—he will lose his corner, as the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) made clear yesterday.

Mr. Congdon: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the increase in real-terms funding for the NHS—of more than 70 per cent. since 1979—demonstrates the Government's continuing commitment to the NHS? Does he also agree that the record number of patients being treated, including the increase in the number of people having hip replacements and heart bypasses, also demonstrates that firm commitment to the NHS?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is exactly right. The figures for the past seven years are: an increase of a quarter in the real funding for the NHS and an increase of a third in the number of patients treated. That is the Government's record—extra funding, used efficiently to treat patients. It is a record that the Labour party cannot match in office and would not and cannot match now, ahead of a general election.

Mr. Chris Smith: Is it not the case that the so-called promise made by the Prime Minister about year-on-year increases in real-terms funding for the health service was disavowed two months later by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he published the figures in the Red Book? Will the Secretary of State admit that page 142 of the Red Book shows clearly that, in the second year, the Government expect a fall in real-terms expenditure in the Department of Health and that, in year three, they expect a standstill in real-terms expenditure in the Department of Health? Does not that show, first, that the Government have already broken the promise that they made at their party conference and, secondly, that they are not to be trusted with the health service or with the government of this country?

Mr. Smith: No.

Mr. Dorrell: I am looking at the 1997-98 Red Book, published in November 1996. The hon. Gentleman has the wrong reference.

The substance of the hon. Gentleman's point, as he knows very well—we dealt with it repeatedly around Budget time—concerns the commitment set out in the Red Book to real-terms increases in NHS funding, provided at 3 per cent. growth in current funding for year one, and provided at more modest levels in years two and three. That still represents real growth, which the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East will not allow the hon. Gentleman to match.

Mr. John Marshall: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) will not increase health service spending but will burden the health service with the costs of a national minimum wage, which will mean extra pay for manual workers in the health service and less money for patient care?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is exactly right. The right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East is so unconfident of his ability to deliver a growing economy that he knows he cannot match our commitment to the national health service. What is more, even the paltry budget that the slow-growing British economy under Labour would allow the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury includes a prior commitment to abolishing compulsory competitive tendering. That will cost him £90 million. There is also a prior commitment to introducing a national minimum wage, which the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) was the last Labour spokesman to cost—at £500 million. That makes £590 million that will come out of patient care before the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury can even begin to think about a growing health service.

Mental Health Services

3. Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last met the chairmen of health authorities to discuss services for mentally ill people. [10358]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Simon Burns): I meet chairmen of health authorities whenever issues of mutual interest need to be discussed.

Mr. Miller: Will the Minister comment on the report published today by the King's Fund commission? Does he agree that it shows that, after 18 years of Conservative rule, London does not have a comprehensive mental health strategy? In the light of that report, will he also look carefully at the proposed mergers of NHS trusts such as the West Cheshire and Wirral Community Healthcare NHS trusts in my constituency, and ensure that any mergers are approved only on the basis of patient care and need, not managerial convenience?

Mr. Burns: The King's Fund report, published today, is important in that it coincides with much of the work that we have done at the Department of Health on the provision of mental health services in London. No one could disagree that those services are under pressure. Unfortunately, since the creation of the NHS, both inside and outside the medical profession, mental health care has been the Cinderella service. That has been tackled over the past five years with significant increases in funding and targeted funding to deal with particular issues.

The important issue that the report highlights—weighted capitation funding—has already been decided on by the Government; we have changed the system and implemented the proposal so as to improve comprehensive community services. In that respect we are one step ahead of the report.

As for the hon. Gentleman's constituency point, the merger is subject to consultation, and a decision will be taken in due course. I know that he would not expect me to comment at this stage.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: Does my hon. Friend accept that there is a gap in the services for mentally ill young people, and that the services offered for children and adults, many of the latter elderly, are not appropriate for this age group? Will he give support to voluntary groups, such as VISYON in Congleton, which seek to highlight the problem and to support mentally ill young people and their families?

Mr. Burns: A great deal of work is going on with regard to young people and adolescents because of the problems that have arisen. One such problem is that, because of the age of that group, they have never been used to institutional care. As part of the programme of improving and developing a comprehensive mental health service, we have in place the children's and adolescent mental health programme. We are well aware of the problems facing that target group. More must be done in the area because, as I said earlier, in the past—since the creation of the health service—it has not had the same priority as, say, accident and emergency services. We welcome all input to improve and enhance the provision of care, from the voluntary sector as well as within the health service.

Ms Coffey: As today's King's Fund report on mental health in London clearly shows that services in the inner city are in a state of near collapse, will the Minister explain the huge gap between his recent reassurances and the reality outlined in the report? Is he now finally prepared to accept that that Cinderella service is not providing care in the community for mentally ill people and their families or proper protection for the public in London or elsewhere?

Mr. Burns: No, I do not accept that analysis. The hon. Lady is well aware that record sums of money are being put into mental health care. For example, the mental health challenge fund, the mental illness specific grant and the £5 million emergency pressures fund are targeted where help is most needed. In addition, because by definition the problem is greater in London—because more people suffer from mental illness there—London receives a significant proportion of the available funding. It is important to build on everything that has been done to create a comprehensive and effective service that provides proper patient care. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced last February a programme to ensure that health authorities draw up plans for a comprehensive community service for mental health. That is going ahead and being monitored. We shall continue to do that to ensure that we catch up and get the best service possible. That is how we should move forward, rather than carping and criticising at the margins.

Sir Roger Sims: Services for mentally ill people include not only medical provision in hospital but the provision of adequate housing accommodation when patients are ready to leave hospital so that they do not block beds. May I suggest that my hon. Friend urges the chairmen of health authorities to work closely with local housing associations to ensure that appropriate housing is provided? May I also suggest that he discusses with his colleagues in the Department of the Environment the fact that they, too, should urge housing associations to make such provision and ensure that housing associations have the resources to do so?

Mr. Burns: I hope that my hon. Friend is reassured that he has identified two important areas that are already at the crux of Government policy. We encourage housing authorities, housing associations, social services and health authorities to work together so that there is a multidisciplinary approach. That is the best way to cut through the problems and reach a solution as quickly as possible. Another area where the Government are doing a great deal of interrelated work is on drug and alcohol abuse, which is a contributory factor in much mental illness.

Hospital Closures

4. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the latest figures for the number of hospitals closed since 1979. [10359]

The Minister for Health (Mr. Gerald Malone): This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Skinner: I am surprised that the Government have not fiddled those figures as well. All of us on Opposition Benches know the figures—they are in the Library. Since 1979, 20 per cent. of all hospitals have been closed by this lousy, rotten Government. That is the truth.

On a day when we are told that 400 critically ill children have been turned away from intensive care in the past three months by the tawdry lot opposite, is it not a fitting epitaph for this Government that the national health service is now filled with patients on trolleys in corridors from the cradle to the grave? It is time that the Government got the sack.

Mr. Malone: The hon. Gentleman's reference to the exercise by his own party earlier this morning will be exposed by my right hon. Friend in the debate that follows as a disgraceful ruse. The statistics for hospitals have never been collected centrally. That has been explained in a number of written answers, as the Opposition know. For a party that wants to cut bureaucracy, it would be bizarre if Labour started to collect those figures now, as they are far less relevant than the figures that show how many people are being treated in the NHS, which is what counts.

The hon. Gentleman might be interested to know that, during the past few years, there has been an investment of £15 million in capital building in his health authority. Why does he not welcome that, along with the fact that more patients are being treated? That is what counts.

Dame Jill Knight: Is it not also true that a great many new hospitals have been opened since 1979? Furthermore, is it not true that some hospitals, which were very old and not in a suitable state to serve the public properly, have been renovated, such as the general hospital in Birmingham, which is being converted to the new children's hospital? When Opposition Members speak like the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), they show that they are dinosaurs who want hospitals built in the early 1900s to remain unchanged and unimproved.

Mr. Malone: My hon. Friend is right to point that out. The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) an expert in supporting outdated Victorian industrial practices, now seems to want to do the same for Victorian buildings and hospitals. There has been substantial investment in real estate in the NHS. That investment is now threatened by the Opposition, who do not accept the private finance initiative which will be responsible for the building of more hospitals in their constituencies. They would put that at risk.

Redbridge and Waltham Forest Health Authority

5. Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he next plans to visit Redbridge to discuss the financial position of Redbridge and Waltham Forest health authority and the situation in local hospitals. [10360]

Mr. Malone: The national health service executive is in regular contact with national health service organisations on behalf of Ministers. I have no immediate plans to visit Redbridge and Waltham Forest health authority.

Mr. Gapes: Why not? Does not the Minister know that, in my health authority, there is a £6 million deficit, that Whipps Cross hospital has cancelled elective admissions since just after Christmas because it cannot cope with accident and emergency admissions, and that King George hospital has 97 per cent. bed occupancy? People are frequently left on trolleys for 12, 15 or 20 hours. Why does not the Minister have the courage to come to my local hospital? I will take him there and show him the problems that the Government have created.

Mr. Malone: If invited, I shall visit the hon. Gentleman's constituency, and I shall be delighted to see the excellent work that has been carried out by the trust in his health authority. He fails to recognise the additional investment that has been made available for this year—an increase of £1.7 million in real terms, a further £4.4 million funding for strategic change and £845,000 for priority services for the rest of the year. Much of that money is now being deployed in trusts in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. I will gladly come along and celebrate the success of that fund as it builds even more facilities.

Mr. Duncan Smith: I encourage my hon. Friend to visit that health authority. Notwithstanding any difficulties that it, like many other health authorities, experiences, will my hon. Friend point out that more than £23 million of capital expenditure has been put into the main hospital there, Whipps Cross hospital, which has resulted in brand new surgeries and a brand new accident and emergency wing, from which local people now benefit?

Mr. Malone: A cross-party invitation is almost impossible to resist, even with a busy diary. If invited formally, I shall certainly try to make time to acknowledge the progress in the constituency of the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Gapes) and the progress to which my hon. Friend drew attention—progress that would not take place if a Government ever got into office who could not make the pledge made by the Prime Minister, that a Conservative Government would continue to fund the health service and to increase funding in real terms year on year.

Ms Jowell: The nation would be reassured if the Minister would face up to the crisis that is confronting accident and emergency departments throughout the country. What does he have to say to the nurse whom I met recently at Edgware hospital—

Madam Speaker: Order. This question refers to hospitals that are local to Redbridge and Waltham Forest.

Ms Jowell: As at Whipps Cross hospital in Redbridge, which has also been gripped by crisis, the nurse said:

"It has been like a war zone here. We have had to put up 18 beds in the minor injuries unit and the Government tells us that there is no crisis."

When will the Government face the fact that there is a winter crisis in the national health service?

Mr. Malone: I would be delighted to meet the ambulatory nurse to whom the hon. Lady refers. She seems to move with great felicity from one health authority to another, depending on the question that is posed. I would tell that nurse that I am sure that she recognises the investment that the Government have made in the health service. If the hon. Lady wants to set the nation's mind at rest, perhaps she and her Front-Bench colleagues could stop drumming up spoof reports—which are based on no facts whatsoever—to scare the public.

Renal Services (Greater Manchester and Cheshire)

6. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the provision of renal services in Greater Manchester and Cheshire. [10361]

Mr. Horam: Health authorities serving Greater Manchester and south Cheshire have recently consulted the public on proposals to reorganise renal services in the area. The health authority that is co-ordinating the review is presenting its evaluation to all seven participating authorities this month. Afterwards, health authority members and others will have the opportunity to consider the proposals further.

Mr. Winterton: Does my hon. Friend accept that renal failure is a complex illness that often needs the support of other specialties? Does he accept that Macclesfield community health council, which has conducted an in-depth inquiry into the matter and sought public views on the provision of renal services in Cheshire and Greater Manchester, has advanced the unanimous opinion that Wythenshawe hospital, under Dr. Mike Venning and his colleagues, would provide a wonderful hub for the provision of renal services? It found that it would be an advantage to retain three hubs—the Manchester royal infirmary, Hope hospital and Wythenshawe hospital—rather than reducing the hubs to two, with all the associated problems that that would create for those with renal diseases.

Mr. Horam: I hear what my hon. Friend says. He raises an important point. I put it to him that this is a clinician-led review that involves a lot of capital investment. It will obviously be predicated on the desire to secure better health care for renal patients. I am delighted to tell my hon. Friend—the House will understand my relief in saying this, knowing my hon. Friend's formidable lobbying attributes—that it will include improved satellite facilities in Macclesfield which, as he knows, are not nurse or clinician-led at the moment. They will receive full medical support under the proposals.

My hon. Friend will also understand that, if there is opposition to the proposals, or if the health authorities cannot agree on them, they will come to Ministers. In light of that, I must retain the independent view of Ministers to judge the proposals properly when they come before us. However, I shall certainly take into account the points raised by my hon. Friend.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Would the Minister like to astonish us all by putting the patients' interests first? This is not a matter that can be decided by the ill-mannered fighting of individual consultants: it is a matter of providing high-quality satellite facilities to serve not just Macclesfield but any patient in south Cheshire who requires renal assistance. Will the Minister confirm that, as far as he is concerned, the quality of renal services will always take precedence over the particular interests of individual Members of Parliament?

Mr. Horam: Of course that is the case. As I pointed out to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), this is a clinician-led review with the object of putting more capital investment into a necessary area in order to provide a better service. I am sure that the proposals will achieve that aim, but we take into account all points of view—both those opposed and those in favour—when we consider them.

GP Fundholding

7. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many residents of (a) Buckinghamshire and (b) Milton Keynes are served by fundholding general practitioners (i) as a percentage of the population and (ii) in total. [10362]

Mr. Malone: The total registered population in Buckinghamshire covered by a fundholding general practitioner is appropriately 486,000. In Milton Keynes, fundholders serve around 156,000 people. Those figures represent 71 per cent. of the registered population of Buckinghamshire and 80 per cent. of the registered population of Milton Keynes.

Mr. Butler: As a registered patient with one of the best fundholding GP practices, not just in Newport Pagnell and my constituency but in the country, may I invite my hon. Friend to join me in congratulating the doctors who have demonstrated that this policy works in providing an ever-improving and outstanding service to their patients? What advice would he give to my constituents and others who are anxious to continue to enjoy the benefits of GP fundholding after the next election?

Mr. Malone: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for pointing out the excellent work that is being done not only by his GP fundholder but by others in his constituency. I extend that to across the country as well, where the majority of the population of England are now served by GP fundholders. There is a very simple answer to the question that he posed, because in the election one party will be pledged to abolish GP fundholding—the Labour party. The Conservative Government will sustain GP fundholding when re-elected, so my advice is pretty clear: vote Conservative.

Health Service Savings

8. Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment has been made of the likely savings to be made for the health services as a result of the measures contained in the Health Authorities Act 1995. [10363]

Mr. Dorrell: Total annual savings as a result of the Health Authorities Act 1995 are estimated at £150 million: £100 million from the abolition of regional health authorities, and £50 million from the introduction of single, unified health authorities. Those savings will be used for direct patient care.

Mr. Richards: Does my right hon. Friend recall that the savings from administration that he just announced were bitterly opposed by the Labour party? Will he confirm that an additional £300 million a year will be diverted to patient care from cuts in hospital bureaucracy? Therefore, is it realistic for the Labour party to claim that a further £100 million a year can be saved? Where would the money come from?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. There will be an extra £300 million a year for patient care as a result of the Government's squeeze on unnecessary administrative processes.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) loves talking about savings from reduced administration, but he is not serious about it. Indeed, so unserious is he that the Health Service Journal, which circulates among health service managers, says:

"Managers will not lose their jobs, says Smith".

So he will reduce costs on administration but he will not reduce the number of people in administration.

Mr. McNamara: The Minister will be aware that, a fortnight ago, a patient from Leeds was sent to the intensive care unit in Hull, a journey of 60 miles, because there was no room in the Leeds intensive care unit. Last Tuesday, because of no room in the Hull royal infirmary intensive care unit, a constituent of mine, Mr. Dennis Drax, was sent to Leeds, another journey of 60 miles. Sadly, both patients died. How much of the new surplus will be given to our intensive care unit?

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point; it is not directly relevant to this question, but I shall answer it none the less.

Any individual case where the service may be seen to have failed will of course be investigated, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will tell the House the whole story of intensive care referrals this winter. I hope that he will remind the House that, this winter, for the first time, every intensive care unit in the health service is connected to an emergency bed referral system, and that an intensive care clinician who needs to refer a patient to another intensive care unit has immediate access to availability in the health service for the first time. The hon. Gentleman might have spared time to welcome that development of service.

Private Finance Initiative

9. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the development of the private finance initiative for the construction of new hospitals. [10364]

Mr. Horam: Contracts have been signed for 43 private finance initiative schemes, with a total capital value of £317 million.

Mr. Arnold: Does my hon. Friend remember that, three years ago, when the PFI policy was in its infancy and we were considering the prospects for a brand new district general hospital in Darenth park for the people of north-west Kent, the then spokesman on health for the Labour party, the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman), derided the project as being on a B list and highly unlikely to take place? Will he tell the House what progress is being made with that project, and emphasise the excellent quality of the team in our local NHS trust and the very strong support for the project from the people of north-west Kent?

Mr. Horam: If, indeed, it was on a B list when the Opposition said it was, it has done pretty well since. The Darenth park scheme is progressing extremely well and making good progress. As the House knows, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, not least among many others, has put a great deal of effort into introducing a successful product. I am glad to be able to say that he is not alone. There are many schemes throughout the country that are benefiting from PFI, where otherwise there would perhaps be no hope of having a new hospital.

Mr. Barron: Is the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) aware that he has some support from the Opposition? He said in his last election manifesto that he had taken a leading role in securing the recently announced district general hospital. In fact, it has still not been agreed. We await the hon. Gentleman's next election manifesto.

The Minister referred to 43 projects under the private finance initiative. Not one of them is a new hospital. The Tories have promised PFI hospitals since 1990 but not one has been delivered. The Secretary of State has promised the Prime Minister £500 million of new PFI hospital contracts by April, yet has not delivered £1.

The Government have tried to sweeten PFI deals with tailor-made Acts, but have failed to do so. I understand that, last week, new guidelines were offered to prop up the PFI scheme by making available national health service budget building cuts.

Is not the scenario that I have outlined jeopardising the future of our NHS? When will the Government clean up the mess and start to build new hospitals instead of talking about so doing?

Mr. Horam: That was a long question. In turn, I will ask the hon. Gentleman a short question. Are the Opposition in favour of PFI or are they not? It is—

Madam Speaker: Order. The Government are here to answer questions, not to ask them.

Mr. Horam: We would like some answers, Madam Speaker.

The hon. Gentleman seems not to understand that the proposal for a Norfolk and Norwich general hospital is indeed for a hospital. It will amaze hon. Members on both sides of the House in that area to learn from him that the proposal is not for a new general hospital. In fact, we all know that it is for a new general hospital. What is the hon. Gentleman talking about?

Mr. Dunn: I remember a time when the International Monetary Fund, not the then Government, determined our health expenditure. Will my hon. Friend accept my thanks on behalf of the people of Dartford for all the help that he has given to the PFI, leading to the construction of a new district hospital with 400 beds—a state-of-the-art hospital—in my constituency, which was opposed by the Labour party throughout, by its Front-Bench spokesmen?

Mr. Horam: That is a fact. The reality is that hospital projects are going forward throughout the country and not only in west Kent. We are seeing projects going forward in Norfolk and Norwich, Durham, Worcester and Carlisle. Such projects are progressing throughout the country as a result of the PFI, with no thanks to the Opposition, who have constantly sniped and accused us of privatisation, all to no effect.

NHS Pay Awards

10. Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the efficacy of local pay bargaining as a means of determining pay awards for NHS staff. [10365]

Mr. Dorrell: Local pay is delivering fair and affordable rewards to staff while supporting the development of flexible and responsive health services.

Mr. Ainsworth: Is the Secretary of State aware of the recent comments made by Ken Jarrold, the director of human resources of the national health service executive? He said that local pay arrangements would be considered successful only if deals had been made in 50 per cent. of NHS trusts. Surely the right hon. Gentleman is aware that, to date, almost a year after the system was set up, settlements have been reached in only 25 per cent. of NHS trusts. Does he agree with the director's comments or does he not?

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman has got the facts wrong. As of last Friday, 228 trusts had agreed local deals with their staff. They represent 53 per cent. of all trusts. The substantive question that parties must answer is whether they are in favour of accepting the recommendations of the independent review bodies. The independent nurses' pay review body recommended a system of local pay. The question that every party must answer is whether it is in favour of the continuation of those review bodies and of respecting their advice. The Government are in favour of respecting their advice, which is why we accepted their recommendation in favour of local pay, and why we are implementing it.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my right hon. Friend remember a time when pay was agreed centrally, when there was civil war in the Labour party, and when there was a pay freeze, which led to the winter of discontent? Is that not the likely scenario ahead of us if we ever get a Labour Government?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend has quite an authoritative figure on his side. No less a figure than the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) was busy yesterday warning nurses:

"Pay squeeze here to stay, Brown warns the nurses".

It will be interesting to see how quickly Labour Members have learnt their party's new lines when they meet members of the Royal College of Nursing in their constituencies.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 21 January. [10386]

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mrs. Campbell: In April last year, the Health Secretary promised to deliver a proper level of paediatric intensive bed space. Will the Prime Minister explain to the House why, despite that promise, 15 critically ill children have been turned away from Addenbrooke's hospital in Cambridge in the past few months? Can he not keep any of his promises?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Lady should check that her facts are accurate before she mistakenly sets out such policies. Every child needing a paediatric intensive care bed this winter has been found one. The bogus figures that the Labour party has produced can self-evidently be seen as bogus. Perhaps the hon. Lady would care to hear what Dr. David Hallworth, chairman of the independent Paediatric Intensive Care Society, said. He called Labour's claims "pretty meaningless", and very wisely added that this issue should not be "subject to party political point scoring."

Sir Terence Higgins: Does the Prime Minister agree that the electorate are not naive? They know that a promise not to increase rates of income tax is not the same as a promise not to increase personal taxation. If one says that one wants a starting rate of 10p, that is utterly meaningless if one does not also say at what level it will start and how wide the band will be. Will my right hon. Friend comment on the Government's record on such matters?

The Prime Minister: One simply needs to look at which was the last party to put up the basic rate of tax; and one recalls that it was the Labour party. One should look at which party has never supported a single Conservative tax cut and has done nothing to get the basic rate down to 23p—I think that Labour Members know that it is their party—at which party has supported absolutely no measures to control expenditure—the Labour party has supported none—and at which party has made £30 billion-worth of promises that it has not yet disclaimed, but that it must disclaim if it is to stand up its ludicrous claim that it will not increase taxes.

Mr. Blair: The Conservative party's 22 tax rises since the last election must have slipped the Prime Minister's mind for a moment.

May I return the Prime Minister to the point about intensive care beds for children? Does he accept that the figures given by hospitals of the number of children turned away—eventually found a bed in other hospitals, but turned away—are correct? If they are correct, how does that square with the Health Secretary's promise that the whole matter would be dealt with, and that there would be no repetition of that practice, given what happened last year?

The Prime Minister: I said a moment ago that the report produced by the Labour party was alarmist nonsense. I repeat that point. Every child needing a paediatric intensive care bed this winter has been found one—

Mrs. Ann Taylor: Not to the parents.

The Prime Minister: Of course not to the parents—but, unless the hon. Lady will persuade the shadow Chancellor to provide more resources for health, I suggest that she and the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) should not criticise a service that is treating more people, and treating them better. Just occasionally, it would be wise of them to praise the health service for the way in which it deals with the growing demands of health care, rather than always criticising it.

Mr. Blair: We do praise the national health service. We built the national health service. What we condemn is the Government's record on the national health service.

May I put this to the Prime Minister? Of course it is the case that children are eventually found another bed—that was the case even in the tragic instance of Nicholas Geldard, which gave rise to this whole problem—but the Secretary of State for Health claimed that the business of having to go from hospital to hospital would stop. May I give the Prime Minister an instance from Bristol children's hospital? Since January this year—even this year—15 children, just at that hospital, have been turned away because of a shortage of beds. Does the Prime Minister accept—[Interruption.] Hon. Members may shout, but does the Prime Minister accept that we are talking not just about intensive care beds for children? Has he seen the report prepared on community care for the mentally ill, and what today's newspapers say about problems for doctors' practices? Can he not accept that there is a crisis in some parts of the national health service, and that it is not good enough for him and other Ministers just to conceal the true state of affairs this side of a general election?

The Prime Minister: If there is a crisis, and the right hon. Gentleman is concerned about the language of priorities, why does he not match our pledge on spending in the national health service? If there is a crisis, why are more people being treated in the national health service than ever before? If there is a crisis, why have we met the charge set out by the shadow Foreign Secretary, the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), on whether our reforms are working—that is, whether more people are being treated?

There are more intensive beds; there are more treatments; there are better treatments; there are speedier treatments. Unless the right hon. Member for Sedgefield is going to follow the lead that we have set in providing resources for the health service over the past 18 years, and committing ourselves to do so in the future, he is doing nothing more than seeking to make political capital out of a service that is dealing with a growing demand with great skill.

Mr. Blair: May I put it to the Prime Minister that, over the past few years—since he has been in charge of the national health service—the service has been given 20,000 more managers but has 50,000 fewer nurses? Is it not the case that the national health service would be better if it were run as a proper co-operative service again, rather than hospital against hospital and doctor against doctor? The only party that will rebuild Britain's national health service is the party that created it.

The Prime Minister: It is perfectly true that the Labour party established the national health service, and I offer it full credit for its role in following up the Beveridge report instituted earlier by an all-party Government; but it is the Conservative party that has built up the health service. We have been in power for two thirds of the period that has elapsed since then, and we have built up the health service from its beginnings into a service that is now recognised as the best in the world.

The figures that the right hon. Gentleman quotes on managers are wrong. The impression that he consistently gives of the health service runs it down. It would be very refreshing if, just for once, Labour Members acknowledged that we have on our hands the most successful national health service in the world, which provides more and better treatments than ever before. The reality is that the people of this nation who use the health service understand that, even if the Labour party, using it as a political football, does not.

Mr. Rathbone: During the course of today, when the Prime Minister looked back on his trip to the far east, did he remember seeing there a beautiful and very rare flower called the rafflesia amoldia, which is parasitic in nature, is without a stem or roots and which with its vines embraces any handy, strong tree? If he did, did he draw any conclusions from seeing it?

The Prime Minister: I saw no such flowers on that occasion.

Mr. Ashdown: Will the Prime Minister accept that, in last night's vote, the Government won no part of informed opinion, including that in his own party, in support of their proposals for bugging people and their homes through the Police Bill? Surely he cannot accuse four past Home Secretaries, including a Conservative one, one past Conservative Attorney-General, the present Lord Chief Justice and many Law Lords of failing to back the police because they insist that those wide-ranging powers ought to be subject to prior judicial authority. We all understand that the Home Secretary must take time to digest that vote, but will the Prime Minister at least assure us that, rather than riding roughshod over that opinion, he will listen and respond to it? Will he note that, if he wishes to do so on a cross-party basis, we stand ready to participate?

The Prime Minister: The whole House, including I assume the right hon. Gentleman, knows that intensive surveillance has been going on under successive Governments under the mantra of guidelines for about 30 years: there is nothing new about it. The purpose of the Bill was to put it on a statutory footing: that was what my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary was seeking to do, and he proposed that it should be put under independent review. The amendments tabled by the Labour and Liberal parties in the Lords contradict one another. They are unsatisfactory and will need to be changed. Of course my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary will reflect upon the view that was expressed in another place, but the right hon. Gentleman has to realise that intensive surveillance can be used only in investigating serious crime and where there is no other way of obtaining the intelligence. That is an important principle, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not wish to move away from that principle.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Will my right hon. Friend remind those who listened with incredulity to the yesterday's speech by the shadow Chancellor that, although imitation is the sincerest form of flattery, it is no substitute for the original?

The Prime Minister: I suppose that every Conservative Member regards imitation as the sincerest form of flattery, but the reality is that, whatever the best intentions of the shadow Chancellor, the sheer nature of the Labour party is such that he certainly could not deliver that which he has promised. He knows that, I think the electorate know that, and the faces behind him portray that very clearly.

Q2. Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 21 January. [10387]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Donohoe: Since 1989, some 25 per cent. of beds have been lost to the national health service in Scotland. Today, the senior Duke, the Duke of Hamilton, who happens to be the brother of the Minister who has responsibility for health in Scotland, told the people of Scotland that the Tories cannot be trusted with health. Does the Prime Minister agree?

The Prime Minister: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman could explain, after yet another attempt to denigrate the health service by the Labour party, why more people are being treated in the health service in Scotland and elsewhere. Can the hon. Gentleman explain that, or is he playing "follow my leader" by trying to use Britain's national health service as a party political football for the Labour party?

Mr. John Greenway: Will my right hon. Friend ask to see a report of the incident overnight at Full Sutton prison? When he does, does he expect to find that the progress that has been made in the Prison Service in recent years will be reflected by the fact that the disturbance was quelled quickly by the excellent work of the Prison Service and prison officers, to whom praise is due? Will he note that Full Sutton is a modern prison with no overcrowding, but that it holds some of the most violent prisoners in the country? It is their behaviour that was the cause of the riot.

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend makes his point with great clarity and I need not add to it. I agree with him. I shall be seeing the report of what happened last night and I am delighted that it was handled so swiftly and efficiently.

Q3. Mr. Clelland: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 21 January. [10388]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Clelland: Will the Prime Minister accept some facts about the national health service? The Royal Victoria infirmary in Newcastle has turned away 23 children in need of intensive care beds in the past three months, including a 20-month-old baby who had to be taken 120 miles north to Edinburgh. If we add to that the case of my elderly constituent who, tragically, died after being driven 40 miles south to Hartlepool because there were no beds available in Gateshead, surely even the Prime Minister can see why the Tories are no longer trusted with the national health service.

The Prime Minister: Of course I cannot respond immediately to the individual cases that the hon. Gentleman raised—if he had wished me to do so, he would doubtless have given me notice of them—since literally hundreds of thousands of people are treated in the national health service every day. The hon. Gentleman gave some facts about the health service; perhaps I can give him some. We now spend £724 for every man, woman and child in the country compared with £444 in 1979. [Interruption.] It is nice to see that the mouth of the Humber has returned from Hong Kong.

The hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) will also know that, each and every year since 1979, there has been a significant real-terms increase in resources in the health service. More people are being treated and there are more doctors, more nurses and better and wider treatments. That is a success story and, try as it might, the Labour party—the Labour party is certainly very trying—will not be able to damn the success of the national health service.

BILL PRESENTED

Regulation of Diet Industry

Mrs. Alice Mahon, supported by Mrs. Ann Clwyd, Mrs. Audrey Wise, Ms Dawn Primarolo, Ms Jean Corston, Ms Diane Abbott, Mr. Tony Banks, Mr. Ken Livingstone, Ms Clare Short, Mrs. Helen Jackson, Ms Mildred Gordon and Ms Harriet Harman, presented a Bill to regulate the diet industry; to bring all medicines relating to diets under control; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 28 February, and to be printed [Bill 72].

United Kingdom Membership of the European Union (Referendum)

3.32 pm

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide for the holding of a referendum on the United Kingdom's membership of the European Union.

The question I propose is whether we should renegotiate our membership, limiting it to trading arrangements, or pursue full integration, probably with a single currency. The Bill does not advocate leaving Europe.

In another place on Friday, quite by coincidence, the noble Lord Pearson, with cross-party support, will propose the repeal of section 2 of the treaty of Rome—which, incidentally, would allow renegotiation to take place.

It is 22 years since the last referendum on this subject, and a great deal of water has gone under the bridge since then. The issues that concern us today were not even mentioned then. Then it was about trade, but today the issues are far more political, and impinge far more on the everyday lives of our constituents. Indeed, at the weekend Mr. Santer was putting forward sweeping proposals for social changes and intervention, which would affect the matters on which the election will be fought—health, education and so on.

Parliament is no longer sovereign as it once was. However the small print of Rome was written, it was not explained in detail to the British people at the time, and now the chickens are coming home to roost.

Everywhere I go in my constituency of Billericay—which now includes a large slice of Basildon, incidentally—in the pubs and clubs, the supermarkets and the high street, people do not complain to me about the health service—they think it is splendid. Nor do they complain about the schools—they are excellent. They are delighted that, for example, more children will be able to go to nursery school. The questions they all ask me are, "What are you going to do about Europe? When are we going to get a referendum?" They see a referendum as the only way in which they can have a say on matters they read about in newspapers and see on television every day.

Hardly a week goes by without some row between us and Europe over new legislation that we apparently did not expect and apparently do not want, so it appears very much as though we are at odds with those who are supposed to be our partners. At my local fish and chip shop, constituents see a large banner saying, "Save British fish". They have to go to the nearest supermarket for their meat, because the local butcher—a shop that had been there for 150 years—was closed down because of all the new regulations, which literally prevented him from using his old chopping block and the knives that his father and grandfather had used. The butcher could not afford the new regulations—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House will come to order and hear the hon. Lady properly. Any hon. Member who wants to oppose the Bill can do so, but there is a time to do so, and it is not while the hon. Lady is speaking.

Mrs. Gorman: Many of the regulations originate in European directives, and they are killing small enterprises. The list goes on and on. My constituents bitterly resent that, but they feel impotent to do anything about it. Most of the time, we seem to be at daggers drawn with people we call our partners. My constituents know no other way of reasserting what they consider to be the rights of the British people except to say, "Can we have a referendum to put our point of view across?" [Interruption.]

This is not a party political, but a national, issue. I must tell the hon. Members on the Opposition Benches who are busy chortling that many people have told me that they are normally Labour voters but will vote for me because I stick up for them on the European issue and put their point of view across. Those hon. Gentlemen may be laughing on the other side of their faces when, at the next election, Basildon again declares its results early and returns a Conservative Member of Parliament.

In a recent poll carried out by a national newspaper in my constituency, 64 per cent. of people said that they would totally oppose giving up the pound, and others said that they would like to get out of Europe altogether—my Bill does not advocate that. There has been a massive shift in public opinion.

One constituent, putting it his own way, said, "Who wants pockets full of bottle tops instead of good old British money?" [Interruption.] Hon. Members may laugh, but the new currency would mean 15 new pieces of paper and metal, none of which would equate to the current values of coins and notes. People would have to learn a new financial language. When we introduced decimalisation, people had a lot of trouble with that—Chancellors might not have done, but the people did. We will have even more trouble if we go ahead with this scheme.

Sometimes it behoves the people who are barracking or chortling away on the Opposition Benches to remember that these grandiose schemes boil down to their effects on the lives of ordinary people. The utopian ideas of Brussels sometimes end up as Essex man's bankruptcy petition. The idea that a single currency is the only way in which European trade can proceed is totally absurd. I hope that we can gain a commitment that we will not go ahead with that silly idea.

The views of most hon. Members are well known, especially to you, Madam Speaker, because you have to call us in the few European debates we have; but we do not know what the bulk of our 58 million constituents think about Europe these days. We are in the run-up to a general election and all parties are setting out their stalls, but there are very few discussions about Europe, which is the issue that I know that my constituents want me to bring to the attention of the House.

We cannot run away from or keep a lid on the issue of Europe. A referendum may not be ideal, but it is the only way I know of finding out what people want and giving them that outlet. When all the parties have similar views on Europe, Dicey tells us that extremist parties arise. He says that, to solve the problem, we should have a referendum, and that is what I am calling for today.

Madam Speaker: I call Mr. Denis MacShane to oppose.

3.40 pm

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. [HON. MEMBERS: "Now you've had it."] Forgive me, Madam Speaker.

I do not think that, in pure terms, the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) will find much opposition to her Bill, because for some time it has been the policy of the Labour party and of the official Conservative party to put to the people the question of continued membership of the European Union or the specific question of a single currency. [HON. MEMBERS: "That is not the same thing."] It is not the same thing at all, but were that simply the technical debate before us, the Bill would not be worth opposing.

It is a paradox that the hon. Lady, in defending the sovereignty of Parliament, is proposing to remove from Parliament its sovereignty to decide a great question. It is also perhaps a paradox that she, who has often gone through the Division Lobbies in her long years as the hon. Member for Billericay to remove from many British people—from local authorities, civil society organisations, trade unions and others—the right to decide for themselves in various areas of their lives and activities, should now complain that Britain has to share some of its power with our partner nations in Europe.

The hon. Lady is, however, an adornment to the House, and I think that it is fair to say that we all love her—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."]—but she is about to hear the iron maiden of truth clamping around her farrago of fantasy and misleading information. She may be the chirping chimpanzee presenting the Bill, but behind her are organ grinders with a deeper purpose.

The motion concerns not only a technical debate on a referendum: it is the opening shot of a campaign to get Britain out of Europe. I wish that every business man and every ally of our country was here today, so that they could understand the deep, persistent and unbridgeable divisions in the Conservative party. At home and abroad, the Conservative party is seen as profoundly anti-European.

I am not interested in Tory divisions. We shall see whether the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) and the right hon. Members for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) and for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont), all of whom are in the withdrawalist camp, come to vote today, and whether members of the Cabinet who are busy issuing anti-European manifestos turn up to join them.

In the few minutes left, I want to put a positive case for Europe, because I believe that continued British membership of the European Union is vital for our trade and security, and for consolidating democracy. As a great trading country, we sell more to France than to all the Commonwealth countries put together. We sell more to the Netherlands than to Korea, Taiwan, Singapore and China put together. Every pound of inward investment into the United Kingdom, such as the Nissan jobs announced yesterday, comes because we are part of the world's biggest trading community.

To the east of the Community, we have an enormous new opportunity as countries such as Poland, the Czech Republic, Slovenia and Hungary post east Asian levels of growth. They are clamouring to join the Europe from which the hon. Member for Billericay, and her referendum supporters such as James Goldsmith, wish us to become semi-detached.

It is no coincidence that the leaders of the new democracies in eastern Europe, as has been said by Gyula Horn, the Prime Minister of Hungary, are prepared to alter their judicial, legal and social norms to become part of the EU. They understand that pooling sovereignty and sharing power are essential prerequisites for the new international global economic order. We are doing that through the World Trade Organisation, and it is sheer fantasy to imagine that we can start to withdraw from the EU and have an à la carte, pick-and-choose Europe. We may pick the things we want; the rest of Europe will pick what they want, or do not want from us.

Britain has always been an open, free-trading, welcoming nation, and we cannot turn from that path. The hon. Member for Billericay and I had a discussion on the BBC yesterday. She asked whether the British people really wanted to take orders from people with foreign-sounding names. She should be careful about that, because among the Cabinet, among the fathers and grandfathers of the Cabinet, and among Opposition Members, there are plenty of foreign names. The best of the British tradition has been when we have been open to every possible foreign influence.

The problem is only in Britain. As hon. Members tramp around Europe, as many of us do, we find that of course there is a debate on economic and monetary union and the technical modalities, on reform of the common agricultural policy and on security and immigration policy. However, everyone asks me how Britain can have open borders with Ireland, a sovereign republic with which we have many differences, when we put up so many obstacles to people visiting from France or Germany.

It is only in Parliament that we hear the rising clamour for withdrawal. The hon. Member for Billericay has many friends in the media; much of the press is on her side. People who put the positive case sometimes have difficulty in getting their voices heard. Even some of the pro-European newspapers are like foxes running from covert to covert, trying to find a policy on which to settle.

However, there are many Government and Opposition Members who will not allow the distortions and dishonesties of Goldsmith and his followers to go unchallenged. Our country has seen that tradition before: the tradition of hostility to faraway places of which we know little, and foreign-sounding people we do not like; of isolationism; of appeasing forces operating from some hacienda or bunker that tell us what to do.

I believe that the House, and the country, will not have that. That is why I am not frightened of a referendum or of the forthcoming general election, in which the party that stands clearly for a positive Britain in Europe will win handsomely, and the party that is divided, unsure, isolationist and frightened of Europe will be defeated.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 19 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business):—

The House proceeded to a Division.

SIR TEDDY TAYLOR and MR. BILL WALKER were appointed Tellers for the Ayes but no Member being willing to act as Teller for the Noes, MADAM SPEAKER declared that the Ayes had it.

[Mr. Denis MacShane]

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mrs. Teresa Gorman, Mr. David Trimble, Mr. Tony Benn, Sir Teddy Taylor, Mr. Christopher Gill, Mr. Austin Mitchell, Mr. Edward Leigh, Sir Richard Body, Mr. Rupert Allason, Mr. Graham Riddick, Mr. Richard Shepherd and Mr. John Wilkinson.

UNITED KINGDOM MEMBERSHIP OF THE EUROPEAN UNION (REFERENDUM)

Mrs. Teresa Gorman accordingly presented a Bill to provide for the holding of a referendum on the United Kingdom's membership of the European Union: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 31 January, and to be printed [Bill 73].

Opposition Day

[3RD ALLOTTED DAY]

National Health Service

3.53 pm

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I beg to move,

That this House expresses its deep concern at the grave situation now evident in the National Health Service in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland; believes that anxiety about Her Majesty's Government's policy for this situation now transcends party lines; notes with alarm that throughout the United Kingdom beds have been cut, operations are being cancelled, intensive care beds are unavailable, and emergency services are under intolerable pressure; believes that the spiralling costs of the internal market—now totalling an extra £1.5 billion a year—and its diversion of resources away from front-line patient care have created these problems; salutes staff of all kinds and at all levels in the NHS who have worked hard to keep the service going; believes that government policy has left many people in urban and rural communities without the access to health care they need, especially in relation to services for the elderly and for those being discharged from hospital after surgery at an increasingly early stage; deplores the way in which many NHS decisions, especially on the future of hospitals and casualty services, are being taken in a manner that does not give due weight to the views of local people; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to set about restoring the NHS as a public service that puts patients first.

The starting point for the debate must be that the national health service is in a serious crisis. It is not just the Labour party which is saying that, but the British Medical Association, the Royal College of Nursing and the report of the King's Fund on mental health services in London. The figures that we published this morning, to which I shall refer later and which were the subject of discussion in relation to the question on paediatric intensive care at Prime Minister's Question Time, also show it.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid–Staffordshire): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way to me so early in the debate. On the subject of crisis, did he see the ITN news last night, when a member of Unison—a hospital worker—having heard the speech of the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), said that if Labour were elected there would be another winter of discontent and the national health service would be in crisis?

Mr. Smith: I like to think that we should be discussing, not one individual's views of what might happen in a year's time, but what is happening here and now. In wanting to address those issues, we share the Secretary of State's views.

A rather plaintive letter from the NHS executive of the South and West region, dated 28 November and sent out to all health authority chief executives, begins as follows:

"The Secretary of State has asked for regular fortnightly briefing on winter pressures. We understand that he wishes to have a full understanding of the pressures the acute services are under during the winter."

The Secretary of State wants information, so let us give him some. Let us tell him, for example, about the waits being experienced in casualty units up and down the country. Let us tell him about Geoffrey Coppin, a stroke victim who spent two and a half days on a trolley in St. Helier hospital. His daughter had to go out and buy pillows at Woolworths to make him comfortable. Let us tell the Secretary of State about Stanley Coombs, a 69-year-old man from Mitcham with chronic lung disease who had a 20-hour wait in casualty at St. George's hospital in Tooting. Those are not isolated examples: they occur time after time around the country.

Let us tell the Secretary of State about those people who, owing to long casualty waits, eventually feel forced to opt for private medical treatment to shorten their wait. Let us tell him about Mary Vaughan, an elderly pneumonia sufferer. After she had spent 21 hours on a trolley in St. Helier hospital, her son paid for a private bed for her at St. Anthony's hospital, Cheam. Mildred Brown, a 77-year-old with a broken ankle, had an eight-hour wait at Wythenshawe hospital and finally went to the private Alexandra hospital in Cheadle. Why should people who have paid into the national service all their working life now have to use their last pennies to pay for private care?

Let us tell the Secretary of State about the new experience of people who are waiting not just on hospital trolleys in casualty departments, but on ambulance trolleys. At the end of December, patients at Llandough hospital near Penarth in south Wales had to wait 45 minutes on ambulance trolleys before being admitted because accident and emergency staff were swamped. As a result, ambulance crews had calls backing up because they were tied up at the hospital waiting for trolleys to become free.

Let us tell the Secretary of State about the patients being discharged too early—the patients being sent out from Bristol royal infirmary in the middle of the night to make way for emergencies that the hospital could not accommodate. Let us tell him about the search for intensive care beds around the country. A child was taken to Sunderland general hospital with breathing difficulties, but because no intensive care beds were available in Tyne and Wear he had to be driven 120 miles to Scotland to find a place to be treated. Edna Harrison was treated at St. James's hospital Leeds after suffering a heart attack. She was unable to be admitted because all 13 intensive care beds were taken. She was then taken 60 miles by ambulance to Hull after two hospitals were unable to find her a bed. Those are examples of the search around the country for beds in accident and emergency or intensive care units.

Let us tell the right hon. Gentleman about cancelled operations—about Queenie Harrild, the 69-year-old heart operation patient from Lewisham who died after her operation was cancelled four times in 11 days, or about the 3,000 non-urgent operations cancelled or postponed at the Royal Devon and Exeter hospital, including in some cases patients in severe pain. Four major hospitals in Wales are now closed to non-emergency cases. In Nottingham, the Queen's medical centre has said that only emergency and life-threatening cases will be admitted until further notice. The North Staffordshire Hospital NHS trust has said that all elective surgery has been cancelled until further notice.

That is the reality of what is happening up and down the country, affecting patients and hospitals. For the Secretary of State and the Government to claim that everything is hunky-dory is to fly in the face of the real experience of real people and real patients.

Mr. Charles Hendry (High Peak): Perhaps I may give the hon. Gentleman another example—that of my father, who was dying of cancer when the last Labour Government were in power. It was not a doctor who decided what he could be fed when in hospital, but a trade union official who decided that he could not be given soup, which he could swallow, but that he would have to be given hard-boiled eggs, which he could not swallow. He died. That is one of the reasons why people like me will never believe that the health service can be safe in Labour's hands.

Mr. Smith: Any such imposition by anyone on any patient is completely unacceptable and no one would argue to the contrary. We argue that the current state of the health service shows that it is not in good hands. The evidence of what is happening to patients clearly demonstrates that. The Secretary of State says that people have long memories, and that is true: they know what the Government have done to the national health service and they will remember it when they come to the ballot box.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Ms Jowell) painstakingly carried out a survey on the state of paediatric intensive care. We talked to hospital after hospital and established the precise figures in each case. The Government have said that the figures are complete nonsense and the Prime Minister airily dismissed them at Prime Minister's Question Time, but they are not complete nonsense: we have a recording of every telephone conversation with every one of the 19 hospitals that provided information and we know precisely how many children each of those hospitals has had to turn away.

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): The hon. Gentleman does not accept the words of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, but does he disagree with the chairman of the British Paediatric Intensive Care Society, Dr. David Hallworth? My right hon. Friend quoted Dr. Hallworth, who said:

"Figures in isolation are pretty meaningless."

Mr. Smith: I disagree with the application of that point to Labour's figures.

Mr. Dorrell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: In an act of unusual generosity, I will give way to the Secretary of State again.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman has made it clear that he rejects the advice of the chairman of the British Paediatric Intensive Care Society—a man who devotes his life to providing the sort of care that the hon. Gentleman is talking about. Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House whose advice he does take?

Mr. Smith: The advice I certainly do not take is that of the Secretary of State, who obviously did not hear what

[Mr. Smith]

I said. I said that I did not agree with the application of that remark to the figures that Labour has produced. The figures were accurate and painstakingly collected—

Mr. Dorrell: They tell us nothing.

Mr. Smith: They actually tell us an awful lot. They tell us that children referred to paediatric intensive care units near where they live and where they can get immediate treatment are being told, by hospital after hospital, that they cannot be seen there. Quite possibly they get a bed somewhere else eventually—100 or 200 miles away—but that is not an adequate response to the needs of very sick children.

Mr. Dorrell: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that no child who needed intensive care and was referred to the emergency bed service was denied intensive care? Will he also tell the House, if that is not the right standard, what standard he would apply to the service?

Mr. Smith: The Secretary of State has quoted one paediatric intensive care consultant to me. I will quote another to him. Dr. Mark Darowski, paediatric intensive care consultant at Leeds general infirmary, says:

"Mr. Dorrell has not learnt the lessons of last winter".

He told the Yorkshire Evening Post on 4 January:

"It is just luck that we have not had another Nicholas Geldard. On New Year's eve there was one paediatric intensive care bed available in the whole of the North of England. We've been operating at 100 per cent. and only luck has prevented the system crashing."

It is all very well the Secretary of State claiming that there have been only 40 referrals to the intensive bed central monitoring unit over this period—nothing like the figures that the Labour party has produced. He ignores the fact that many referrals are made outside the centralised system—

Mr. Dorrell: Successfully.

Mr. Smith: I do not call it success when children have to be carted from one end of the country to the other to find intensive care beds.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): I remind the House that Dr. Mark Darowski was the doctor who admitted Nicholas Geldard to Leeds general infirmary and who had the unpleasant task of telling the child's parents that he had died on his way over the Pennines through a snowstorm. A year ago Dr. Darowski wrote to me drawing my attention to the fact that the regional health authority, just before it was abolished, recommended that the Northern and Yorkshire region needed seven additional paediatric intensive care beds to meet patient demand. Since then, just one has been provided. Surely the Secretary of State must explain how the promise that he gave the House in the spring of last year is to be kept.

Mr. Smith: I have the Secretary of State's words of 6 March 1996 in front of me. He said:

"There is no doubt about the need now to deliver a proper level of paediatric intensive bed space. It will be done".—[Official Report, 6 March 1996; Vol. 273, c. 360.]

Certainly, the Secretary of State organised a report which was published and put in the Library of the House a couple of months after his statement. About 20 more beds were provided around the country—

Mr. Dorrell: Thirty, actually.

Mr. Smith: The latest Library figure was 20. In any event, it is welcome news that more beds have been provided, but it is clear from what happened this winter that we still do not have a proper service. It would behove the Government rather more, instead of trying to bluster their way out of the problem, to admit that the service is not yet adequate and tell us how they intend to make it so.

One of the problems is that the Government do not know what is happening in relation to many aspects of health care. It is interesting that they can now give us precise figures for paediatric intensive care beds. When my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich asked, in a parliamentary question on 12 December last year, how many paediatric intensive care beds there were in this country, the Secretary of State replied that the information was not held centrally. He can tell us how many extra beds the Government have created since his statement of 6 March last year, so perhaps he can now say that the information is held centrally. It is important that it should be held centrally for the proper planning of serious emergency services. I shall return to that point in a moment because it is not the only area in which the Government do not know what is happening.

It may be because the Government do not know what is happening within the health service that they blithely claim that everything is going wonderfully well. I was struck at Prime Minister's Question Time when, in response to an Opposition question about the Government's handling of the national health service, the Prime Minister's final remark was that this was a success story. How can it be a success story when patients have to wait on hospital trolleys or ambulance trolleys, operations are cancelled, beds are closed, accident and emergency services are in crisis and children are being sent halfway across the country for paediatric intensive care? I do not call that a success story.

The Secretary of State told the "Today" programme this morning that the NHS is improving year by year. I do not call it improvement. In the real world, people who work in the health service are struggling in the face of ferocious odds to preserve a decent service, provision for ordinary people is collapsing, operations are being cancelled in hospital after hospital and in many parts of the country it is now impossible to get elective general surgery before the next financial year.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): This morning I contacted hospitals in Leeds to find out why a constituent of mine who has been waiting 14 months for heart bypass surgery had been sent a letter saying that he could not have the surgery in the foreseeable future, but that if he went to Leicester he could have it in two or three months' time. I understand that all Calderdale patients waiting for heart bypass surgery are in exactly the same position. That is the reality of Conservative health care.

Mr. Smith: That is, indeed, the reality of what is now happening. It is even worse because not only are distinctions made between people in different areas, depending on their hospital or health authority, but distinctions are also made between availability of and access to treatment, depending on the general practitioner. GP fundholders' patients who happen to come under the aegis of Lincoln county hospital can have their out-patient appointments within the following month, but patients of a non-fundholding GP cannot have an out-patient appointment until the next financial year. Not only are people told that they must wait months for operations or out-patient appointments, but they are treated differently even though they have the same medical condition. The health service was supposed to treat people according to need, not according to where they happen to live or the type of GP that they happen to have.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): Is my hon. Friend aware that at Hull royal infirmary the unit which deals with coronary cases is no longer making forward appointments? I am advised that that is because the beds are being used for orthopaedic and medical cases.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend gives me information of which I was not aware, but it adds to the overall picture of the condition of the NHS.

Perhaps the Secretary of State does not realise what is going on, as he has had other things on his mind. One day during the Christmas and new year recess, he popped up on our television screens as the Conservative spokesman on the family. A couple of days later, he popped up on the radio as the Conservative spokesman on the constitution. A few days after that, he decided to give us his considered views on Europe, which do not appear to have done him much good with either wing of his party. While all that frenetic activity was going on, it is small wonder that the NHS was falling to pieces without the Secretary of State noticing.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The hon. Gentleman knows that I share his view that much in the health service is not going right. It is difficult to take an objective view of the aspects that have or have not improved; many aspects have improved. Does he object to the idea that I proposed to him—that we should try to separate the argument from the facts, and that we take out of the political arena an assessment of what the NHS has by way of beds and hospital capacity and what it needs? We should get independent people to examine that, so that we can argue on the basis of objective, agreed facts, and not on the basis of the hon. Gentleman's political views, mine or those of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Smith: I hesitate to point out to the hon. Gentleman that the last time that a supposedly objective examination was conducted, it was carried out by a character called Professor Tomlinson in relation to London's hospital provision. I am not sure that a repetition of that exercise would be helpful. However, I sympathise with the hon. Gentleman's suggestion. A proper assessment of provision across the country, conducted as far outside the political football arena as possible, would be a sensible approach. I am not sure that I would go along with him in saying that everything should freeze while that was under way, but I welcome his approach and look forward to further discussions with him.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): Can the hon. Gentleman confirm that in the dying days of the last Labour Government, which seems a long time ago, as indeed it is, the foundations were laid for the collection and collation of NHS statistics—for example, for finished consultant episodes? How can he therefore take issue with the basis on which the facts are produced?

Mr. Smith: I do take issue with the basis upon which many facts are produced. I have no particular quarrel with using a finished consultant episodes accounting mechanism, provided that it is made clear that it does not refer to the number of patients treated. That is the fatal conflation that the Government always make: they take the finished consultant episodes figures and, because they have increased, claim that the number of patients treated has also increased—ignoring the fact that they do not know how many patient readmissions form part of the finished consultant episode figures.

We have insufficient information about the level of NHS readmissions at present. We should have those figures, as they are good indicators of how well or how poorly patient treatments are working. However, that information is not held. The Government should be more accurate in their language, instead of talking breezily about patient numbers when they are really talking about the number of treatment episodes.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): I can speak from personal experience as I have been a patient in many hospitals over the years. In some hospitals, the readmissions figure can be as high as 20 per cent. on surgery wards. That is a substantial figure which totally destroys the credibility of any statistics produced in that area.

Mr. Smith: Absolutely. A major problem is that the internal market—to which I shall refer in a moment—places intense pressure on hospitals to get patients through as quickly as possible. Inevitably, that means that patients who enter hospital for a course of treatment are often sent home too early—particularly elderly patients who are unable to recuperate as quickly as younger patients. Such patients often receive no proper support at home and are unable to recover properly. As a result, they end up back in hospital four or five weeks later. That is wonderful for the Government's statistics, because they count that readmission as another patient, but the quality of care provided is not good and the overall cost to the health service is increased. That is one way in which the operation of the internal market acts as a distorting pressure on the system at present.

I said earlier that the Secretary of State does not seem to know what is happening in the health service. His lack of knowledge about the NHS is extremely revealing. My hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich tabled a series of parliamentary questions and received a bonanza of answers on 12 December 1996. They showed that the Secretary of State does not have a lot of basic information about the current nature and form of the health service.

For example, my hon. Friend asked about the number of acute hospitals in each health authority area. That is a fairly simple question. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) asked earlier about the number of hospitals that have closed since 1979. Ministers did not know the answer to that question, but perhaps they know how many hospitals the national health service comprises—after all, they are supposed be in charge of the NHS. However, we were told that the information "is not held centrally." When we asked how many community hospitals are in the national health service, the answer was the same. We asked how many ambulances are owned by ambulance services across the country—that is fairly basic information—but we were told that the information is not held centrally. We asked how many acute hospitals have been closed in the past five years—a matter of intense interest to many local communities throughout the country—but again the Government replied that the information is not held centrally.

[Mr. Smith]

Given the promises that the Secretary of State made last March on intensive care and on accident and emergency care, we asked how many intensive care units there are in each health authority area. We were told that the information is not held centrally. The Government do not know how many intensive care beds there are in each health authority area, or how many paediatric intensive care units or beds there are. They do not know the number of nurses who have ceased to practise in each of the past six years or the number of trusts that have cancelled elective surgery until the end of the current financial year.

The Government have placed every possible emphasis on the cost of operations in the health service and on how the internal market will sort it out, but they do not know the average cost of a hip replacement operation in England. Given all that the Secretary of State does not know about the health service, it is no surprise that he presides over a health service that is in such a disastrous condition.

The principal problem, of course, lies in the operation of the internal market, which has led to the fragmentation of decision making and directly to the problems in intensive care and accident and emergency services that we have seen in the past few weeks. It means that there cannot be the overall look that we need and which the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) advocates. It has also led to a loss of beds—a fall of 24 per cent. overall in England since the changes were introduced. The chairman of the British Medical Association council laid the blame for that squarely on the internal market. Hospitals are downsizing their capacity to the minimum, rather like airlines double-booking many of their seats.

The internal market has also led to a distortion of clinical priorities. I will cite just one example—Glenfield Hospital NHS trust, in Leicester, which issued a letter on 7 January to local general practitioners. It is interesting to note that the letter was issued to GPs who are covered by health authority contracting. It was sent only to non-fundholding GPs. Fundholding GPs are exempt from the letter, which begins:

"After several weeks of negotiation, this Trust has reluctantly reached agreement with Leicestershire Health, Southern Derbyshire Health Authority and North Nottinghamshire Health Authority, to restrict services. With immediate effect, for Cardiology and Cardiac Surgery"— we are talking about serious surgery—

"only emergency patients and those potentially breaching the 12 month Patient's Charter guarantee, will be admitted. This restriction will apply until 31st March 1997."

This action is not being taken because of any wish to do so on the hospital's part. The letter continues, and this is the real sting in the tail:

"It does not reflect this hospital's capacity to treat patients. We have the capacity to perform all the work which GPs could refer to us".

Do we not live in a crazy world? We have a hospital which says that it has the capacity to carry out all the work that GPs in cardiology could refer to it. We know that there are patients who need treatment. Yet because of the procedures and rules of the internal market the hospital must close its doors to those patients. The internal market distorts priorities within the health service.

Mrs. Mahon: I spoke earlier about patients from Calderdale who cannot have their operations performed in Leeds. The letter from Leeds General infirmary reads:

"Your local health authority has found a suitable alternative hospital which is . . . the Glenfield Cardiac Unit in Leicester."

It would seem that patients from Calderdale who cannot get into the Leeds infirmary until after July will be taken to Leicester, where local patients cannot be operated upon because a restriction has been placed on their local hospital. That is mad.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend, whose information I did not know, redoubles the force of my argument about the absurdity of the way in which the market system that the Government have imposed on the NHS is distorting the manner in which the NHS operates.

The market system has led also to spiralling bureaucratic costs amounting to £1.5 billion a year. That is the British Medical Association's estimate, not one produced by the Opposition. That is the cost of the bureaucratic procedures of the internal market. That is why our proposals for the replacement of single-practice GP fundholding by locality commissioning, a move from annual contracts to three to five-year agreements, with agreements based on the process of co-operation rather than competition, an end to the system of individual invoicing and reducing to one tenth the number of contracts swimming around in the system, will all help to reduce the bureaucratic costs. The money saved can be diverted into patient care.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington) rose—

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray) rose—

Mr. Smith: I want to make progress because I have given way on many occasions. I shall, however, give way briefly to the hon. Lady.

Mrs. Ewing: Exactly how much money does the hon. Gentleman expect will come from the savings that he has outlined and how quickly will it move into the system? We have heard a clear statement from an Opposition Treasury spokesperson that there will be no additional funding. It is important that we know what is being promised by the Labour party and the time scale involved.

Mr. Smith: As the hon. Lady knows, we have identified an immediate £100 million which, as a start, we shall take from the system's bureaucratic costs. I believe that more money will be available by reducing bureaucracy after that start has been made. The early target is £100 million. I believe that that money can be better spent on patient care.

The answer to many of the problems that we are seeing lies, first, in recognising that there is a crisis. It would help if the Government would admit that they are facing some problems. It would help also if they would stop being quite so complacent and smug as the Secretary of State can sometimes be. Secondly, they need to end internal market procedures, with the distortions that they bring to patient care.

Thirdly, we need to bring back strategic thinking and preparation into the health service. Fourthly, we need to end the inequity between patients that we all too often see. Fifthly, we need to divert money from wasteful bureaucracy and transfer it into patient care. That is the way forward.

The chairman of the BMA council put it rather well on 11 October. This is the leading voice of the medical profession, not the Labour party's voice. He said:

"We are facing the most difficult winter in the NHS since the internal market was introduced."

It is not as though the Government were not warned. He continued:

"We need to reform the market, eliminate the perverse effects of competition, restore co-operation and stability to hospital and community health services and begin the task of rebuilding a comprehensive national service where patients' clinical needs come first".

I do not disagree with any of his sentiments.

What Sandy Macara could not say, but the British people can, is that there is a sixth requirement in order to restore and rescue the NHS, and that is a Labour Government. Labour created the national health service—even the Prime Minister had to accept that this afternoon—in the teeth of opposition from the Conservative party, and a Labour Government will rescue and renew it. The Labour party will fulfil its fundamental aim of restoring the NHS so that it is run not as a commercial business flooded with paperwork—as it has become under the present Government—but as a public service that puts patients first.

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"notes that the National Health Service is providing high quality care to more patients than ever before; congratulates the dedication and professionalism of the National Health Service's staff during the recent cold weather which has placed exceptional demands upon them; believes that the National Health Service requires a growing budget for patient care and therefore welcomes the Health Service Guarantee given by the Prime Minister to increase spending on the National Health Service in real terms in each of the next five years, including an extra £1.6 billion for patient care in 1997-98; and believes that this guarantee reinforces the Government's consistent record of investment in the National Health Service and its professional staff."

The speech by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) shows why Labour is about to lose the fifth general election in a row. The hon. Gentleman seems to believe that all that is required of him on these occasions is to parade a few individual cases that are supported by incomplete facts, make a half-researched charge about the Government's record, wave a shroud, repeat the mantra that Labour will abolish the internal market and base metal will be transformed into gold. He thinks that Labour's claims will be vindicated by that process. His predecessor, the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman), never carried conviction when she had the job. We expected more and better of the hon. Gentleman, but we have been disappointed every time he has come to the Dispatch Box, and we were disappointed again this afternoon.

Labour's approach is best summarised by referring to the war of Jennifer's ear, which was the technique that discredited Labour in the run-up to the last election. It did not work: Labour Members were found out then, and they will be found out again. If they want to be taken seriously on health, they should say what they would do about it. So far, they have shown a taste for the politics of the gutter. They play on public emotions and fear, run down the efforts of the dedicated professional staff of the health service and cover the whole concoction with a thin veneer of synthetic concern. They believe that that will suffice in place of a health policy. It is the politics of perpetual opposition, which is clearly what the hon. Gentleman is preparing for.

I shall consider the issues raised by Labour from the Dispatch Box, and I shall begin with paediatric intensive care. In its press release, Labour says:

"Over 400 children turned away".

That is a grotesque misrepresentation of the facts, and it is specifically designed to cause maximum concern and alarm among parents of young children.

The facts about what has actually happened in paediatric intensive care are clear. Last spring, I assured the House that we would increase the total number of places available for paediatric intensive care, and that is what we have done. There were then 249 beds in paediatric intensive care and high-dependency care, and there are now 279 beds—as I said in May there would be by this time this year. I apologise to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury if he was not provided with those figures. He has my assurance that he will be provided with them if he asks a further parliamentary question. I gave the House an assurance in May that those beds would be provided, and provided they have been. The Government have nothing to conceal on paediatric intensive care.

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Leeds, South): Are those beds going to the regions in which they were promised? I do not think so. I do not think that the Leeds paediatric intensive care unit, about which we have had correspondence, has had the increase that was anticipated. When I visited that unit a year ago it had five beds, but it could have accommodated six at a squeeze. The Secretary of State says that it now has six beds, but it had that capacity before; has it the resources to take care of six beds?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. The hon. Gentleman's question is becoming far too long for an intervention.

Mr. Dorrell: I published the commitments that the Government had given in May last year. There is a published document on the record. If the hon. Gentleman tables a question about the availability of paediatric intensive care and high-dependency care by region, we will provide the information and he can test it against the undertakings that were given at that time. If he again studies the document that I published in May, he should also note the emphasis that I placed on the availability of both bed space and proper retrieval systems, providing ambulances to take children needing intensive care who are in hospitals that cannot provide beds to meet their needs to the hospitals that are best able to meet those needs.

This afternoon, the Leader of the Opposition said from the Dispatch Box that I had given an assurance that every child who needed intensive care would be provided with it in the hospital to which that child reported. I never gave that assurance, and the fact is that no responsible Health Secretary could ever give it. Such an assurance would not be supported by the paediatric intensivists who know how to deliver high-quality care to children in that condition. The service that they want to deliver is based on specialist paediatric intensive care units with proper ambulance services to take children to the units best placed to meet their needs. That is the assurance that I gave the House in May, and it is the assurance that the Government are in the process of delivering.

The doctor whom the Prime Minister quoted at Prime Minister's Question Time is the chairman of the Paediatric Intensive Care Society—the leader of the group of doctors responsible for delivering this service. Let me repeat his words:

"I don't think this should be subject to party political point scoring. To look at something in isolation as they"—

the Labour party—

"are apparently attempting to do is wrong, because it doesn't give the whole picture."

The Opposition motion seeks an all-party approach to some of the key health issues. I accept that, because what I have set out to do in paediatric intensive care is deliver the pledge that I gave the House last spring. I believe that the best measure of the delivery of that pledge is that no child—

Mr. Bayley: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Dorrell: I will finish this point before I give way to the hon. Gentleman. His Front Benchers allege that his party is interested in paediatric intensive care, and I am replying to their concerns.

Last May, I gave the House an assurance that we would establish a proper basis for the provision of paediatric intensive care. Since 1 December, when we established the computer bed clearance system that I undertook to deliver then, not one child has had a need for intensive care confirmed by a clinician and then not been offered bed space. Indeed, since that date 40 cases have been referred to the emergency bed service, and on each occasion we were able to offer at least two paediatric intensive care units to accept the transfer—not just one, but two. I believe that such a paediatric intensive care service, delivered through the national health service, can be seen to be addressing the real needs of children who require intensive care.

I might have hoped that, if the Labour party was seriously interested in the issue, it would—rather than seeking to make cheap party points—welcome the improvement in the quality of the delivery of the service for which the Government have been responsible over the past 12 months.

Mr. Bayley: This afternoon, the Prime Minister told the House that we should not be unduly concerned about 400 children being turned away from paediatric intensive care, because they were all found intensive care beds elsewhere. I am told by the head of a paediatric intensive care unit that, although of course all those seriously ill children were found intensive care beds elsewhere, they were not all found paediatric intensive care beds. Some were placed in ordinary intensive care beds, which are not at all the same thing and which are not designed to meet the intensive care needs of children. Will the Secretary of State clarify the position, and tell the House whether a paediatric intensive care bed was provided for each of those 400 children?

Mr. Dorrell: I remember, when this issue was the subject of intense debate last spring, being engaged in a studio discussion with Professor Sir Roy Calne, who made the clear point that, in his view, the best way of treating a child who did not have access to paediatric intensive care was to provide that child with a place in an adult intensive care unit.

If what the hon. Gentleman says is true, I still rest my case on the proposition that we have put in place an expansion of paediatric intensive care provision—as we said that we would—and the monitoring system for which the Labour party press release calls. In fact, the gentleman whom Labour spokesmen have been so keen to brush aside in their comments this afternoon is the chairman of precisely the monitoring system called for in the press release. We have put all that in place in order to deliver the commitment to parents of young children that children who need intensive care will be provided with such care by the national health service.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Dorrell: I will give way once more on this subject; then I will move on.

Mr. Mullin: I think everyone accepts that it is not always possible for a particular intensive care unit to accommodate a patient, but does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the 120 miles that a 20-month-old child in Sunderland was taken by ambulance was too far? It was a hazardous journey, as the child was having difficulty breathing. On the way back, the ambulance broke down; had that happened when the child was on its way to the hospital, the outcome might have been different.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman says that 120 miles was too far, but I am pleased to say that I am told that the child is now at home, out of danger and making a full recovery. It is rather difficult to argue that the distance travelled was too far if the case has a successful outcome. The hon. Gentleman's argument is undermined by what actually happened.

Mr. Chris Smith: Let me pursue the point a little further. Is the Secretary of State saying that every single one of the 400 paediatric intensive care applicants whom we identified as having been turned away from various units ended up—to his certain knowledge—in a paediatric intensive care bed?

Mr. Dorrell: No, I am certainly not saying that. There are numerous examples of clinicians ringing a paediatric intensive care unit to discuss a case, and then agreeing that intensive care is not needed in that particular case. There are a number of reasons why children are refused admission following telephone conversations of the kind that the Labour party has been counting.

If the Labour party would stop making cheap points and listen to the chairman of the Paediatric Intensive Care Society, the hon. Gentleman would find that the statement on the Press Association wires answers his point very directly. As I have said, there are a number of reasons why cases are not admitted to paediatric intensive care following discussion between clinicians. What I am saying is that if, in the opinion of the clinician caring for a child, that child needs intensive care, I imagine that—failing to find any other bed—the clinician would use the emergency bed service which was established precisely to meet the need he feels he has on behalf of his patient. If we use that test—earlier, I invited the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury to define any other test—40 cases were referred, every one of which was offered at least two options.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Dorrell: I want to deal with other emergency services.

It is true that, since Christmas, the national health service has been under pressure. I do not seek to deny that; it regularly happens during the first few weeks of the year, and it is not difficult to see why the emergency services are affected in that way. There were two weeks of extremely cold weather at the beginning of the year and there has been a high incidence of 'flu. As a result of those developments, some hospitals have admitted emergency cases at roughly double, and in some cases more than double, their normal admission rate for this time of year. The emergency services have been working under considerable pressure and I pay tribute to the doctors, nurses, therapists and managers who kept the service working through that period to ensure that the emergency need was met.

It is not right to seek to create the impression that nothing has been done to meet the peaks of emergency demand that have been experienced over the past few weeks. Plans have been made and acted on to ensure that the health service meets the peaks of emergency demand. This winter, as it does every winter, the NHS has taken the steps that are necessary to meet those emergency peaks. One such step is to delay less urgent cases. If there is a doubling of the emergency admission need at a hospital, the rational response is to delay some less urgent admissions for a week or two. That has certainly been done.

We have also provided short-term extra bed capacity. In Dartford, we provided an extra 33 beds; in Ashford, an extra 40; in St. Helier, an extra 35; in Poole, an extra 18; in Derriford, an extra 11; in Plymouth, an extra 35; in Rotherham, an extra 33; in Doncaster, an extra 38; in Mansfield, an extra 28; in Burton, an extra 16; and in the north-west region we provided a total of 200 extra beds.

Faced with emergency pressures, the health service has acted rationally by deferring less urgent cases and opening short-term ward capacity, as it planned to do when it thought during the summer and autumn about winter pressures and about how to meet the peaks of demand that are experienced at this time of year. Some other responses have been set out by the National Association of Health Authorities and Trusts in the press release issued this morning which deals with the winter emergency in the health service.

I had hoped that, as that was the subject of the Opposition debate, they might refer to what health authorities and trusts have done to meet the winter peak of emergency pressure. There is a page and a half of specific changes that have been made by health authority and trust managers to meet those peaks. The Opposition have not referred to that report by NAHAT, because, although the health authorities have been under pressure, the report concludes:

"Undoubtedly, despite the problems, the service generally has been maintained".

Faced with emergency peaks, the NHS has taken action to respond and, overwhelmingly, the story is of the service meeting the emergency need that has been placed upon it.

Mr. Burden: The Secretary of State says that all the right preparations were made. If that is so, why did his Department get into such a pickle over 'flu vaccine? Apparently it did not order enough vaccine and issued instructions to hospitals to be careful about which members of staff it was given to, to ensure that enough was available for patients and old people. Is not the result that when 'flu increased—as it is likely to do in winter—more staff than necessary went down with it and there was more pressure on staff numbers and patient care suffered? Why were there no preparations for that? It should have been easy for anybody to predict what would happen during the winter months.

Mr. Dorrell: The 'flu vaccination programme has been running for many years and, rationally, focuses on those who are at risk. Of course, we all run the risk of experiencing a bout of 'flu, but for most of us there is no serious health risk associated with it. For the elderly and others for whom a serious health risk is associated, 'flu vaccination is available. The health service has pursued that policy for many years.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I welcome the steps that have been taken since March to improve paediatric and general intensive care. On the best current information, what is the Secretary of State's assessment of whether there are enough paediatric intensive care beds to ensure that no parent runs the risk of his child not being admitted, which is what we all wish? Are there enough intensive care beds throughout the country? If the answer to the second question is yes, something is wrong when people die in hospitals such as Guy's in my constituency after being told that there is no intensive care bed there. The right hon. Gentleman's answer would enable us to judge whether we have arrived or whether we are still on the way to providing the service that the NHS should supply.

Mr. Dorrell: The problem with the hon. Gentleman's question is that it implies that there is a final answer to these problems, and that is not the case. He asked whether we have arrived. Last spring, I took the best advice available on the extra intensive care places that were needed to deliver the service that I wanted. I also set up a process for continual assessment. The gentleman who has been quoted so much in the debate is responsible for the special committee that is analysing the current situation and for producing a report that will allow us to project the question further and see what, if anything, needs to happen next.

Our analysis last spring led to the conclusions that I announced at that time. They were widely welcomed in the field and they have been delivered. The Government have made clear their commitment to an expansion of the adult intensive care service. That is why I made two announcements following the Budget. First, I announced a targeted fund to support the growth of intensive care facilities, and especially such facilities for adults, in the next financial year. Secondly, just after Christmas I announced a £4 million fund to bring forward that expansion of intensive care into the current financial year. I announced the distribution of the money and said that it would be used to deliver almost 100 extra adult intensive and high-dependency beds in the last quarter of this financial year. The process is one of growth and assessment of need, but we can never reach the final destination, which is what the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) implies in his question.

Mental health is a key part of the national health service. The hon. Member for Stockport (Ms Coffey), who is no longer in her place, said that for too long, under Governments of every political complexion, mental health has been the Cinderella service of the NHS. But the Government have raised the priority of mental health and we have made clear our determination to improve the quality of the mental health care that is delivered by the NHS. We have not merely accepted the central recommendation of today's King's Fund report, but have announced our intention to implement it as soon as that is possible, on 1 April.

From that date, the NHS cash distribution formula will reflect the differing needs of different parts of the country for community health services. That central recommendation of the report has been implemented and will lead to increased resources being targeted at mental health problems, especially in inner London. That is the latest of a series of initiatives over the past few years, the effect of which has been to strengthen the commitment and raise the priority that the health service attaches to mental health.

The mental illness specific grant, introduced six years ago, is now supporting about £100 million of extra expenditure by social service departments on mental illness provision. The national health service challenge fund, which I introduced for the first time in the current financial year, has been extended into next year and will then be supporting £25 million of new expenditure by the NHS.

In this year's Budget, I introduced a special fund to improve the provision for mentally disordered offenders, which is a particular problem in inner London, particularly east London and south-east London. That is a targeted fund addressing one of the specific needs identified by the King's Fund report. As is now widely known, within the next few weeks the Government will introduce a Green Paper canvassing options for the strengthening of the management of the mental health service.

I have never made any secret of my recognition of the fact that, under Governments of all political complexions, mental health services have not been accorded the priority that we should have seen over the past few years. That is a weakness that the Government have acted to remedy, and I had hoped that the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury would welcome that.

The Labour party's charges on the health service do not add up, but there is something more serious than that about the speech of the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury: as everybody knows, this Parliament does not have much longer to run and, when the election comes, the electorate will ask both major parties and the Liberal Democrats about their policies. Behind all the bluster and cases such as Jennifer's ear and the updated version of that, they will want to know the health policy that the Labour party is offering to the people of this country. When that is the question asked, we are faced with a gaping void.

The first question must be about money. Let me remind the House of the Government's record on financial support for the health service. Since 1979, there has been an increase of roughly three quarters in the real budget available to the NHS. That represents 3 per cent. real-terms growth on average every year over the past 18 years. That is the Conservative's record of commitment to the NHS. I remind the House again of the Prime Minister's pledge to our party conference to continue real-terms growth year on year on year through the five years of the next Parliament.

We then come to what the Labour party offers in reply. The editorial of The Guardian said that the Labour party

"needs to match the Tory spending promise. Honouring next year's settlement is meaningless—Labour can hardly take away money already promised. What it must do is match the Tory five-year promise: real increases, year on year on year."

That is the challenge that comes from a newspaper that Labour must be hoping will support it in the general election campaign. The same challenge is posed by Conservative Members and Liberal Democrats and all around the community. They want to know whether the Labour party will set out clearly its commitment to a real, growing national health service. The Labour party never answers that question. It dodges and fudges and finds a formula to get around it, but will it answer it? Will it hell. That is the question that will be asked by every elector in every public meeting attended by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury. They will be asking him why he will not match the Tory party pledge for a real growth in the national health service.

Mr. Chris Smith: It would help if the right hon. Gentleman and his Government had not already broken that pledge. The Red Book shows that they have.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman keeps saying that, but it is absolute nonsense. The Red Book sets out clearly—I can give the hon. Gentleman the correct reference—a budget that represents real growth year by year, throughout the three years of that spending programme. Furthermore, I can give a commitment that there will be real growth of the health service budget through not only the three years of that spending programme but the remaining years of the next Parliament. That is the commitment that we have given and delivered through 18 years. We give the same commitment for the five years of the next Parliament and the Labour party will not match it.

Ms Jean Corston (Bristol, East) rose—

Mr. Dorrell: I will give way when I have finished dealing with the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury on funding.

When Colin Brown was writing in one of the health service magazines recently, he said that the Labour party

"should fight again to keep the Tory promise alive for future years so that he"—

the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury—

"can promise that every year, year on year, Labour will increase spending on the national health service in real terms. I bet he can't."

Well Colin, no bets, because that is a pledge that the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) will not allow the Labour party to make.

Ms Corston: Does the Secretary of State accept that the people of Bristol will judge the Government on their record, not just on the rhetoric of Front-Bench spokesmen? On the night of 5 January, 10 patients at Bristol royal infirmary were asked to get out of their beds after 10 o'clock at night because their beds were needed for other patients who were waiting on trolleys. One of them was a man in his 80s. The patients were sent home in taxis or relatives were asked to collect them, sometimes as late as 2 am when the temperature was minus 2 deg. That has received widespread publicity in Bristol and has caused a great deal of anger. Is the right hon. Gentleman surprised that people do not believe him when he denies that the health service is in crisis?

Mr. Dorrell: It is not me they will not believe; it is the Labour party. The hon. Lady is trying to make me return to discussing individual cases. I will not do that. The challenge for the Labour party is to demonstrate how it will deliver a health service that matches the Government's pledge.

It is not only a matter of total spending levels. There is worse to come when one thinks about the implications for the health service of the commitments that Labour has given. As I said at Question Time, the Labour party is committed to abolishing compulsory competitive tendering in the NHS. Such tendering is currently estimated to save £90 million on the health budget. Within the budget, which will not be growing because the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East will not allow it, the Labour party has to earmark £90 million to pay off its trade union paymasters through the abolition of compulsory competitive tendering.

The Labour party is also committed to the introduction of a minimum wage. When the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) held the health brief, he was honest enough to admit that that had a cost attached to it. He put that cost at about £500 million. I look forward to hearing the up-to-date estimate from the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury. The hon. Gentleman was chiding me about not knowing every detail of what goes on in the health service. If he can break off his private conversation with his hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Ms Jowell), he might be able to offer the House an estimate of what he believes the minimum wage will cost the health service. Can the hon. Gentleman improve on £500 million? Can he offer any analysis? He must have made an analysis. I can offer him the full resources of my Department and any information that he needs to provide an accurate assessment of the cost of that commitment to the NHS.

The cost of that commitment is an important element in the choice that the electorate have to make. If the hon. Gentleman has not thought of that, I look forward to the correspondence that will enable us to develop a figure that we can then debate. We can then know whether that commitment will be a sensible use of health service money and whether it reflects a sensible priority in the frozen budget that the hon. Gentleman will have to put up with.

An issue that will be of considerable concern to many of my hon. Friends and their constituents is what is to happen to the private finance initiative. The Government have made it clear within their spending plans that they are determined to deliver a major investment programme for the national health service through the PFI. We have already signed up 43 schemes with a total spend of £317 million. A further 28 schemes have been approved with a total value of £309 million. There are 150 schemes being worked up by individual trusts under the PFI. The health service investment programme for the period ahead is £2.1 billion, to be provided by private sector partners through the private finance initiative.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Is my right hon. Friend willing to comment on the private finance initiative in relation to West Middlesex University hospital, which, as he and the Under-Secretary are well aware, is a matter of eager and enthusiastic interest to my hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Deva) and to me? We very much hope that the scheme can go ahead lickety-spit without delay. Can he give us any encouragement on that matter, which is important for our constituents, so that the existing, old hospital can be replaced?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is right to raise his constituents' concerns about that hospital. He will know that it is one of the many schemes that local managers are preparing to meet real local need with health authority support and that the Government are determined to see carried through to projects that modernise the capital stock of the health service. I can give him every encouragement that the Government are determined to carry that through.

The question whose answer my hon. Friend and his constituents will want to hear from the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury is: what would be the implications of a Labour Government for that investment programme, which is valued at a lot more than £2 billion to the future of the national health service? Will the hon. Gentleman carry on with the private finance initiative, in which case he will have to eat mountains of words—both his own and those of his hon. Friends—or will he honour those words and scrap the schemes, so that they too have to be financed out of the frozen budget that the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East will not let him increase?

[Mr. Dorrell]

I know what is being said to the electorate in my home town of Worcester on that subject—once again, by the right hon. Member for Livingston. The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury ought to have a word with the right hon. Member for Livingston, as when the latter travels around the country he appears to be rather too honest for his hon. Friend's good.

When the right hon. Member for Livingston recently visited Worcester, he made it crystal clear that, if the Worcester scheme went ahead before election day, as I know the citizens of Worcester hope, Labour would honour it; but if the contract was not signed by election day, it would go out the window. Bad luck to the citizens of Worcester. For them, the slogans are, "Vote Labour. Ditch your local hospital scheme" and "Vote Labour. Cancel your hospital project". Those are the slogans on which the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury will go to the country, because he has no public capital—the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East will not provide it—and he is not committed to the future of the private finance initiative, so he will not get it from that source either.

Every scheme that is not signed up before election day will be out the window, because the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East can offer no hope that the schemes will go ahead. It is a good vote-winning message for the Tory party: "Vote Labour. Ditch your local hospital".

Mr. Gunnell: The Secretary of State has told us about the 43 schemes totalling £317 million. Can he tell me in how many of those schemes work has started, which scheme is most advanced and how much money has been spent on it?

Mr. Dorrell: Thirty-two have been finished.

The final question is one that Labour has invented for itself. It goes to the heart of the structure of the modern national health service. When we introduced local management, the Opposition fought us every inch of the way. The present Opposition Chief Whip said that Labour was

"implacably opposed to the provisions for hospital trusts outlined in the White Paper."—[Official Report, 11 December 1989; Vol. 163, c. 696.]

The present Labour spokesman on education said, "We will abolish trusts."

Mr. Chris Smith: Before we move too rapidly away from the private finance initiative, will the Secretary of State confirm one or two things? First, he told the House more than a year ago that every month from then on he would announce a major new hospital scheme under the PFI. Will he admit that no such hospital has been confirmed in that intervening period? Secondly, will he confirm that in the case of the Norfolk and Norwich hospital, which was announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Budget and was the only major hospital scheme supposedly signed up under the PFI, although the contract with the contractors has been signed, the finance has not yet been finalised? Will the right hon. Gentleman also draw a conclusion from that about how much trust the people of Worcester or anywhere else can put in this Government to come up with actual bricks and mortar, rather than windy rhetoric about the hospitals that they are going to get?

Mr. Dorrell: As a citizen of Worcester, I was eager to give the hon. Gentleman the opportunity to clarify Labour's policy about the projects that rely on the continued commitment of the Government to the PFI. The citizens of Worcester need have no doubt about this Government's commitment. We are determined to deliver hospital projects through the PFI. What the citizens of Worcester—myself among them—want to hear from the hon. Gentleman is whether he is committed to those projects or whether all the £2 billion plus of projects being carried forward under the PFI would be ditched if there were a Labour Government. If that is the Labour party position, the hon. Gentleman owes it to the electorate to make it clear. Will the schemes go ahead under the PFI? Will the hon. Gentleman produce the money from the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East, or are we talking about taking £2 billion out of patient care to allow those hospitals to go ahead? Or—by far the most likely option—are we talking about schemes that will go out the window if the country is misguided enough to elect a Labour Government?

Sir Raymond Whitney (Wycombe): In pursuance of that question, to which my right hon. Friend has conspicuously had no answer from the Opposition, will he remind the House that, over five years, the last Labour Government cut capital spending on the health service by 28 per cent? Does that not give us a clue to the answer to the important questions that my right hon. Friend poses?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is right. It was not merely the capital budget that the last Labour Government cut, however. When nurses are considering the prospects under a Labour Government, they might remind themselves that nurses' pay fell in real terms by 3 per cent. and doctors' pay by roughly a quarter under the last Labour Government. That is what the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East has got lined up for the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury. The right hon. Gentleman is refusing to provide him with any money for the national health service.

Mr. Gerry Steinberg (City of Durham) rose—

Mr. Dorrell: I have given way a great deal and I think that the House will want me to get through my final point.

The final question is one that Labour has invented for itself. Labour fought local management and trust management in the health service. Now the Opposition say that they are in favour. At the same time that they fought the introduction of local management of hospitals, they were also fighting the introduction of the purchaser-provider arrangement. The present shadow education spokesman said in 1993, which is not that long ago:

"I am vehemently against the notion, currently in vogue, of splitting administrative responsibility for health from delivery of care—divorcing regulation from provision."

That was the position of the Labour Front-Bench spokesman a little more than three years ago. The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury has changed that and I give him credit for it. He is now in favour of the purchaser-provider split—the fundamental change that was introduced in health service administration in 1991. He cannot persuade his party that he is in favour of it, however, so he has invented a new distinction: he distinguishes the purchaser-provider split from the internal market. We have the ridiculous spectacle of the hon. Gentleman saying that he is in favour of the purchaser-provider split, but against the internal market. Until the hon. Gentleman discovered that distinction, the rest of the world thought that those two phrases meant exactly the same thing. The hon. Gentleman has not begun to explain how he has discovered a difference between those two phrases which have precisely the same meaning. It is a distinction without a difference that makes the hon. Gentleman look totally ridiculous.

Labour is in a state of total confusion. Every time the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury speaks about health, he reveals new depths of his own ignorance. With every passing day, it is becoming clearer that the hon. Gentleman is determined to continue to act like the Opposition spokesman he is destined to remain.

The day of reckoning for the Opposition is drawing near. When the claims that they enjoy making are put under the spotlight, they melt like morning dew, and all that is left is a squalid determination to make political capital out of human misery. It is a sad commentary on the depths to which a once great party has sunk, and when polling day comes, the electorate will treat it with the contempt that it richly deserves.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): I am pleased that the Secretary of State finished by talking about the private finance initiative. Such matters are part of the debate and I want to discuss them.

The title of the White Paper launched shortly before the Christmas recess, "Choice and Opportunity", was rather interesting. My constituents, and people throughout the country, would appreciate a little more choice and opportunity in the national health service than the Government have given them over the past 17 or 18 years.

On the previous two occasions on which I spoke on national health service issues in the Chamber, I mentioned the proposed primary health care centre in my constituency. It was promised on several occasions many years ago by the then regional health authority—now swept away by the Government—and every time that I speak on health service issues, I ask the Government when it will be built.

The delays have arisen because of precisely those matters on which my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) was questioning the Secretary of State: the operation of the internal market, organisational structures in the health service that simply do not work and, most recently, the private finance initiative of which the Secretary of State has been singing the praises today.

The latest but one phase was when the plan to build the centre was forced to go through the private finance initiative. Some time ago, I asked the Secretary of State and the Minister what were the administrative costs associated with processing that health centre, which had not yet been built, through the private finance initiative. The answer was £50,000.

When I asked the Minister what the administrative costs—supposedly associated with a value-for-money exercise—consisted of, I received the usual answer about the information not being held centrally, or something to the same effect. I was therefore referred to the trust, which told me that the £50,000 was spent on consultants' fees. Was the £50,000 well spent? Clearly not, because now we have been told that the project will go ahead with public money, because the private finance initiative did not work.

As a result of that merry-go-round, not only has something that was promised to local people years ago been delayed time and again, but public money that could have been spent on patient care has been put into the pockets of consultants, even though the project was never appropriate for the much vaunted private finance initiative.

That is the reality of the scheme by which the Secretary of State sets so much store. He challenges us on whether we intend to go ahead with the PFI projects, but I would like to know whether they would go ahead in the very unlikely event of the Government being re-elected. The plain fact is that projects promised under PFI do not get confirmed: not one has started in bricks and mortar.

I want to give the Secretary of State another example of how bureaucracy has gone mad in the health service under the Conservatives and of how the PFI is operating. In Birmingham, there used to be several health authorities. Later, we had the North Birmingham and the South Birmingham health authorities, which recently merged, with the family health services authority, into a single authority for Birmingham.

There was a problem with premises, because each of the former authorities had its own headquarters. It clearly made sense, in the interests of patient care and of ensuring that NHS resources were spent appropriately, to rationalise the buildings and save money. The health authority considered the most cost-effective and economical way of providing a single headquarters, and found an appropriate set of offices that was competitively priced and would enable it to get rid of the expensive former premises. In one of its buildings, owned by someone else, it had been given notice to quit, and in another it had installed some tenants to bring in some revenue; and it proposed that the third building could be sold. It was a rounded plan that made economic sense.

The authority sent a costed business case to the Department of Health for moving into the new rented offices. After several weeks, or even months, it received an incredible letter saying that its plan to save money had to be processed through the private finance initiative.

The contents of the letter sound like something straight out of a "Yes, Minister" script. It says:

"1. Thank you for the opportunity to review the above business case. I apologise for the length of time taken in its completion.

2. It is not clear whether the case is an OBC or an FBC. This makes it difficult to decide on the criteria against which it should be assessed. In summary, a number of issues have been raised about the failure to develop the case along the lines set out in PFI in Government Accommodation, economic appraisal issues and more general business case issues (such as failure to consider project risks and project management arrangements). These points are developed below.

3. The status of the document needs to be clarified. Is it an Outline Business Case or is it a Full Business Case? The purpose and requirements of both documents are different.

4. The former establishes the need for the investment and identifies a preferred option (assumed at this stage to be a publicly funded option), whilst the latter evaluates methods for funding the preferred option (based on the results of the PFI procurement process). I presume this is submitted as an OBC. Apart from this difference, an FBC would also address issues centred on the management of the project (ie Benefit Realisation Plan, In-Project and Post-Project Evaluation Plan, Risk Management Plan and Contract Management Plan)."

The letter goes on and on in that vein. It is comical to read, but it is the outcome of that bureaucratic madness. The letter was dated 27 November 1996.

The end result is that the problem of the Birmingham health authority's accommodation is still unresolved. The only reason why it will not be sorted out is the crazy, bureaucratic rules laid down by the Department of Health. If the problem is not sorted out, the health authority will have to move out of the building that it occupies because it has been given notice to quit and does not own the building. It will have to move back to the place that it has sub-let and get rid of the tenants, thereby losing income for the NHS. It will have to pay more in rent than the cost that would have had to be paid had the Department accepted its original suggestion. That is the reality of the bureaucratic nightmare of the Government's way of running the NHS.

One health authority, admittedly a big one, and one set of buildings—how did we get to this stage? Because the health authority was unable to pursue a simple transaction, the health service will have to pay more—money that should be going into patient care. The PFI is not a miraculous way of finding new investment for hospitals, as Ministers and Conservative Members claim. It is an incredibly expensive bureaucratic morass with unclear rules that has not yet produced one hospital, health centre or health service establishment. I am all in favour of attracting private finance to public projects and of proper partnerships, but they must work, they must be clear and they must be designed to do the job. They must not delay things and cost more money.

Earlier, I mentioned primary care. I shall give credit to the Secretary of State for making some attempt to address that in his White Paper, some points of which are worthy of support. It was interesting that he made little reference to the matter in his speech. I am still waiting for an answer to a question that has been put to the Government several times. How do they think that the provisions in the White Paper will work?

The White Paper suggests that general practitioners need not necessarily retain their traditional role of independent contractors in the NHS. They could become employees of other bodies, which would be the contractors to the NHS rather than individual GPs or groups of GPs. It has been acknowledged that GPs could therefore become employees of trusts. There is no problem with that if the trust concerned is a community trust involved in the provision of primary care. However, the Secretary of State has not satisfactorily dealt with the case of acute trusts that wished to employ GPs. A body whose main operation is the provision of secondary care would employ family doctors, whose job is to provide primary care.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Gerald Malone): Let me set the hon. Gentleman's mind at rest. General practitioners are not in the NHS; they are independent contractors. We foresee that they may be able to organise themselves in a different way, either through another body or by coming together to provide services or most likely, as he said, through a community health trust. He asked about acute trusts. The answer, in respect not only of acute trusts but of any other organisation where a conflict of interest might arise in the proposals made, is that the conflict of interest would be recognised and we would not expect such an application to be honoured. Clearly, if there were such conflicts, they would not be desirable.

Mr. Burden: I am grateful for that answer. I shall give way again if the Minister can clarify the matter further. Groups of GPs getting together to provide expanded primary care services is potentially a good development. Labour has been pioneering such developments in talking about local commissioning teams, and local pilot teams have been working. In Birmingham, there are proposals to develop such services. Such a pattern of service would fit more easily with the locality commissioning suggested by the Opposition than grafting it on to the internal market that Conservative Members have imposed on the NHS.

I must press the Minister further on conflicts of interest. I am pleased that he says that if there is a conflict of interest, he would not expect the application to be honoured. Is he saying that acute trusts would not be allowed to employ GPs?

Mr. Malone indicated dissent.

Mr. Burden: If he is not saying that, the Minister is heading down the road of conflicts of interest.

Mr. Malone: I shall say what I said again, because it was perfectly clear. There could be applications where conflicts of interest might arise. If they did, they would be addressed at the time in the light of the individual application. I am not going to rule out an acute trust making proposals. I cannot predict whether there would be conflicts of interest. If there were, they would prevent the proposal from reaching fruition.

Mr. Burden: I am afraid that that is not good enough. It might be just about tolerable if an acute trust employed GPs in its own area, because the pattern of referrals in a given area tends to be static and predictable. Where they can, GPs like to refer patients locally. What if an acute trust tried to contract out of area? That is where conflicts of interest would develop. Such a system could already be in place through the mechanism to which the Minister referred.

What if private health care organisations such as PPP and BUPA wanted to set up a nice little local health centre to employ GPs? GPs would tell the Minister, if he asked them, that there can be pressure on them to refer patients to places that they do not necessarily believe will provide the best clinical services but which are often euphemistically described as the preferred providers. Private patients, perhaps those in insurance schemes, are already affected by such pressure. Currently, GPs can insist that referrals go to the place that they consider to be the most appropriate clinically.

If we move down the road that the Government want to go down, what barrier will there be against a private health insurance firm buying up a local health centre and employing GPs and against the employer putting pressure on its employees—the GPs—to refer patients to places that are not the most clinically appropriate in the judgment of GPs but that are the preferred providers in the interests of the employer? Those issues need to be addressed. I raise the matter today because when the Secretary of State talks of ensuring that there is a primary care-led NHS, I believe that that is what he wants.

The Secretary of State needs to square a circle in order to achieve his goal, but he cannot do that unless he fundamentally challenges the assumptions according to which the Government have operated the NHS. In answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury, he said that no one had ever recognised the difference between the internal market and the separation of the commissioning of health care from the provision of it. I must tell him that most other people have always recognised that difference.

Let me tell the right hon. Gentleman precisely what is the difference—I find it sad that he does not know. If he merely believes that the split between those who plan health services and those who provide them is equivalent to an individual contracting relationship, governed by a financial transaction, he has a problem in ensuring that the NHS keeps to the principles on which it was founded. Those principles are meant to guarantee the provision of health care, free at the point at which it is needed and to ensure equity in its provision. If the relationship between the provision and commissioning of health care is purely governed by a financial transaction, those principles cannot be adhered to. That failure is at the root of the problems of the system that the Government have imposed on the NHS.

A new Government will fundamentally change that relationship. We shall get away from a system under which hospital is set against hospital and, increasingly, area is set against area; patient is set against patient; and GP is set against GP. We want to establish a co-operative framework for NHS planning and provision, which allows decisions to be made at the lowest possible level by those who are best able to make them.

The NHS stands or falls by its own recognition of the fact that it is a national service. It must recognise that each branch is dependent on another, be it the doctor who is dependent on the nurse; the nurse who is dependent on ancillary staff; the GP who is dependent on the secondary care centre; or primary care that is dependent on tertiary care. That patchwork of provision, under which decisions are made locally, should be founded on a co-operative ethos, operating in the interests of the patient. That is different from a system in which the market rules, and that is why the Secretary of State is wrong when he says that there is no difference between the internal market and a system for the commissioning of health care. There is a big difference.

Sir Raymond Whitney: Whether the hon. Gentleman realises it or not, he is proposing to take us back to the system of the 1970s with all its inefficiencies, disasters and total failure sensibly to allot resources because people were not aware of the value of those resources. The hon. Gentleman's propositions show that he has a fundamental misunderstanding of the history of the development of the NHS.

Mr. Burden: The hon. Gentleman needs to read the policy document that my colleagues on the Front Bench have issued about how the NHS will develop under a Labour Government. He will discover that it does not talk about turning the clock back. I agree with him that we need to learn from experience and learn certain lessons about NHS provision. We can learn some lessons from past over-centralisation, but the hon. Gentleman's constituents will be sad if he has not learnt that trying to run the NHS like some glorified supermarket has not been in the interests of patient care, clinicians, or the services. That is at the root of the internal market that has been imposed by the Government.

The end result of that process, which was outlined ably by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury, has been the crisis of provision of hospital beds that we have seen this winter. The system has also failed to provide the required number of paediatric intensive care beds. That has happened not by accident but because of a Government who do not understand, or refuse to understand, what a NHS is meant to be, and how it can be run in the interests of patients.

That lack of understanding needs to be changed. In the next few weeks or months, such a change will occur with the election of a different Government.

Mrs. Marion Roe (Broxbourne): I am as surprised as anyone that the Labour party has called this debate. In doing so, it was surely not unreasonable for those of us on the Conservative Benches to expect, at last, some explanation if not clarification of the Opposition's policies for the national health service. To date, we have had to contend with a mishmash of confusing ideas, coupled with the barest minimum of concrete policy decisions.

The Labour party has had 17 years in which to produce credible ideas of its future vision for the health services. Frankly, so far, the Opposition have failed to do that. Judging by the reaction of the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) to the weekend reports on improving efficiency within the social services, I fear that we might have to wait a long time yet for such ideas.

Once again, we have heard nothing of note from the official Opposition, so once again it has been the Government who have set the pace. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on continuing to run the agenda.

Since the previous full debate in November on the health service we have had a Budget that has more than met the pledge given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to increase year by year the real level of resources committed to the NHS. We have had the Second Reading in another place of the National Health Service (Primary Care) Bill, when the Government were able to describe and enlarge on their policies for important developments in primary care. Since November, we have also seen the publication of the White Paper, "Delivering the Future", which set out some 70 practical proposals to further the improvement of patient care. A number of other important announcements have been made, for example, the allocation of an extra £25 million which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health announced on Christmas eve to aid health authorities and NHS trusts with seasonal pressures. I am therefore proud to support a Government who abide by their commitment to the NHS by thought, word and deed.

Debates on the health service are sadly characterised by selective memories—the last one was no exception. When I prepare my speeches, I do not rely on anecdotal evidence, nor do I try to extrapolate a general picture from a single incident. I turn to the people who can give me an accurate report on the situation. I asked the Queen Elizabeth II hospital, which serves my constituency so admirably, to tell me how it coped in the past few weeks, based on its experiences.

As many hon. Members have already said, the especially cold weather and the 'flu-like illness that took hold over Christmas increased hospital admissions. That happened on top of the already high base line of emergency admissions which, in common with other hospitals in the area, the QE II is experiencing.

The week after Christmas was characterised by an even greater surge of emergency admissions than the typical seasonal influx that traditionally occurs from Boxing day onwards. The hospital saw many people and admitted some 50 patients compared with the average weekly figure for the year of 28 admissions. I would like to emphasise that during that incredibly busy period all elective cancer patient cases continued to be brought. Despite the exceptional number of patients who arrived at the hospital, all were admitted and treated.

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde) rose—

Mrs. Roe: Forgive me, Madam Deputy Speaker, but I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman, who has not been present for the debate. I intend to proceed to put my case on the record.

I repeat that despite the exceptional number of patients who arrived at the hospital, all were admitted and treated. That was achieved first and foremost by the dedication and exceptional commitment of the staff. I pay tribute to them for the personal efforts that were sometimes made over and above the call of duty—that is typical of NHS staff. The situation was complicated by the added pressure of a third of the nurses, who would normally be working, being off ill themselves.

Mr. Graham: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Roe: No, I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman, who has not been listening to the debate. I regard it as discourteous to enter the Chamber and start intervening in the middle of the debate. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham) will not endear himself to the Chair if he persists in making seated interventions.

Mrs. Roe: Many staff were on 24-hour call and more than 100 people—nurses on holiday, staff from other trusts and members of the public—rang in to offer help after an appeal was made on the local radio for nurses to return from holiday to assist. Such was the response that services were maintained despite incredible pressures.

The second reason the hospital was able to cope was the quality of the management. In that period of extreme difficulty, thanks to the powers invested in them by the Government, the managers were able to adopt a flexible and practical approach so that they could tailor their response to the situation, often on a daily basis. The matron, as co-ordinator across the hospital, worked closely with the chief executive on key decisions that had to be made throughout each 24 hours to keep the hospital capable of managing the high volume of patients. The hospital's success depended on good team work.

A team of directorate service managers and the hospital social work team managers met daily to review the situation and to make contingency plans for the next 24 hours. The hospital social workers assessed the patients daily to identify those who would need social care support to be discharged home. As a result, bed blocking was less of an issue. Arrangements were speedily put into place through utilising vacancies that appeared in social care contracts when the social services users had been admitted to hospital. In that way, beds were freed, enabling the hospital to fulfil its prime function of treating sick and injured people. Careful forward planning had already alleviated the hospital's bed blocking problem; whereas last winter the hospital experienced 40 to 50 bed blockers, this winter it experienced its lowest number yet, with 24 bed blockers going through the system.

Team work was also vital in other areas; the ambulance service was a key factor. The director of operations for the Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire ambulance service kept constant contact with the accident and emergency department. In particular, he would give early warning of the surges in patient flows as requests came in from general practitioners and the public for ambulance support. One such example was the notification on 3 January of 19 patients who were to come in two hours. That information was used to introduce contingency plans to deal with the high level of expected admissions. The staff in the accident and emergency department also played their part in effecting the smooth treatment and flow of patients.

The majority of patients were admitted for acute medical conditions. To ensure that appropriate treatment was given as soon as possible and that discharges occurred promptly, all the consultants in the medical team carried out daily ward rounds. With delays cut to the minimum, more treatment could be given to others.

Some contingency measures were taken, such as reopening the ophthalmic unit to provide extra beds; the children's area in the accident and emergency department was temporarily converted into a ward for adults. Children's admissions were then dealt with directly on the paediatric ward. When two emergency admissions were assessed as requiring intensive care, as all the intensive care units were full, the patients were transferred immediately to other units via the emergency intensive bed register. The matron of the Queen Elizabeth II hospital referred to the register as a "godsend" and "smashing" as it saved valuable time and energy by preventing unnecessary ringing round. The arrangements worked both ways: the hospital was able to take a patient from the register into intensive care when a space was available.

It would be unrealistic to think that the efforts that were made to meet a period of great demand could be sustained. However, we are talking about a period of extraordinary pressure in a very short time—and the hospital was able to bear it. The way that the management coped showed the strength of good staff relationships, careful forward planning and strong internal management systems. It showed that the trust had the ability to take and act on decisions quickly. It showed local decision making and a team pulling together at its best. Above all, it proved the Government's good sense in allowing those who manage the hospital the freedom to do so unhindered by central interference.

Mr. Jessel: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. There is a power cut at No. 3, Dean's yard which began earlier today. As a result, secretaries to hon. Members who work there have been unable to carry out their work properly; many of them have called it a day and gone home, to the detriment of the constituents of right hon. and hon. Members. Could you, Madam Deputy Speaker, ask the Serjeant at Arms to report as soon as possible on what has happened and why, and to ensure that heat and light are restored by first thing tomorrow morning without fail?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I know a little about the matter and I think that it is more than a power cut. I understand that there was flooding in the building overnight and, as a result, water has got into the electrical system. I know that the Serjeant at Arms is making every effort to ensure that normal working can be resumed. I also know that Madam Speaker is aware of the situation and is keeping a close eye on it. I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising the matter.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The Serjeant at Arms has many powers, but I am not sure whether he can bring back the power when it goes off.

I welcome today's debate; it is always good to debate the national health service and it is good that the Labour party has chosen it as the subject for the third of its 17 Opposition days in the parliamentary year. At 10 o'clock my colleagues and I will vote for the motion, which has been drafted to win maximum support in the House. I hope that all Opposition Members will support it. If they are true to some of the things that they have said, one or two Conservative Members will also support the motion. If all Opposition Members are present and all Conservative Members are present, there will be a tied vote. I understand that if that were to happen tonight, following the usual precedent, the Government would survive by Madam Speaker's casting vote, although they might not do so on other occasions. It would take a Conservative Member to abstain or to vote with us for us to win—we live in hope.

Mr. Malone: Get on with it.

Mr. Hughes: The Minister has told me to get on with the debate; I am keen to do so, but I want the Government to realise that their hold on the confidence of the House is, at most, very insecure.

The problem is that, although everything in the motion is easily supportable, everything but the last line is criticism of the current position and the last line does not contain a positive proposal. Sadly, yet again, the Labour party, as the Secretary of State rightly said, has been weak on content, weak on performance and poor in attendance. Today is an Opposition day, but there have been more Conservative Members than Labour Members present at all times. [HON. MEMBERS: "That is not true."] It is true: during the Secretary of State's speech, and subsequently, only five, six, seven or eight Labour Members have been present. I have been here all the time and added up the numbers regularly.

Let me take the five points in the motion in turn. First, the Labour party argues that the internal market is the cause of all the problems in the national health service. The internal market, as designed by the Tories, has caused many problems and is the cause of many of the costs and the pressures, but it is not fair to say that it adds to all of the problems of the NHS. Many of the pressures on the NHS are caused by demand that is rising in a way that was not predicted even a few years ago.

I acknowledge that there is bureaucracy that could be got rid of. My colleagues and I have argued that, instead of one-year contracts, there should be at least three-year contracts and I am sure that that would save a lot of time and money. We are opposed to local pay bargaining, because it imposes huge extra costs and distracts professionals from their work. However, even if the British Medical Association is right and expenditure on bureaucracy could be saved by having a redesigned NHS—albeit one that keeps purchasers and providers—and even if that saved the £1.5 billion that the BMA says would be saved, the savings could not be delivered overnight.

The first flaw in Labour's argument is that to give only £100 million over the Government's commitment, but only for the first year, as the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) said, will clearly not begin to answer the public's concerns about the NHS. That is the fundamental flaw and after yesterday's announcement by the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), I have to say that any hopes that the Labour party will deliver the resources that the NHS needs are scuppered, not only for the first year but for subsequent years.

Whereas it has traditionally been the expectation that the Labour party would put more funds into the NHS, now, for the first time, we face a general election when it is absolutely clear that the Tory party is committed to putting in more resources in the near future than is the Labour party. The Liberal Democrats are committed to putting in even more—we have done the sums and we will do it. After the next election, if no single party has a majority of seats—we have committed ourselves to not keeping the Tories in office—we will use our votes in this place to ensure that the Labour party breaks its spending commitment not to put more money into the NHS and that more money is put in. I believe that the public will back us in that.

Mr. Bayley: The hon. Gentleman is wrong to say that the Labour party will not match the Government's spending pledges on the NHS—[Interruption.]—the Labour party has done so. I read with great care his article in The Guardian of 9 January in which he set out the Liberal Democrats' health policy, and it included a number of specific spending pledges, which I asked the statisticians in the House of Commons Library to cost. They tell me that their best estimate is that in 1998-99 the package of measures proposed by the Liberal Democrats would cost an additional £650 million and roughly an additional £1 billion in the following year—it depends on the level of NHS inflation. Given that the Liberal

Democrats have already committed 1p in the pound on income tax to education and given that his 5p on cigarettes will raise only £175 million—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. Members are aware of my views on interventions—they should be short. The hon. Gentleman should seek to catch my eye and make his points in a speech of his own.

Mr. Hughes: The hon. Gentleman did not quite finish, but I shall say that we have made a commitment. I shall be happy to talk to him outside the Chamber and go through the figures, but our commitment is clear. First, we have made a commitment to keep pace with NHS inflation throughout the life of the next Parliament. The Government have made a commitment only to keep pace with ordinary inflation and the Labour party has a commitment to fund only one year—the first year—at the rate of the increase in ordinary inflation. Secondly, we have committed an additional £550 million a year, which, as the hon. Gentleman rightly said, will be raised from 5p on cigarettes, which will raise £200 million to restore free dental and eye checks, and from tax collection from employers through national insurance, which will raise £350 million.

If NHS inflation starts to rise again, instead of decreasing, we will have to address the question of where the money will come from. However, there is absolutely no doubt—we have checked our figures with the Commons Library, too—that an analysis of the present commitments on the table of the three main parties in the House shows that the Liberal Democrats have committed far more resources than the other parties; the Tories are clearly second and the Labour party clearly third in the league table.

Mr. Forman: Does that mean that the oft-quoted remark of the leader of the Liberal Democrats that his party would simply put 1p on the standard rate of income tax to fund its education commitment is not the Liberals' only public expenditure commitment and that the Liberals are also committed to other forms of tax increase?

Mr. Hughes: I do not want to be distracted from my speech, but we shall commit an extra £2 billion for education and if that has to come from an increase in income tax—1p in the pound raises about £2 billion—we shall do that. It depends on how much is in the kitty, how many people are in work, what is the social security budget and other factors, but we shall do it. We are committed to further tax increases in respect of the health service: first, imposing additional duty on cigarettes and, secondly, closing various employers national insurance loopholes. Those are tax increases for specific groups in society—they are not general. Those two specific additional commitments have been agreed by all Liberal Democrat Members and by my hon. Friend the Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), who speaks for us on Treasury matters, and they are supported by my colleagues in Wales and Scotland who recognise the benefits.

I shall now return to my speech and the five points in the motion. Secondly, I pay tribute to the fact that the NHS works because its staff operate extremely well. Throughout the country, they are under great pressure at this time of year and they are doing an extremely good job. I was in the John Radcliffe hospital in Oxford a couple of weeks ago and staff there are coping, although they have had to delay admissions and put off operations so that patients have had to stay in waiting lists. The staff are doing all that they can to manage. This morning, I was at the South Westminster health centre, which is just round the corner in Vincent square and is run by the Riverside Community Health Care NHS trust. It is an excellent health centre and is clearly doing a good job. With one of my colleagues, I went to a large GP surgery in Elephant and Castle, the Princess street group practice, which is doing an excellent job. Queenie Harrild—a constituent of the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mrs. Prentice)—died in Guy's hospital a week ago and that tragic case was mentioned by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury. Her family specifically said that they were critical not of the staff at the hospital, but of the system and the lack of beds.

Thirdly, it is true to say, as Labour says in its motion, that the result of current policy is that "government policy has left many people in urban and rural communities without the access to health care they need".

In urban areas, that may be a lack of an intensive care bed when and where one is needed. In rural communities, it may be a lack of a dentist anywhere near one's residence or a lack of a community pharmacist. In all cases, there is a risk that an individual might find himself or herself discharged too early. The hon. Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston) mentioned the outrage felt in Bristol at people being woken up and sent home from hospital in the middle of the night. Of course, that is what happens to less urgent cases, but that should not be the way in which a publicly funded national health service is run.

Mr. Hendry: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: No, I am conscious that other hon. Members want to speak.

Fourthly, we share the Labour party's view that we need a more democratically accountable NHS. There should be regional health authorities in England, and democratic authorities in Scotland and Wales, to decide on strategic policy. They should decide whether hospitals are needed or not, instead of that being arbitrarily decided by the Secretary of State. At a local level, trusts and health authorities should be more democratic.

Fifthly, we believe that we must restore confidence in the NHS.

We could have tabled no amendment to the motion, or we could have just congratulated the NHS on its successes and paid tribute to the progress that it has made. Certainly, there has been progress both in paediatric intensive care and in intensive care generally. By convention only the Government amendment is selected on such occasions, but I am glad that the two ideas in our amendment were not completely dismissed either by the Secretary of State during questions today or by the shadow health spokesman when I intervened earlier.

First, the public want the NHS to be removed from the party political battleground. I recently appeared on a Granada television programme with spokesmen from the other two main parties, and someone in the audience made precisely that point. Facts, for instance, could be removed from the battleground. We may disagree about funding, but the facts should be agreed—for instance, about how many intensive care beds there are and how many hospitals have closed.

Today the King's Fund issued a report on mental health. It is a well-respected independent body; perhaps we could agree to let it do this statistical work. Before the end of this Parliament, I would hope that the three major Great Britain parties, the Irish parties and the Scottish and Welsh nationalist parties will agree to allow an independent, respected and recognised body to provide us with the evidence on which to base political decisions.

Earlier today the Secretary of State referred to the report by the National Association of Health Authorities and Trusts, the last paragraph of which reads:

"Undoubtedly, despite the problems, the service generally has been maintained, although some elective treatments are being deferred. But however hard the NHS is working, the initiatives taken do not solve the underlying problems of capacity and demand. It can be expected that comprehensive reviews of current clinical and workload practices will be undertaken by health authorities and trusts. But overriding this is the need for a high-level review of both the current position and the implications for the future provision of services."

That is why we need agreement on the size of supply and demand, whereupon the politicians can sort out, and put to the public, the best way of dealing with the problems.

Of course some more funding will be needed. We calculate that if people's lives are not to be put at risk by the closure of beds, wards or hospitals in any part of the country, the finance-driven closure programmes and any consequent reductions of services must be put on hold. Doing that will cost about £350 million a year—perhaps we could achieve all-party agreement about that.

I hope that the other political parties will respond to my twin proposals, to obtain independent information and to provide the money that will stop the running down of services. It is no good Conservative Members claiming that the Tomlinson report or the other reports commissioned by the Government are independent and objective. The Government ordered the reports; their authors reported back to the Government. The Nolan commission is more along the lines of what I have in mind—enjoying the confidence of all Members of the House.

Tomorrow we will debate intensive care, so I do not intend to go into it now—except to comment on the fact that the Secretary of State only partly answered the questions about it. Of course the demand for intensive care will change, but we need to hear from Ministers on the record whether they think that we have enough paediatric intensive care beds and other intensive care beds to meet current needs. I hope that such a statement will be made tomorrow morning in the debate; anything less would be a fudge.

One effect of the pressures on the health service is that many operations are deferred. People sometimes die as a result. The lady I mentioned earlier died of a heart attack which, according to the consultants, she would not have had if a bed in Guy's hospital could have been found for her to use after her heart bypass. Theatre and staff were available, but there was no intensive care bed. Thus someone with more years to live lost her life.

Part of the solution must be to separate elective beds for non-emergency admissions from emergency beds, so as to avoid the problem of those with booked beds being put off while they serve as emergency beds.

Many of us are grateful for the universal recognition today that mental health services have been the Cinderella services of the NHS. Those who lose out most are the people with conditions that are not quite acute but are nevertheless immense. I am told wherever I go that only those who present with the most severe mental illnesses are treated, and that people whose needs are slightly less urgent but still serious do not get the service they require. Hence the need to go on building up these services. A mental illness is an illness like any other; those who suffer from mental illness deserve the NHS just as much. Yet they are often treated as lesser beings. Mental illness can come to any one of us. That is why we should ensure that those who suffer from it are given as much chance to recover as people with physical illnesses.

Another problem arises because health authorities and trusts are eating into next year's budgets to pay for this year's, and this year they ate into last year's. I do not know whether the Government can raid the coffers before the general election; I do know that there is always a contingency fund and that, as the election draws nearer, it is eyed ever more keenly. I hope that the Secretary of State and Ministers at the Department will be able to persuade the Chancellor that as little as £200 million, if released this year, would remove some of the pressures and prevent the perpetual delays in treatment that afflict the service.

When the election comes, it will not be about whether we should have a national health service—all the parties are signed up and committed to one. The debates will be about whether to fund it properly. I therefore end where I began. The job of politicians is to be honest with the public. The NHS will be the brilliant jewel of our welfare state only if we inject it with the necessary amount of public money. That is what will divide the parties at the election. My colleagues and I believe that if we fund health and education properly, we shall have a society that is both well and well equipped. Only that will make us the sort of successful nation that our people want us to be.

Sir Raymond Whitney (Wycombe): I agree with a great deal of what the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) said, especially with his plea for a more sensible debate about how to go on developing and improving the national health service—a debate that will be possible only by removing the political animus from the subject. Unfortunately, the Labour party is incapable of that.

We have heard two depressing examples this afternoon; and at Prime Minister's Question Time there were two more examples of it from the Leader of the Opposition. He made the same tired old claim that "we"—the Labour party—created and built the national health service. To make such a claim shows either total disingenuousness—I must be careful of my language in this Chamber—or total ignorance. I shall do the right hon. Gentleman a favour by suggesting that his claim is based on ignorance. That is not true of the whole party—some Labour Members know perfectly well who created the health service.

I shall take a moment or two to remind those who may conveniently have forgotten that the first step in the creation of the national health service, which took some 40 years—we may lament why it took so long—was taken by a Liberal, Lloyd George, in 1911. It originated with the National Insurance Act 1911. That legislation created sickness benefit, which became known as the medical benefit scheme, and was the kernel of what became the national health service.

Who opposed that measure at the time? It was the British Medical Association. We should remind ourselves of that fact each time we hear from the current Jeremiah of the BMA—over the past year or two it has been Dr. Marks. But there has always been a Dr. Marks at the BMA, opposing virtually every change for the better in the national health service.

In 1918, before the end of the war, the Liberal and Conservative coalition Government launched the Department of Health. It therefore had nothing to do with the Labour party, but was created by the other two parties. I offer that little history lesson because we do not want to hear yet again the nonsense that the Labour party created the national health service.

In the 1920s, Neville Chamberlain, who subsequently became the leader of the Conservative party and the Prime Minister, called for a national hospital service to fuse voluntary and public hospitals, many of which were of an extremely high standard. It could not make much progress because of the economic conditions between the wars, but, in 1938, all those national hospitals were brought together in the emergency medical service. Who did that? It was not the Labour party but the Conservative Government, so that was a Conservative creation.

In 1944, a White Paper laid the basis of what we now know as the national health service. The wartime coalition Government, in which the Labour party participated, had a Conservative Health Minister, Henry Willink, who introduced that White Paper. So let us hear no more nonsense about the health service being the Labour party's creation—[Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell) would like to intervene on this history lesson, I am happy to give him that opportunity.

Mr. John Heppell (Nottingham, East): The hon. Gentleman's account is a little misleading. It would be better if he told us how the Conservatives voted when the national health service was proposed. If he is telling the truth, he will have to say that they voted against the NHS at every stage in this Chamber.

Sir Raymond Whitney: I am happy to come to that. The hon. Gentleman slightly pre-empted me.

Everyone greeted the creation of the White Paper except, again, the BMA and the British Medical Journal. The 1944 White Paper was strongly endorsed at the Labour party conference of that year in Blackpool. I now come to the point raised by the hon. Member for Nottingham, East. No one was arguing against a comprehensive health service, free at the point of delivery. That was not the debate, and if the hon. Gentleman thinks that it was, he is dead wrong. The debate was whether to have a centralised organisation that would become overly bureaucratic or a regionally based organisation. The then Herbert Morrison, who may be familiar to some Labour Members, was very much in favour of the local concept. At the very last minute, Bevan persuaded the Labour Government to go for the centralised version—the one opposed by the Conservative party—and, when Morrison told Bevan that it would become a bureaucratic nightmare, Bevan said, "No, we can find ways round it." Sadly, it has taken us many years—we are not yet out of the wood—to find a way to resolve the problems of a centralised health service. We all know that.

Let me continue with the "Labour party's national health service". Who first introduced prescription charges? There are no prizes for the answer—it was the Labour party. Who, in the 1970s, cut hospital building by 28 per cent. in real terms over four years? It was the Labour party. Who cut nurses' pay in real terms? It was the Labour party. For three years out of four, the pay rises granted to nurses during the period of Labour government were below the rise in the cost of living.

In 1977-78, there was a real cut in spending of 2.7 per cent. That is the Labour party's reputation and record, and Labour Members and the country should never forget it.

Mr. Hendry: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the Labour party's approach of seeking to cut the health service goes back a little further? The first financial crisis in the health service was in 1949—a year after it was started—when the then Labour Cabinet said that, as the health service had been in operation for a year, the population should be healthier, so the money going into the health service could be cut.

Sir Raymond Whitney: My hon. Friend is right. However, in the 10th anniversary debate of the founding of the national health service in 1958, when happily there was a Conservative Administration, the Conservative Minister for Health, Derek Walker-Smith, said that, if we spent just a little more, the nation would get healthier, and we could then spend less. With the wisdom of hindsight, it now seems incredible that our distinguished and intelligent predecessors should ever have thought that.

We now know the reality, which is what we must all wrestle with. As the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey rightly said, if only we could wrestle with it in a calm and intelligent way instead of with the party clap-trap that we hear all the time about it being the Labour party's national health service, we might make some progress.

We all know the factors: the rise in demand; an aging population; improvements in, but increasing costs of, medical techniques; and the rising aspirations, quite rightly, of our people. All those factors add up to a huge challenge, to which we are rising and have risen during the period of Conservative government, and of which we should be extremely proud.

Just imagine if, in 1979, we had gone to the electorate and said, "Over the next 18 years, we shall increase real-terms spending on the health service year on year by 3 per cent." Who would have believed us? What would the Labour party of the day have said? However, that is what we have done. Had we said that to the BMA, it would have said that all the problems would be solved. Every year, BMA spokesmen say, "Just a little bit more—2 per cent., £2 billion or £10 billion more—and we shall all be OK." Had we offered them a 3 per cent. annual increase in real terms for 18 years, they would have said, "This is utopia; this is heaven." Everyone would have been happy.

We did not say that, but that is what we have achieved. We now have more than 20,000 more doctors, who are paid 33 per cent. more in real terms. We have 55,000 more nurses, who are paid nearly 70 per cent. more in real terms. That is a great record, and we are proud of it.

It is not a matter just of employing more doctors and nurses and paying them more, however, but of treating more patients with better, more advanced treatment, and that is what is being achieved. Our constituents know that, although they are still fooled by the Jennifer's ear war which the Labour party persists in waging. Labour Members have learnt nothing since 1992 in that regard. We get the same old tired vacuity.

If I speak to my constituents, they say that they hear about the terrible problems in the NHS. When I ask them about their personal experience, they say, "My general practitioner is fine." There are GPs of a high standard in my constituency, I am happy to say, and many of them are in budget-holding practices, with all the benefits that that brings. My constituents tell me about Aunty Mabel, who was in Wycombe general hospital a few weeks ago, where the treatment was wonderful. That is what we all hear, time and again.

Despite all the challenges and the Labour party hypocrisy, we have a great national health service, which is getting better. That is partly a tribute to the healthy economy that we have created, which has enabled us to put in substantial resources, but it is an even greater tribute to the contribution made by all those who work in the NHS, who are daily denigrated by the Labour party. It is time for that to stop.

6.30 pm

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Leeds, South): A week ago, I was one of those who raised on a point of order the failure of the NHS to meet the extra demand generated by the extremely cold weather over the Christmas and new year period.

That failure was highlighted for me by the death of a constituent of my neighbour, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie). In dire emergency, that constituent had to travel to Hull for treatment, despite the fact that she lived within one mile of a major hospital and within two miles of each of the major hospitals in Leeds. We have become used to Leeds hospitals receiving emergency cases from as far away as Kent, so people in Leeds were surprised to find that our hospitals could not deal with an emergency on their doorstep.

I raised the point because I thought that the number of incidents and the severity of the shortage of treatment would bring the Secretary of State to the House. Surprisingly, it did not even get him to the studio on the day that the House resumed its business.

That anecdote and others that we have heard during the debate demonstrate a widespread failing in the health service, but it is important to look beyond anecdotes, because, with so many people being treated by the health service, we cannot expect every case to work out satisfactorily. There will always be anecdotes about people who did not receive the treatment that they felt they should have had.

We should accept that the reforms introduced into the health service are not all working as smoothly as is claimed by those who introduced them. The public demand changes in our approach to the health service, and I am sure that, after the general election, we will respond to those demands.

The BBC "Panorama" programme just over two weeks ago advanced the thesis that the NHS was being kept afloat in an attempt to see the Government through to the election, that health authorities would be about £150 million in debt by the end of this financial year, and that they were being allowed to overspend by a supposedly fiscally responsible Government in order to create the impression of stability. In effect, that debt will prove to be a deferred cut in NHS spending.

"Panorama" also reported that, in the past five years, £500 million could have been spent on patient care by health authorities, but that, because of short-term political concerns, that was stopped by the Government through the health authority chairmen they had nominated. That charge needs answering.

We must discover why there are severe shortages in the health service. The series of anecdotes is not haphazard, but part of a pattern that reveals deficiencies in the service.

Mr. Forman: I also saw the "Panorama" programme, which I found interesting. Does the hon. Gentleman recall the powerful point it made about the great advantage to patients from the constant provision of new facilities and new hospitals for the health service, as has happened over the past 18 or 20 years or longer? That requires older facilities to be closed down, but it is important that continuity of provision should be maintained.

Mr. Gunnell: The programme suggested that potential savings had not been made, because of reluctance to close down some facilities that had passed their useful life and that did not have the skilled staff to deal with emergencies for which they were supposed to cater.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman, but the fundamental argument of the programme was that the Government were allowing health authorities to run up large debts in order to keep the health service afloat and maintain the impression of stability until the general election. The hon. Gentleman may not agree with that, but I am sure he will agree that that was the main thesis of the programme. The Government must answer the charge.

I hope that we would all agree that deficiencies exist in the NHS. As a result of closures, there is undoubtedly a shortage of beds. The British Medical Association, which is clearly not popular with the hon. Member for Wycombe (Sir R. Whitney), says that the reduction in bed numbers is a key reason for the current NHS crisis.

The Conservatives have cut almost one in four beds since the internal market was introduced. In the North and Yorkshire area, which is my area, there has been an incredible 33 per cent. drop in geriatric beds, a 25 per cent. drop in maternity beds and a 19 per cent. drop in general and acute beds since 1989-90—a 27 per cent. drop overall. We must accept that those figures are accurate and based on a count by the BMA.

In a recent report on the state of the health service, Leeds general infirmary was highlighted by the BMA for bed closures due to lack of money. The infirmary closed 40 beds because it was the focus of criticism last year about the number of patients on trolleys. I drew attention to two relatives from south Leeds who had died as a result of being left too long on trolleys.

[Mr. Gunnell]

I accept that an attempt was made to increase the number of intensive care beds. That attempt was partially successful: we have not had quite the same level of crisis this winter, but that has been achieved at the expense of ordinary services. Those 40 beds and others were cut, resulting in the postponement of operations and delays in admission.

I have been invited to visit a hospital in the next week or two to meet one of the consultants and hear why people must wait so long to see him. The crisis in the NHS is fundamentally a beds crisis. The BMA has warned that, unless the chronic underfunding is tackled, an "emergency-only service" will characterise the NHS in the winter months ahead. Routine surgery, treatment and investigations are already being cancelled or slowed down.

The Sunday Telegraph, which I would not usually expect to support the Labour party's position, recently reported an accident and emergency official who described the entire hospital service as being "stretched beyond its capacity to cope."

Even the Minister must accept that the health service is under great strain because of a shortage of hospital beds.

I shall not rehearse the argument about intensive care beds. However, the Secretary of State must examine the position in Leeds and in the North and Yorkshire region, as I do not believe that that region has received the number of paediatric intensive care beds that he specifically promised in his statement. That is why I asked him about the situation in that area.

The right hon. Gentleman accepted in correspondence with me that the paediatric intensive care unit at Leeds General infirmary is the most highly skilled facility in the region. It is logical to expand the best unit, but the facility at Leeds General infirmary occupies an enclosed space, and it would have to be relocated within the hospital in order to accommodate more than one additional bed.

We are told that an extra bed has been added to the unit, but the facility is unchanged from when I visited it a year ago. It has space for five beds, and, at a time of real crisis, it can expand to six. That extra bed is shoved in at the expense of the space available to the other beds. It is all very well for the Secretary of State to claim that the unit now has an additional bed, but that bed was always available when needed. The difference is that, previously, it was not counted as an official paediatric intensive care bed, and now it is. I believe that the Secretary of State has failed to fulfil his promise to the North and Yorkshire region, and I shall be interested to hear his comments on the matter.

A shortage of capital funds in the Budget has also caused problems. The Chancellor has revealed a 16 per cent. cut in capital spending, in the expectation that the private finance initiative will make up the difference. The matter was raised previously in debate.

I think that the Government should come clean about the PFI's achievements in terms of completed projects. When I asked the Secretary of State about it, he said that 43 PFI projects had been signed, which were worth a total of £317 million. When I asked how many of those projects had progressed to building work on a hospital site, he said that 32 such projects had been completed. I can only assume that he meant that the signing had been completed in 32 cases and that the projects were ready to go ahead.

I ask the Minister of State: how many projects are under way? I am interested not only in signed contracts but in bricks and mortar. Can those whom the new facilities are intended to serve see something happening? I do not know of a single instance where construction is under way.

It is all very well to assume in the Budget that the PFI will make up a shortfall in expenditure—I hope that the private sector ventures will prove successful and that the projects will go ahead, because the NHS needs them—but we must be sure that the projects have progressed beyond the mere signing of pieces of paper. Parliament enacted the National Health Service (Residual Liabilities) Bill last year to enable the contracts to be signed, and now I want to know what progress has been made. Is the private sector confident about those contracts?

Mr. Steinberg: I asked the same question of the Library, and I was told that no PFI project has begun, and not one brick has been laid on any site. Where the Secretary of State gets his 32 starts from is anyone's guess—in fact, I suspect that he was misleading the House.

Mr. Gunnell: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. Do I understand that the hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Steinberg) is accusing the Secretary of State of misleading the House? If so, I think that he may want to withdraw that remark.

Mr. Steinberg: I did so inadvertently, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I obviously apologise to the House. However, when information from the Library states that not one brick has been laid on site and the Secretary of State says that 32 projects have been completed, someone somewhere is supplying the wrong information.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Do I understand that the hon. Gentleman has withdrawn the remark?

Mr. Steinberg: Yes.

Mr. Gunnell: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not think that the Secretary of State tried to mislead the House. When I asked about completions under the PFI, I think that he thought that I was referring to contracts rather than buildings. Like my hon. Friend, I understand that the projects have yielded no concrete results.

Mr. Steinberg: According to the Library, the schemes' commencement dates have not been announced.

Mr. Gunnell: I must move on rapidly.

Mr. Malone: Perhaps I can assist the hon. Gentleman. I cannot allow the intervention of the hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Steinberg) to stand. I shall deal with the matter in some detail in my winding-up speech, but I rise now merely to state that I celebrated the completion of a PFI scheme involving the internal refurbishment of part of a London hospital about six to eight months ago. The scheme was valued at some £5 million to £6 million.

Mr. Steinberg: What a load of cobblers!

Mr. Malone: The hon. Gentleman may mock—I am sure that those at the hospital will note his comments—but I can vouch for the fact that the PFI principle is delivering within the NHS.

Mr. Gunnell: I thank the Minister for his comments, and I accept that he has seen that project completed. However, I am sure that he does not intend to imply that the Secretary of State meant that 32 such projects have been completed.

I believe that the shortage of capital in the NHS—I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) has noted it—is causing real concern within the service. There is also clear dissatisfaction with the purchasing system.

On Sunday, the Minister of State responded to claims that 20 per cent. of expenditure on purchasing in the NHS is unnecessary. A group claimed that £8 billion of the £40 billion spent on purchasing in the NHS could be saved. The group did not substantiate its case, and I think that we would need more information if we were to pursue that line. However, it is important to examine the way in which money is spent.

I have written to the Department about the concerns expressed by a company in my constituency—I think that it is the only firm in England that manufactures operating theatre lights—as a result of its experiences of trying to win contracts in the national health service.

As a member of the Select Committee on Public Service, I am a little concerned about the meeting that we had with the Audit Commission. We talked to the Audit Commission. The freedom it has when it examines local government, whereby it can examine almost anything that local government is doing, is not available to it in the national health service. It is not able to investigate hospitals.

I hope that the Minister and my hon. Friends on the Front Bench will consider the use of the Audit Commission in the NHS. If the commission were not restricted in what it can do in individual hospitals and trusts, we might get some useful information from it. Certainly, if purchasing does not, as was alleged, ensure value for money, I would expect the Audit Commission to be able to make a positive contribution. I hope that the Minister will consider that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury made a point about which we feel very strongly: if so little information is held centrally, as the Department of Health is willing to reveal to us in answers to parliamentary questions, it is no wonder that some of the decisions that are taken are not the best decisions for the service. I am amazed at the number of times we are simply told that the information is not held centrally, even when my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) asked how many hospital closures there had been.

Let me give examples of matters that are important for an understanding of the workings of the health service. I have been looking at the Mental Health Act 1983 and the way in which electro-convulsive therapy treatments are given—I have a constituent who is concerned about this—and particularly the way in which they are often given without specific consent. I attempted to find out, through the Department of Health, the extent to which such treatments take place, but was told that the information was not held centrally.

I tried to find out what information the Department collected centrally to determine the performance of the health service in relation to its "Health of the Nation" targets on strokes. It told me that, although it holds a certain amount of information concerning mortality, it was not able to tell me much about the people who experienced strokes and went into hospital, and what treatment was effective in preserving them, perhaps for a later stroke but perhaps for very much longer than that.

If that information is not held centrally, what is? How do Ministers get the information they need to make policy decisions? The health service is now so fragmented that it must be difficult even for Ministers if the Department of Health is not able to give factual data about the state of the nation's health—and, indeed, how far we have progressed towards meeting the "Health of the Nation" targets.

After the general election, a change will come about that will be extremely helpful to the service. In the first instance, in office will be people who always use and rely on the service. That is very important. It makes a difference. The attitude of someone who is able to contract out of the health service and pay for his or her private health care is very different.

I lived in the United States for eight years, where I had to pay for my own health care. The health care that I received there was very good, but that was because I was able to pay for it. We do not want different standards of care according to people's ability to pay. There will be a positive effect from the presence in office of people who recognise that, in times of emergency, they have only the health service on which to rely.

We have within the health service an enormously committed work force. The Government say that we run down those who work in the health service, but that is not true. We have very strong praise for those who work in it. Often, the conditions under which they work do not help their morale. I am thinking, for example, of those who work on temporary contracts. A little while ago, my wife had an operation in the Huddersfield royal infirmary. The treatment that she received was extremely good. I have nothing but praise for those who carried out the service.

Some of the staff on temporary contracts explained their position. They did not know whether, in the next financial year, they would have a contract. The morale of people who work in the health service is affected by such matters. If they cannot live their normal lives because they are uncertain whether they will have a permanent job, that makes it more difficult for them to show commitment to the service. In this instance, however, I found that the people concerned showed extremely good care, and I saw their commitment to the service.

Under a Labour Administration, there would be ways of working to correct the low morale in the service. There would be much greater participation. On local commissioning, we are concerned that more people take part in decision making. I believe that real savings can be made by reducing bureaucracy. One area where a Labour Government could make savings is the enormous bureaucracy within the service on billing those who receive treatment outside their areas. It is possible to make the savings that we have spoken about without detriment to the service.

We should make use of the services of the Audit Commission to ensure that purchasing is carried out on a value-for-money basis. The Minister was accused on Sunday, by the person with whom he was debating, of wanting to remove from the NHS the very people who are making good decisions. It is important that we have advice, so that any changes we make in the service do not affect patient care.

Tonight's debate has highlighted deficiencies in the service. The Government are unusually complacent about the service for which they are responsible. It has proved to be less than safe in their hands, and I feel confident that the election of a Labour Government will be welcomed throughout the health service. The Government will have to explain why, in every survey, the public believe firmly that the health service will be safer in Labour's hands. It is because they know that it is a service on which we ourselves will rely in emergencies. We believe that the health service is essential for the health and well-being of the nation.

Dame Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): I leave the hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Gunnell) to dream on.

Undoubtedly, all hon. Members read the Order Paper each day. I am sure that they do so devotedly and thoroughly from start to finish. I am beginning to be glad that the public do not follow our example. If they did and read the motion that is before us, thousands of people would be astonished. We read of the "grave situation" of the national health service, of "anxiety," "alarm" and "intolerable pressure". We are told that many people are "without the access to health care they need".

What tommy-rot.

I can say without question that anyone who has been in hospital, or been to their doctor, and experienced the level of care that my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Sir R. Whitney) described, would not recognise the terms of the motion. The motion is so far from reality that there is virtually no connection between what it states and the reality of the health service.

It is not an infrequent occurrence for me to receive letters from constituents or to receive visits at my surgery. People write or visit to say, "I want to let you know that I have been in hospital"—it might have been one of a number of hospitals—"and I had the most wonderful care. The most wonderful nurses and doctors looked after me. The treatment I had, the drugs I received and the operation performed were magnificent." Yet those who have not had the misfortune to be ill, or the good fortune to be looked after in an NHS hospital, must think that our hospitals are appalling, especially if they read the rubbish contained in the Opposition motion.

It is true that the press, especially local newspapers, seem to glory in presenting bad news. They will rejoice at someone being left on a trolley. They will not mention, of course, how many patients the same hospital is treating on any given day when someone is in a corridor on a trolley. Newspaper reports portray a service that has no connection with the real service.

Intensive care units were mentioned at Question Time, including Prime Minister's Question Time, and in this debate. If we had so many extra intensive care units available that every patient who suddenly had a need for such a bed could immediately be placed in a unit within 20 minutes of his or her home, we would need a huge increase in the money that is available to spend. If that provision were made available, thousands of intensive beds would be left empty day after day. I can imagine the fuss that would be generated by the newspapers, let alone Her Majesty's Opposition, about the waste involved in all those beds remaining empty in the absence of emergencies, accidents, children having serious heart conditions or whatever. The expense of having an intensive care unit available for everyone who might—not would—have a need for one, having fallen under a bus or out of a window, would be amazing to contemplate.

The same point can be made about ordinary hospital beds. Patients on trolleys in corridors are not there for fun. They are there because every bed in the hospital is full. We never hear, however, about the numbers of patients who are being treated in hospitals. We know—[Interruption.] It is no good the hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Mr. Hughes) laughing. God forbid that he should have any responsibility for providing the country with health care as he clearly knows little about it. We cannot possibly keep empty beds available just in case we are faced with a 'flu epidemic. It is clear that Labour Members are living in a dream world. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Doncaster, North laughs and refuses to face the facts. He will hear a few more from me, whether he likes it or not.

I have attended health debates in the House for many years. Whenever Conservative Governments have initiated reforms or improvements, or introduced new ideas, Labour has voted against them. If we are realistic, we must accept that reforms have to be made. We all know—perhaps the hon. Member for Doncaster, North does not, but he would be the only Member in that position—that if we are to give everyone every care that he or she needs at any particular time, we shall have to make more money available. I happen to believe that voters agree with that assertion. I recognise, of course, that they want a good health service and are happy to see that their taxes are spent to provide one.

Many of the reforms that we have introduced, against which Opposition Members voted, were designed to ensure that all moneys spent within the health service were spent wisely. At one time we had no idea how much it cost to keep someone in a hospital bed overnight. We did not have a clue. We also did not know how much it cost to perform operations, ranging from those to remove varicose veins to heart transplants and complicated liver surgery, for example.

Mr. Chris Smith: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Dame Jill Knight: No, the hon. Gentleman must listen for a short while.

We Conservatives ensured that inquiries were made and careful costings undertaken. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman—

Mr. Smith: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Dame Jill Knight: Let me finish my sentence. When I have done so, he can have his go.

I remember—perhaps my memory is better than the hon. Gentleman's on these matters—that we initiated schemes to enable us to ascertain costs. The Labour Opposition voted against them.

Mr. Smith: The hon. Lady is making much of the supposed fact that we now know the cost of operations. I specifically asked the Secretary of State in a written question in December 1996 to supply the average cost in England of a hip replacement operation. Why, then, did I receive the answer that he did not know?

Dame Jill Knight: The hon. Gentleman cannot deny the truth of what I have said. It may not be possible in every instance to state the cost of a hip replacement operation, but we Conservatives initiated schemes—if the hon. Gentleman was in the House at the time, he would have voted against them—to try to determine costs. I am talking about the principle of needing to know what hospital stays and operations cost. We now know a great deal more—I accept that we do not know everything—about costs. Much time, care and work were expended on finding answers to questions of costs.

Why was that? We had the opportunity for the first time to ask, "Why is it that this hospital can run its operation theatre at a cost of only £X per hour while another hospital is running its theatre three times more expensively?" We were able to say, "This hospital is able to accommodate a patient overnight at a quarter of the cost incurred by the hospital along the road. Why is that?" On that basis, each hospital and each hospital chief executive could examine why one hospital was cheaper than another.

It is no good the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) thinking that what I have described did not happen. He lives in cloud cuckoo land most of the time, but he must understand that without a knowledge of costs, which we most certainly have and have used, we would not be able to make comparisons and introduce savings.

A great deal of money was saved once we could ask cost questions. We found that many areas of hospital care—for example, cleaning, the provision of food and laundering—would be much more cheaply provided on a privatised basis. Labour voted against such schemes. It is hilarious now to hear what Labour is saying about privatisation. Never in 100 million years would it have introduced privatisation. We said, however, that it would be sensible to adopt schemes that would enable us to have more money, and they have provided that. Private firms were employed if they could do those jobs better.

I remember Labour Members jeering at us and accusing us of thinking that it is all a matter of money. You think that it is not at all a matter of money—I beg your pardon, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am not referring to you. Her Majesty's Opposition may think that money does not come into it, but doctors and nurses have to be paid, new hospitals are being built and they cost money; adaptations to modern methods of treating people must be made and they are expensive.

Labour Members accuse us of trying to save money, every penny of which we have spent on the treatment of patients—our reforms gave us much more money to do that. None of that would have happened were it not for the Conservative party's reforms, all of which the Labour party voted against. Since they were introduced in 1991, our reforms have enabled no fewer than 3,500 more people per day to be treated. What a lot of pain that must alleviate. What a lot of comfort that must give to relatives who are concerned about their sons or daughters.

Her Majesty's Opposition seem to set themselves up as the friend of the health service. If that is so, it is the first time ever.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): The Tory Government voted against it.

Dame Jill Knight: If the hon. Gentleman had listened to an excellent speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe, he would know a little more than he does about the history of the health service.

The fact of the matter is that more money will be necessary. Although we have made a clear pledge to provide more money, the Labour party has not. When the general election campaign comes—it cannot be far away—people will not believe a word that Labour Members say. The Labour party refuses to promise to spend any more money; it says that it may spend more money but that it will not increase tax. If it will not increase tax, where is the money to come from? Will national insurance contributions or excise duties be increased? Will Labour extend VAT? No. Apparently it will be possible to make much more money available to the health service merely by ending bureaucracy.

I should like to read a quick snip from The Independent of 28 November 1996:

> "The big question Mr Smith has to address is resources. It is no good Labour relying on its present formula of sacking managers to create £100 million for the NHS to recycle. The managers have gone. The savings have been made. He should fight Gordon Brown the shadow chancellor for the right, at the very least, to match the Tory cash promise for next year".

No such matching promise has been made. Furthermore, I could not help noticing what a Labour Member said in The Journal on 4 December 1996:

> "Labour will match any spending pledges made by the Conservatives".

That was on 4 December, but I am still waiting for Labour to match the spending pledges made by the Conservatives. There is more. He said:

> "we will also cut £100 million from the NHS bureaucracy bill and use it to treat . . . 100,000 patients".

His arithmetic is a little dodgy. Labour has made no spending pledges, and it is perfectly obvious that the electorate will not be told whether there will be more spending and where the money will come from.

The Opposition are always attacking health service managers, but managers are necessary: it would be extraordinary if a hospital could be run without a manager. I am sick and tired of hearing Labour Members attack managers, who to my mind do a very good job.

[Dame Jill Knight]

When we consider the health service in other countries, even those of our European partners, we begin to see how extremely fortunate we are in this country with our excellent health service. In parts of Europe, people have to have their food, linen and blankets brought to them in hospital, and they do not get even the most modest and insignificant nursing care unless they pay for it directly.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): It is called privatisation.

Dame Jill Knight: No, in hospitals run by countries in the European Union.

It is improper for the Labour party to keep attacking the health service and suggesting, quite wrongly, that people are getting a bad health service. The people of this country are not fools: they know perfectly well what the service is like, because they receive health care and they know that it is beyond compare. Her Majesty's Opposition should be ashamed of themselves.

Mr. Mike Hall (Warrington, South): In opening the debate, the Secretary of State for Health tried to lay the foundations of his argument for the coming general election. He treated us to the view that, when the election is called, the people will side with the Conservative party. I do not believe that, but if he is so sure of his ground, he should go to 10 Downing street and persuade the Prime Minister to call the election and let the people judge for themselves to whom they want to entrust the health service.

It is worth remembering that the health service is in its 49th year. I sincerely believe that it is facing a crisis: I say it no more strongly than that, because I do not want to be accused of scaremongering or shroud waving.

It is important to put the record straight. It is unfortunate that the hon. Member for Wycombe (Sir R. Whitney) is not present, because he treated us to a view of history with which I do not concur. He claimed that, between 1940 and 1945, the national Government endorsed the findings of the Beveridge report. The Beveridge report was rejected by the national Government. The only political party that took forward the principles of the Beveridge report was the Labour party. Those principles were rejected by the Liberal party and the Conservative party. In 1946, when the vote for the creation of the health service took place, that rejection was plain for all to see, because the Conservative party voted against it.

Conservative Members are being disingenuous when they say that they supported the creation of the health service and the concepts in the Beveridge report. The Beveridge report was so controversial that it was disowned by almost everyone, including his own party. The Labour party can be rightly proud of the fact that it used the report as a blueprint for the national health service under the auspices of a Labour Government.

Mr. Hendry: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hall: No, I shall not give way.

If the Conservative party wants to stick to its claim that the health service is safe in its hands and that it will care for those in need, we should consider how it is dealing with the current crisis in intensive care across the whole country. That is a powerful example of the Government's complacency and shows how they are disintegrating. Last week, the Secretary of State for Health refused to come to the House to answer questions on the crisis in intensive care provision.

If we need confirmation of that complacency, we need only consider the way in which the Prime Minister dealt with the issue at Question Time this afternoon, and the way in which the Secretary of State dealt with it in his opening speech. The Secretary of State refused to recognise that there was any problem with the provision of intensive care, but there are enough examples to prove him wrong. The right hon. Gentleman's strategic intellectual non-intervention does him no credit—although I had some regard for him when, as Chief Secretary to the Treasury, he spoke from the Dispatch Box in a different vein, adopting a far more considered approach.

The Secretary of State should not be surprised that there is a crisis in the health service, because on his desk is a report to Alan Langlands, chief executive of the national health service executive, on emergency care in the north-west region. The report mentions a separate report on intensive care. The report on the north-west region has been published, and was presented to Alan Langlands in September 1996.

I wanted to use the report to strengthen my arguments about the intensive care problems in my town of Warrington, but the north-west regional office refused to give me a copy, saying that it had not been published and was only for internal use. I do not know what the office has to hide, but the document has been published, and should be available to hon. Members. I do not understand why the Department of Health, through its regional office, wants to suppress it; I can conclude only that the information contained in it would be damaging to the Government if quoted in the debate, and would underline my view that Warrington is experiencing a crisis in internal intensive care provision.

To strengthen my argument, therefore, I shall have to refer to the report of which I have a copy, which concerns emergency care in the north-west region. I shall read just one paragraph from the introduction, which is very powerful. It states:

> "Over recent years there has been a steady increasing pressure placed on secondary care services to handle emergency admissions over the winter period. The pressure became so intense at times during 1995/96 that the system was in danger of collapsing."

No wonder the Department did not want me to see the report on intensive care in the north-west, as submitted to the chief executive of the health service.

The report confirmed that there had been dramatic bed losses in my region. We know from Government answers placed in the Library that, since 1989-90, 10,510 beds have been lost in the north-west; furthermore, 1,238 acute beds have been lost since then. It also confirmed that there was a crisis in emergency care provision, and predicted peak demand for such provision in November and December last year, adding that no extra resources would be available to meet that demand. Although the report goes some way to admitting that there is a demand and talks of managing resources in the health service to meet that demand, it does not go the extra yard in terms of intensive care provision.

The borough of Warrington is served by Warrington's district general hospital. Warrington's population is 200,000 and growing, but the hospital deals with trauma admissions from a wider population in Halton, in the borough of Widnes and Runcorn, and from Leigh. That catchment area contains 350,000 people.

Warrington hospital has three intensive care beds and one high-dependency bed. Last year, the occupancy rate for those beds was 98.9 per cent. If we use the NHS guidelines on the provision of intensive care beds, according to the rule of thumb there should be 2.2 beds per 100,000 people. If that were applied in Warrington, we would have eight intensive care beds, but at best we have only four. North Cheshire health authority funds only three, however; the hospital provides the money for the other one.

The existence of a crisis is underlined by the fact that, in 1996, there were 142 intensive care admissions and 216 high-dependency admissions. The other side of the coin is the refusal of 83 admissions—but that is not the whole picture. Once doctors know that the intensive care unit is full, they do not even apply for places for their patients. There were 18 transfers from the intensive care unit—out of Warrington—but that, too, does not give the true picture, because transfers from other wards or from the accident and emergency unit are not included. Both the refusal rate and the transfer rate should be higher.

The postponement of elective surgery and the cancellation of operations owing to the lack of beds is also a problem in Warrington hospital. Warrington is developing a very good reputation for treatment of the three major cancers, but when operations are cancelled, patients who are desperate for surgery must go through the trauma of having their appointments cancelled and their treatment delayed—although, as we all know, the earlier patients are treated for cancer, the better are their prospects of recovery. The chief executive of the hospital tells me that it is very difficult to quantify the number of patients who are not scheduled for surgery because of the lack of beds.

It is clear that there is not enough intensive care provision in that hospital, as North Cheshire health authority has recognised. Warrington is a net exporter of intensive care, which means that more patients go out of Warrington for treatment than come in from outside. The consequences have been fatal for at least one of my constituents, and probably more. I refer to the tragic case of Mr. Pitcher, who was admitted to Warrington hospital in September for routine bowel surgery. During post-operative care, he suffered a heart attack and needed an intensive care bed, but no bed was available at the hospital. He was taken by ambulance to Fazakerley hospital, 30 miles away. He died.

At the inquest a couple of weeks ago, the coroner was so concerned about the lack of intensive care at Warrington that, in giving his verdict of death by misadventure, he said that he would refer the case to the Secretary of State for Health. The consultant who had dealt with Mr. Pitcher said that taking him to Fazakerley hospital in an ambulance had not been the treatment that he had deserved, and I am certain that the lack of an intensive care bed in Warrington led directly to his untimely death.

Another case involved a lady who lived in the village of Barnton in mid-Cheshire, just outside my constituency. She had a severe respiratory problem. The doctor telephoned all the hospitals in the area looking for an intensive care bed—Countess of Chester hospital, Warrington hospital, Halton general hospital and others—but no bed was available in the north-west. The lady was transferred by ambulance to Rhyl, but was dead on arrival. I am certain that, if an intensive care bed had been available anywhere in Cheshire, she would be alive today.

In another tragic case, a gentleman called Mr. Wilson was found unconscious in the grounds of Winwick hospital, a mental hospital in north Warrington. He was taken to Warrington's accident and emergency unit, but there was no place for him in intensive care. He was transferred to Trafford general hospital. He then contracted pneumonia, and has been in a coma for nine weeks. I cannot say whether he will regain consciousness, but one thing is certain: the journey from Warrington to Trafford did not do him any good. He is now taking up a bed at Trafford, and preventing others from obtaining the intensive care that they need.

My final example concerns a lady recovering from surgery at Warrington hospital. Her case worsened and she needed intensive care, but, as no bed was available, she had to be taken across the Pennines in an ambulance to Leeds, 60 miles away. There have been problems with intensive care provision in Leeds as well.

Those are just four examples of transfers of people who could not be given the treatment that they should expect from hospitals in their areas. It is clear that intensive care provision in Warrington is inadequate to meet local demand. I was encouraged by the Secretary of State's announcement of challenge funding of £4 million to provide 37 intensive care beds and 53 high-dependency beds. The total number is 90 and not the 100 that the Secretary of State claimed in the debate. However, in his case, a 10 per cent. inaccuracy can be forgiven.

North Cheshire health authority put in a bid on behalf of Warrington hospital for an extra high-dependency bed. The Secretary of State said that such beds would be provided where the need was greatest and Warrington had a demonstrable need. However, on 27 December he announced the bad news that Warrington had not been given the extra bed that it required to bring it even halfway towards the provision that we should expect for it.

North Cheshire health authority, the regional authority and the hospital have decided to put together a package to provide one intensive care bed from 1 April. The health authority will provide £100,000, the regional authority will try to find the same amount and the hospital has been asked to find £50,000 for the provision of that bed. It is a step in the right direction, but it is rather like putting a finger in a dyke because, for straightforward reasons, in six months there will be an increase in demand in Warrington that will not be met.

Warrington has been underfunded for as long as I can remember. It is a growing and prosperous new town in north Cheshire whose population has trebled in the past 25 years. It is surrounded by a motorway network consisting of the M6, the M56 and the M62. Because of geographical features, the trauma admissions to Warrington hospital are the highest in the region.

[Mr. Hall]

In the early 1980s, Warrington's two hospitals were merged and, in its so-called wisdom, the health authority decided to use £1 million of revenue to fund part of the capital building at the hospital. That revenue has never been repaid and, on today's figures alone, that is costing the hospital £4 million. Every month the hospital is on red alert. As the Minister will know, that means that its finances are at the absolute limit. It is in danger of overspending every month and its financial position is reported to the regional arm of the executive, yet it has been asked to provide £50,000 towards the provision of intensive care.

The 1997-98 budget for North Cheshire health authority, which is a purchaser, showed the lowest increase in the region and Government constraints mean that any attempts to address the inadequacy of provision in Warrington hospital are resisted.

I am certain that there is a crisis in the health service. I have been told, although I do not know whether it is true, that three weeks ago there was not a spare intensive care bed in the whole of England. If there had been any more admissions for intensive care, the nearest suitable bed would have been in Scotland. Warrington hospital is an example of the crisis in intensive care. Does the Minister of State recognise, even at this late stage, that there is a crisis? If he does, what does he intend to do about it? Does he appreciate the problems that I have outlined in Warrington? If so, what does he intend to do about them? What will he tell me in his winding-up speech so that I can return to my constituents and say that the Secretary of State has taken heed of the problem and is prepared to take steps to ensure that they receive the health service that they deserve?

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): The House will agree that it is always a tragedy when patients die or become more ill than need be because of misfortune, failures in clinical judgment or organisational failures in the health service. Every hon. Member and every fair-minded person deplores such eventualities, but that is not to say that in a service as large and varied and, if I may say so, as successful as the national health service, it is correct to approach such a serious debate by lacing speeches, whether in the House or outside, with endless repetitions of the six letter word "crisis". If I had £1 or even 10p for every time I have heard Opposition Members or distinguished adornments of the media use that word in relation to the health service, I would be fairly well off. Such speeches are the wrong approach.

I agree with the wise words of the hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Gunnell), which I hope the House has noted. He said explicitly that it is not sensible for individual anecdotes on this matter to do more than inform policy. Those were not his exact words but my rendering of what he said. Such anecdotes should certainly not determine policy and still less should newspaper headlines be taken as a guide either to the real situation or to what should be done.

I was appalled recently, and not for the first time by such an example, when I saw that the sub-editor of one of my local papers had chosen the headline "Nightmare in Casualty". That is a distortion of the truth, and I say that with some authority, because I keep in close touch with the accident and emergency department of St. Helier hospital in my constituency. It has been mentioned several times in the debate and is a successful and admirable hospital whose staff work hard and show considerable devotion towards their professional tasks.

I agreed with the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who said that we should lower the temperature of these debates, at least in relation to the facts and to what we all know the situation to be, and should seriously and quietly consider the best way forward to improve and expand the service in a way that the taxpayers can afford. As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight) said, the debate is not helped by being initiated by a party that is long on fine words. There are 17 lines in the Labour motion, but as my hon. Friend said, only the final one and a half lines contain anything prescriptive, and even then there are no figures or precise recommendations.

I do not know how the electorate can sensibly judge Labour policy on the health service when Opposition Members refuse to commit themselves to what is manifestly necessary in the light of their own speeches—a real increase in expenditure year on year. As many of my hon. Friends and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State have said, we adhere to that commitment year after year. As far as I know, Labour does not. All that Labour seems to offer is the marginal redirection of money that is now spent on 22,000 administrators towards the employment of 50,000 more nurses. Obviously, such a switch would be welcome if it were the solution to the problem, but it is little more than a token gesture in the hope that this part of the public service will be transformed by such a marginal move. That is plainly not the case and such an attempt at policy is not commensurate with the scale of the challenges that face the national health service.

It is not doing the House and the country much of a service to present a motion that is long on piety and sanctimony but decidedly short on content. The Opposition Front-Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), was not much better in that regard. He did not give way to me when I sought to ask him a pertinent question about locality commissioning. Perhaps he would like to answer my question now: on what evidence does he base his view that, if a future Government moved towards what he described as locality commissioning, that would be any less bureaucratic or costly in terms of overheads than the present structure?

Mr. Chris Smith: The answer is simple. It would do away with a layer of bureaucracy at single practice level. It would do away with a purchasing function at health authority level and it would do away with a substantial amount of invoicing work done at hospital level. Therefore, as a result of our proposals, there would be substantial savings in bureaucratic procedures.

Mr. Forman: That is a better attempt than the hon. Gentleman made in his opening speech. There is a reference in the Labour motion to greater local representation in decision making, and I assume that would mean a greater role for local authorities in some of the decisions. It seems that we are likely to get a range of new quangos and committees which will add to the bureaucratic overheads. It remains to be seen whether the hon. Gentleman will get a chance to put his nostrums into practice.

I am critical not of the Liberal Democrat spokesman in today's debate, but of the Liberal Democrat opponent in my constituency. He does not seem to observe the admonition of his colleagues to deal fairly and squarely with the facts. I am sorry to say that it is an all-too-familiar example of people trading in scares, shroud waving and imaginary problems, which turn out not to exist. For example, in a publication calling itself "The Carshalton and Wallington Chronicle", there is an article headed "NHS Cash Crisis: Huge hardship for patients at St. Helier". The words used in the article are categorically wrong, as I know because I took the trouble to check this morning. The Liberal Democrat candidate says:

"St. Helier hospital is facing a winter crisis due to a lack of money. Twelve beds at St. Helier hospital are standing idle, in a locked ward, because the hospital has over-performed, and recently the Accident and Emergency unit had to close temporarily, due to a lack of resources."

In fact, no beds are standing idle in a locked ward. A decision was taken on 3 January to open—or more correctly to reopen—ward A4 at the hospital. The extra facilities, coupled with the 35 extra beds that have been brought into commission and to which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State referred, have greatly alleviated the situation at St. Helier. I base that information not just on my contacts with the management, with whom I took the trouble to check this morning, but on my visit to the accident and emergency unit just last week.

I wish that people involved in politics, in all parties, would try to cling to the truth and observe accuracy, because it does no favours for our constituents or the worried families and friends of patients if such shroud waving continues.

It is significant that the Conservative party is the only party in the House that is committed to more public expenditure on the health service in real terms. The Liberal Democrat commitment involves shuffling money around from one heading to another. I listened carefully to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and I intervened on his speech, but I am not convinced that he has squared the line with the leader of his party, who frequently says that the only commitment that his party has to raising taxation is a penny extra on income tax if that were necessary to improve the education service. I remain to be convinced on that.

It is interesting that the pledge made by Ministers and Government spokesmen demonstrates our continuing commitment to the health service. Equally, we must recognise that, as a country, we are not likely to be able to meet all the demands for NHS health care in all its forms without some delays from time to time from those with non-urgent and non-life-threatening conditions. It is much better to talk about the reality than to lead people to believe that everything is possible, when clearly it is not.

When I was thinking about this aspect of my argument earlier today, I recalled the fact that many people, myself included, have often believed that all the problems in the health service could perhaps be solved if Ministers allocated about a 3 per cent. increase each year in real terms to health service expenditure. That argument has been made from time to time by representatives of the British Medical Association, community health councils and others.

When I looked more closely—I checked the figures with the Library this morning—I found, to my surprise, that the NHS budget for England has been increased by 3 per cent. in real terms each year over the entire period of this Government. If a 3 per cent. compound increase had been put into effect for England alone, the figure for 1996-97 would have been about £31.5 billion. I assumed that I would discover the true figure to be less than that. Much to my surprise and pleasure, I discovered that the actual figure for England for the same year and on the same basis was about £33 billion. I had underestimated rather than overestimated the Government's financial commitment to the health service. I want to place that on record, because it shows that I am no mere party hack. I underestimated the achievements of my right hon. and hon. Friends and I commend them on their ability to persuade the Treasury to release money for these desirable purposes.

The figures imply that our record of putting taxpayers' money into this premium service, which all our constituents value, is exemplary. In spite of that, even at the level of finances that we are able to allocate, problems can and do arise. I want to mention one or two problems of which I hope my hon. Friend the Minister will take account in his winding-up speech.

There are realities that the House should recognise and about which it should be a little humble. As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston said, we have a health service of enviable quality and quantity by European or global standards. It is no good for people to talk it down. At St. Helier hospital in my constituency, we find reason to welcome the extra resources from which it will benefit in 1997-98, as a result of not only effective and timely lobbying by me and many of my hon. Friends but the way in which the Secretary of State listened to our arguments and responded clearly and positively to them.

I am delighted that St. Helier will benefit from the district health authority's decision to concentrate its extra resources for elective activity on local hospitals and not go to providers further afield. It will secure relief from the health authority's decision to fund its share of unavoidable costs and service changes in my area. There is no doubt that that will be a great help to the hospital. It is equally reassuring that many of the specialties that were previously thought to be at risk will now become priorities for the extra resources that have been made available following the Secretary of State's decision. Those specialties include arterial surgery, ophthalmology, which essentially means cataract operations, major orthopaedic interventions such as hip replacements, oral surgery and orthodontics. All that is good news and is in stark contrast to dire predictions by the Conservative party's political opponents which are fanned by an excessively sensational media.

In all fairness, I must say that, in spite of those achievements and the considerable relief that they bring to my constituents, there are still some underlying problems which must be mentioned because they are continuing and are independent of whoever happens to be politically responsible for the health service at any time. I shall give three headline examples.

[Mr. Forman]

Having followed these issues closely for a number of years, I believe that in Greater London the planned reduction in hospital capacity and in-patient beds may have been taken too far in light of the Tomlinson report; I say that with some experience, as I was a Minister at the Department for Education when Tomlinson was advising on that. I therefore welcomed the ability of St. Helier hospital to reopen ward A4 on 3 January, largely for haematology and short-stay medical investigations.

We need to revisit the question of the number of beds in the Greater London area. The evidence shows that our area has been expected to remove beds from its capacity levels slightly faster than is prudent or equates with what has had to happen in areas outside London.

The Government, my hon. Friends and local authorities together—it has to be a matter of partnership—need to provide more capacity to care for the chronically sick and elderly patients who come into their care. When I visited St. Helier hospital last week, I could not help but notice that a significant number of the patients brought in through accident and emergency were aged over 75, over 85 or, in some cases, as they explained to me, over 90.

Obviously, health does not go in a linear progression with age. Some people seem young and are sprightly and very healthy at a remarkably old age; others deteriorate more quickly. The fact is, however, that old people need special medical attention. Obviously, if they can be supported and cared for in their own homes, so much the better; that is all well and good. There will be instances, however, as I am sure you would say you agree, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if you could speak from the Chair, when caring for people in their own homes is not the most appropriate approach.

We must be prepared gradually and responsibly to increase the facilities in cottage hospitals, such as the Carshalton War Memorial hospital in my constituency, and in nursing homes—whether in the public or the private sector—and sheltered accommodation so that our elderly can complete their lives in safety, dignity and, if possible, good health.

The added benefit of making such a shift in emphasis would be to release some medical and surgical beds in district general hospitals that are occupied by elderly patients who cannot be discharged because there is nowhere appropriate for them to go at the time such a decision has to be made.

My final example was again brought home to me on my latest visit to the accident and emergency department at St. Helier. It is that the goals of the patients charter, to which we all want the Government to subscribe, will be achieved in full only if we all understand the facts of life in our hospitals today. On my most recent visit, it was brought home to me that major trauma accounts for a small percentage of the total admissions through an accident and emergency department; typically, it is somewhat less than 10 per cent. The vast majority of patients admitted—this connects with something that I said a few moments ago—arrive with medical conditions, some of which may be acute but many of which are chronic and require medical beds, care and treatment in other parts of the hospital. We need to recognise that, because it is the lesson that the professionals instilled in me when I listened to them.

Better results could be achieved with a greater role for primary care and a more proactive role for general practitioners' surgeries, whether fundholders or not, and for health centres, as long as they perform their contractual obligations to provide 24-hour cover for their patients, seven days a week. I am sorry to say that, too often, there are examples of where reliance is only on locums, who are sometimes hard to contact, or of GPs slipping into the easy habit of referring patients to the local accident and emergency department when they should deal with the problems themselves at first hand.

With those three cautionary observations about areas in which further improvements could still be made, my conclusion is that we all have a part to play in improving the national health service. The NHS is something of which we can be proud. Clinical personnel can do so by using their wonderful professional skills to maximum effect. The much maligned bureaucrats can do so by managing what is, by any standard, a vast undertaking—the largest single employer in this country. We politicians and others who take a close interest in these matters, including pressure groups and the media, can best make our contribution by conducting a mature and measured debate, by resisting the temptation to exaggerate and, above all, by making sure that we do not indulge in shroud waving.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman), who gave us some cautionary warnings. I was interested in his reference to the Tomlinson report, for it reminded us in this computer age of the expression, gigo—garbage in, garbage out. Tomlinson admitted later that not all the figures had been given to him correctly. When we deal with statistics, it is important that we get them right or we can come up with the wrong conclusion. I also share the hon. Gentleman's view about a positive approach to the health service.

I took part in the debate on the 40th anniversary of the health service. On that occasion, I sensed some depression and commented that the only encouraging thing was, as the old saying goes, life begins at 40. Nine years on, we are still going on and there have been tremendous changes for the good in the health service.

Some of us remember bed blocking—beds were not occupied because the surgeon in charge did not want anyone else to use them so that he could put his patients in them in due course. Other things went on. We pay tribute to the improvements.

One of the great problems is that of growing expectations, whether of those who want to terminate life, those who want children through infertility treatment, or those who, at 80-odd years of age, want a hip replacement. Other people aged 40, who are having their hip replacements delayed because they are assessed as being too young for the operation, are no longer economically viable.

Expectations have changed and we have to face up to that. It is also true to say that how we view things depends on who is doing the recording. I was interested in the references in the gospels to the woman who had haemorrhaged for some 12 years. Doctor Luke, the "beloved physician", reports that she had spent all her "living upon physicians, neither could be healed of any".

Mark, who as a layman is a little more stark in his approach, said that she had "suffered many things of many physicians and had spent all that she had, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse".

It all depends on the position of the person who is doing the reporting.

Often, however, the key is finance. I am sorry for those who were beginning to practise in the health service at the time, as the Government and practitioners did not listen to the advice of Enoch Powell—then my colleague, the right hon. Member for South Down—when he reminded them that he who paid the piper called the tune. Sooner or later, people discovered that, if the money was not forthcoming, there were difficulties. In the light of the motion and the statement by the shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer that there is to be no more spending or direct taxation, where will the money to meet the demands of our people's growing expectations come from?

The health boards in Northern Ireland and the health authorities in England and Wales depend largely on allocations from the Department of Health and, ultimately, on the Treasury, for the moneys to be expended. I would have liked to have been able to say that the recent injection of cash to make up deficiencies in capital expenditure and running expenditure allocated to England and Wales included money for Northern Ireland, but it did not.

The pressure is on to reduce expenditure in the health service. Some years ago, expenditure in Northern Ireland was 25 per cent. per capita above that in England and Wales. Now, we are behind both Scotland and Wales. Recently, the gap between us and England has narrowed to 11 per cent. No consideration is given to the different health needs of a people with a different spread of population. We do not have the large conurbations that make it easier to provide certain specialist services.

The Government pledged a year on year increase in Great Britain, but in Northern Ireland we have a year on year decrease of 3 per cent. Thankfully, we managed to convince the Minister that, as we have been squeezed for a long time, 3 per cent. up-front cuts would not be workable this year, and the figure was reduced to 1.5 per cent. However, the cuts remain a factor.

The people of Northern Ireland are not entirely happy with certain strictures that Ministers have been making. There is a parallel with those who are quick to criticise doctors who refuse to treat patients because they smoke or engage in behaviour that causes or aggravates their illness. The doctors say that they will not waste their time and money if the behaviour continues. This year, Ministers have lectured us to the effect that, because of the resurgence of terrorism, there will be cuts in funding for the health service. The Government are apparently prepared to punish the people of Northern Ireland because of the failure of successive Governments to deal with terrorism and with republican activists who seek to destroy the Province.

We must be realistic. Particular problems arise. The division between boards and trusts, purchasers and providers, has been helpful in some ways, but in others it has added problems. The boards pay for emergencies and the GP fundholders purchase elective surgery. The bodies are served by humans and, as with humans everywhere, there are differences of attitude. Some seek to balance the budget—some of us live in a city where we remember the mother in the home having envelopes for groceries, rent, fuel and insurance—but others are spendthrifts.

Some boards and some GP fundholders have been watching carefully how they purchase and how they provide services through the trusts, but some fundholders might spend up front because they rely on the boards to deal with the emergency purchasing and because they have the clout to jump queues for those in their practices who require emergency provision.

Dr. Joe Hendron (Belfast, West): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that in Belfast and many parts of Northern Ireland the boards ring-fence the costs for fundholders' patients but not for non-fundholders' patients? That is particularly true in Belfast, and many patients suffer as a direct result, but it is not the general practitioners' fault. One could argue that it was the boards' fault, but in reality it is the Government's fault.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. He will also be aware that some practices—including, I suspect, the one with which he has been associated—have sought to join multi-funds and have been held back by the argument that training would not be available. Some are excellent practices with a high reputation for patient care and service provision.

I suspect that this year, as last year, the boards, which have been holding back funds—I am thinking particularly of the Eastern health and social services board—will suddenly discover that they have a fair amount to spend before the end of March and operations will be performed on Saturdays and Sundays while they try to clear the backlog. In the meantime, unnecessary suffering and distress are caused by the lack of a proper flow through the season.

Last week, the Belfast Telegraph carried the headline, "Cancer Unit in Crisis". It has been said this evening that perhaps local newspapers carry such headlines more than national newspapers. However, the headline refers to the major cancer service in Northern Ireland. For some time it has wanted another simulator to locate tumours and plan treatments, as the existing machine has broken down.

The problem is not that the staff are not doing their work properly. I know that personally, and the newspaper article quoted a staff member as saying:

"'We are working really hard—I was in yesterday from 7 am and wasn't leaving until after 11 pm.'"

I know of other parts of the health service where people working under pressure have not even taken their statutory holidays, never mind days off in lieu for working extra hours.

The pressure is on, and I wonder why there are delays. Is it because discussion is taking place about where the centre of excellence should be? In the meantime, cancer patients who should be treated as soon as possible—doctors keep telling us that more can be done if treatment is given earlier—are left waiting. Why do we have that problem throughout the country?

I agreed with the arguments made by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight) about the pricing of surgery. It is easier now to target and to price. I wonder how right hon. and hon. Members would react if, in a national health service hospital trust, a cardiac surgeon said, "You need an operation; we could do it; but the board has not enough money to purchase it."

[Rev. Martin Smyth]

As I understand it, the cost is primarily to pay for the skills of the surgeons, specialists and nursing staff, although some money will certainly have to be spent on materials and so on. The operating theatre will be the same in any case, because there is only one hospital that does cardiac surgery in Northern Ireland. It is a scandal that we have got into the position where a surgeon employed by the national health service in a trust can say that for the want of £12,000 an urgent operation cannot be performed. We must get beyond that because, apart from anything else, it puts intolerable pressure on people.

I want to issue a word of caution. Amid the resumption of terror, I wonder whether we should consider again the provision of regional services. If there are those who want to desecrate the sanctuary that is a hospital by murdering patients or their visitors, regional services should not be provided there. The hospitals may be local or may be doing the work of a district general hospital, but the people of Northern Ireland should not have to visit for health care places where lives are endangered by terrorist thugs.

8.8 pm

Mr. Charles Hendry (High Peak): My constituents would not recognise the picture of the health service painted by the Opposition, which was a travesty of what is happening on the ground. They would recognise that more patients are being treated more locally in more modern facilities, that waiting lists have been shortened and that they have the most outstanding general practitioners and other health service professionals that they have ever had.

I offer the House a balloon trip across my constituency so that we can look down on some of the health service changes on the ground. As we went over Glossop, we would see how two old hospitals have been transformed and given new lives. One is a centre for the elderly mentally ill; the other a homeward bound unit. In New Mills, a new future is being given to Ollersett View hospital. In Buxton, there is a debate about how the town's three historic hospitals can best meet its health needs into the next century.

A little way across the constituency border, Tameside general hospital has had massive new investment, much of it under the chairmanship of Tony Favell, whom many hon. Members will recall with affection from his time in the House. Stockport's Stepping Hill hospital has also had massive investment. That is the picture of what is happening in hospitals that my constituents appreciate.

If we were to go closer down, we would see what is happening in GPs' surgeries. New surgeries have been built in Glossop, Buxton, New Mills, Chapel-en-le-Frith, Whaley Bridge, Hayfield and Hope. Across the constituency, there is new investment in our health service, and services are being delivered in a way never seen before. That is the Government's record on health: a thriving partnership with GPs, investing for the future and delivering better services.

In case some people think that High Peak is the only place where the improvements are happening, right across the country better health services are being delivered. We are treating 3 million more people than when we came to power 17 years ago, and 1 million more than when the health service reforms started only five years ago. Waiting lists are being reduced: the number of people waiting for more than 12 months has been reduced from more than 200,000 to 15,000. Infant mortality has been halved and life expectancy has been increased by two years. That is a formidable track record of which we can be justly proud.

The most exciting aspect of what is happening in our health service is the way in which we are looking to the future and seeking reform so that proper attention is given to primary care. I welcome that because GPs know what is most needed and important in their localities and because the more that we can do locally, the less need there is for patients to travel long distances to faraway hospitals in communities that they do not know.

In High Peak, we were privileged to receive a visit from the Prime Minister recently. As more than 90 per cent. of my constituents are covered by fundholding practices, I thought it appropriate that he should be taken to see one for himself. As it happened, we took him to the one that had won the fundholding practice of the year award, but it could have been any of the outstanding practices in my constituency. They offer new surgeries and treatments to our community. It is important to recognise that that does not benefit only the patients of fundholding GPs but the community across the board.

In Glossop, the average waiting time for in-patient treatment has dropped from 18 months to three and a half months since fundholding was introduced. For out-patient services such as dermatology, the waiting period has fallen from two years to four weeks; for gynaecology, from more than 11 weeks to four; for ear, nose and throat treatment, from 20 weeks to four. Those dramatic reductions have been brought about by fundholding practices and they help people across the community, not only those who use fundholding doctors.

Fundholding practices have been examining new ideas. Part of a cottage hospital has been brought back into use and turned into a rehabilitation unit. That process was started by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State five years ago when he was a Health Minister. He stopped the closure of that hospital. Now, thanks to the way in which our GPs and health authority have considered the matter, it has been given new life, enabling people who leave hospital to spend time there to ensure that they are ready to return home.

New services have been introduced. I shall not mention them all but they include locally provided electrocardiography, audiology, dermatology, an additional district nurse, a physiotherapist, an occupational therapist, and new chiropody services. Complementary therapies such as acupuncture and the Alexander treatment are provided by one Glossop surgery. That is the difference that fundholding has made.

The motion states that the Opposition

"believes that government policy has left many people in urban and rural communities without the access to health care they need, especially in relation to services for the elderly and for those being discharged from hospital".

That is sad because a few weeks ago the hon. Member for Stockport (Ms Coffey), as a shadow health spokesman—and unannounced as she did not have the courtesy to follow parliamentary protocol by telling me that she was coming—visited my constituency to see the services. According to the local papers, she said that she was greatly impressed. She should have seen how those services were being improved in a rural area and how they were delivering better services for my constituents.

It is not only fundholding doctors who are making great strides. Last week, I met Dr. Richard Fitton, who has a small practice in Hadfield. He sends all his patients who go to hospital a survey form to find out what was good, bad or needed improvement. If there are problems, he asks them to come and discuss them to assess how they can be addressed. That information is fed back to hospitals so that they can improve services and ensure that problems do not recur. That is the sort of health service that we want—one that is listening, learning and improving. That is why I so passionately believe that GPs should be at the forefront of taking reforms forward.

I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for the way in which he has listened to GPs in his consultation process on improving the health service. He met GPs in Buxton some months ago and took direct action on what he heard. In particular, he enabled them to implement their ideas, which had previously been impossible, on improving out-of-hours cover when surgeries are closed. GPs appreciate that the Government listen to their views.

As we consider how to take things forward, I hope that we will examine how to extend pilot schemes more widely than is currently proposed. We should encourage GPs to think widely about how to improve services. We need a no-holds-barred approach to deciding what to do next. I fear that some health authorities may try to stifle some of those excellent ideas. I want to ensure that there is a right of appeal so that ideas can be heard and developed.

The Government have suggested that through the efficiency index, GPs should improve their efficiency—their level of activity—by 2.75 per cent. One surgery in High Peak has improved not by 2.75 per cent. but by 34 per cent. That massive improvement in activity was the result of becoming a fundholding practice. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will examine the formula that has been set by the Department whereby one episode in secondary care equates to 54 in primary care. That is a disincentive for health authorities to reconfigure their services and should be reassessed. He should also reconsider whether there should be a requirement that there should be a GP on the board of every health authority so that we can be certain that the views of GPs will be taken into account as their ideas and policies are developed.

In Buxton, there is an important review of our hospital services that centres on the Devonshire royal hospital, which is one of the most remarkable hospitals in the country. It must be the only hospital in the country that was built not as a hospital, but as riding stables 200 years ago. As time passed, and the landed gentry stopped coming to Buxton in such large numbers, and thus no longer required somewhere to exercise their horses, the building was covered with a dome and was gradually turned into a hospital. In fact, it is the widest dome of any building in Europe outside St. Peter's in Rome—not what one might expect to find on top of the Pennines. It has now become one of the most important centres for the delivery of health care, especially recovery from serious injuries, using the remedial powers of our local spa waters.

Inevitably, the building's running costs are high because of the history of the building and its structure. I welcome the imaginative new approach that has been taken, thanks to Ministers, to find a joint way forward by combining the health aspects of that building with its heritage aspects to see how best we can keep that hospital in operation. Currently talks are going on between NHS Estates and English Heritage. I hope that the Minister will keep a close eye on those discussions to ensure that they come to a fruitful and valuable conclusion.

I have listened to Opposition Members' speeches, and the most important point to remember is that we must look at the reality of our health service. Year on year, the health service provided in High Peak is improving, as it is right across the board. New services and new treatments are being carried out in better facilities. Those services are being provided more locally after a shorter waiting period and are delivered by a wonderfully dedicated and expert staff.

Of course there are difficulties and problems—they are inevitable in a service that treats millions of patients every year. We seek to consider them in detail to see how, in each year, we can learn from the problems that we face and move on to improve the service yet further. The sadness of it is that all that would be ruined by a Labour Government, for all their fine talk about their commitment to the health service. We know from their history that the real funding crises in the health service have occurred under a Labour Government—the only time in its history when funding was cut occurred under a Labour Government.

We also know that there is a real problem now because of the Opposition's complete confusion over policy and the future of fundholding. The motion is fundamentally flawed because the Labour party does not have any proposals to take our health service forward. That motion should be defeated in the interests of patients not only in High Peak but across the country.

The country will soon have to exercise choice on health issues. It will have to choose between a party that is committed to a year-on-year increase in health service funding—the Conservative party—and the Labour party, which is not. People must make a choice between a party that is committed to creating a health service led by patient need—the Conservative party—and a party which is still led too much by producer interests. The choice will be between a party that believes in increasing efficiency, but not at the cost of quality of patient care—the Conservative party—and the Labour party, which has opposed virtually every step that we have taken to improve efficiency.

The health service is in a better condition now than it has been in the 49 years since it started. There is no ground for complacency because a huge amount still needs to be done. The way to show that is by rejecting the motion tonight.

8.22 pm

Mr. John Heppell (Nottingham, East): The hon. Member for High Peak (Mr. Hendry) says that there is no cause for complacency, but I have sat here and listened as every Conservative Member has been complacent. I have listened to a lot of speeches in the House: some have been boring and some have been controversial, but I congratulate the hon. Member for Wycombe (Sir R. Whitney) on managing to combine the two qualities in one speech.

I do not think that the hon. Gentleman was trying to mislead the House, but he did try to rewrite history when he gave us a lesson about how the Tory party set up the

[Mr. John Heppell]

NHS and has been one of its backers since 1918. If I may badly misquote Nye Bevan, one does not need a crystal ball to see what the Tories thought of the NHS—one has only to read Hansard, which shows that the Tories not only opposed the establishment of the NHS in principle, but opposed every clause, every line, every dot of the enabling Bill. I do not need any more history lessons from the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heppell: No, the hon. Gentleman has only just walked into the Chamber.

I do not agree literally with some of my constituents who feel that Parliament is often a pantomime, but we had a good performance from the pantomime dame tonight. All that we have heard about from Conservative Members has been good news. The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) gave the game away when he started to say, "Here is the good news." He then cited a great list of operations now being carried out, including those on cataracts. It would be good news indeed if anyone in my constituency had had any such an operation, but not 1,000, not 100 or even 10 people have managed to have any of those operations carried out.

The hon. Gentleman's contribution made me think back to our previous debate on the health service, on 20 November, when my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) revealed that the Tory party had launched a campaign to try to get people together who had good things to say about the NHS because it was worried about the bad stories coming out. It became clear today that all Tory Members have signed up to the good news club. We get no bad news at all from the Tories—only good news: there is no crisis, no problem and nothing to worry about.

It is a shame that that feeling is not shared by my constituents, nor by the National Association of Health Authorities and Trusts nor by the members of those trusts. That is clear from the letter of 9 January, which was sent to all members of trusts and health authorities and states:

"Dear Council Member

Emergency Admissions

NAHAT is receiving many messages of concern from trusts and health authorities about the growing pressure being experienced by the NHS through rising emergency admissions. This has been exacerbated by the current bad weather and restrictions in the provision of personal social services during the Christmas period."

The trusts and the organisation that represents them and also the health authorities recognise that there is a problem, but the Minister and his hon. Friends still do not seem to recognise that.

The crisis in my area did not start at Christmas, as it seems to have done for many others. In the debate on 20 November, I recounted how the chairman of Nottingham health authority had said that the authority faced a deficit of £11 million and that it would be a disaster if it did not manage to overcome it.

Mr. Malone: I am grateful that the hon. Gentleman is now discussing finance, as I assume that his thesis is that his health authority has received insufficient funding. In fact, it was increased by 2.36 per cent. in real terms this year. Is he saying that any reduction in that on an annual basis during the lifetime of the next Parliament would be unacceptable to him, because that is exactly what those on the Opposition Front Bench are proposing?

Mr. Heppell: I do not agree with the Minister that that is what my right hon. and hon. Friends are proposing. The Minister should know that Nottingham health authority has been traditionally underfunded. According to the Government's own formula, it should receive more than 100 per cent. in funding because of its teaching hospitals, but it has never been funded at that level. The Government recognised that and gave it an extra £5 million; according to the Government's formula, it is being funded at 97.6 per cent.—which is still not equivalent to 100 per cent, but at least it is an improvement.

I am worried, however, because the Under-Secretary of State for Health—the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam)—has acknowledged that the extra allocation is for next year and that this year the authority already faces a £7 million deficit. The problem for me is that nothing has been done to help the authority this year. On 20 November, I stated that Queen's medical centre at Nottingham had had to cancel 350 non-emergency operations for October, November and December because of that funding crisis. Because of the exceptional circumstances at Christmas and the new year, even more operations have now had to be cancelled.

I recognise that there were exceptional circumstances this winter, but I do not completely accept that argument. The Queen's medical centre said that there was a 50 per cent. increase on normal levels for Friday evenings and Saturdays. It should not compare the Friday and Saturday over Christmas with a normal weekend; it should compare those days with Fridays, Saturdays and Christmases in the past, and with days when there has been bad weather. Many of the circumstances are predictable: winter, Christmas and the new year are not exceptional—we know about them. I do not pretend to be a great fan of Michael Fish, but when he forecasts sub-zero temperatures, I do not need Mystic Meg to tell me that if there is ice, some people will slip on it and hurt themselves, and that if they hurt themselves badly they will end up in hospital, which will mean that more hospital beds will be needed. It all seems fairly simple to me. I am sure that people should be better able to plan for that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Gunnell) talked about past problems when people have been left on trolleys for hours. At one stage over Christmas and the new year, the Queen's medical centre in Nottingham ran out of trolleys. It was not just a case of people not having beds: they could not even get trolleys. I took the problem up with the chief nurse, who assured me that it was not a problem as it was only the accident and emergency department that had run out of trolleys and that staff had managed to get spare trolleys from elsewhere in the hospital.

I did not know that there were spare trolleys lying about, and it makes me wonder why the same argument is not used about beds: why cannot all the spare beds that are left lying around in hospitals be used? That never seems to happen. The reason is that there are not so many beds as there used to be. In my own region—the Trent area—there were 11,085 acute beds in 1989-90; by 1995-96, the figure was down to 10,333. Overall, the total number of beds lost in that short period was 5,197. I accept the arguments for some beds going and I recognise that the different ways in which patients are now treated mean that not so many hospital beds are needed, but if some of those beds had been saved, the problems experienced at Queen's medical centre might not have occurred. Some 3,193 of those beds were general or acute beds; they were not beds that were no longer needed because of care in the community.

I am not so concerned about what happened on those nights when the emergency services almost reached breaking point. I am more concerned that not only were 350 operations cancelled in October, November and December, but there is now a hold on all operations. Although there have been plenty of examples in the local press since Christmas—headlines include

"Ops fall victim to QMC rush"

the public have still not been told the complete truth. On 30 December the medical director instructed that only urgent surgical cases and people who had spent more than 18 months on the waiting list would be taken in for treatment, the latter being done to help the Government figures for waiting lengths of more than 18 months, not for medical reasons.

On 6 January that policy was changed again. It was said that the only patients to be admitted for operations were emergency and life-threatening cases. None of the operations and new procedures that the Government say are great and can be done on the NHS is being carried out on my constituents. They were denied operations in October, November and December and they are now to be denied them in January, February and March. For six months of the year, all that my constituents can get is emergency provision. When will that become a crisis? Will it be when they can get only emergency provision for nine, 10 or 11 months of the year? The Government must accept that there is a crisis now.

The problem may seem slight to the Minister. The press release lists conditions such as hernias, which people think are not that special. I will describe some of my constituency cases involving people waiting for treatment. One woman is waiting for a hysterectomy. She was expecting to have the operation on 29 November; now she is not likely to get it until the new financial year. Men may not think that that operation is important, but I bet that there are not many women who take that view.

Another case involves an elderly lady with an arthritic spine; she, too, will have to wait until the new financial year before she can have an operation. Someone with a swollen bladder was taken into the operating theatre and then taken out again; he was sent home two days later and told to ring to find out when a bed would be available for him. By the time he did so, the ban had been imposed and he was told, "Sorry—no operations until the next financial year." If I had a swollen bladder, I would not think that it was trivial. Someone whose knee is in danger of packing in and who has already had two operations on it has now been told, "We'll have to wait until it gets worse: when it goes completely, we'll fit you up with a new knee rather than doing the surgery now."

Those problems are serious. Ministers may say that such operations are merely routine, but they are important for those waiting for them. If Ministers had to rely on the health service as most of my constituents do, rather than having private health insurance, they would ensure that such problems were put right tomorrow.

8.35 pm

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): I am delighted to have the opportunity to participate in the debate, having only recently renounced my Trappist vows as a parliamentary private secretary in the Department of Health.

In discussions and debates on the national health service in this country, we owe it to the Opposition to do them the courtesy of adopting their definition of success. The definition of success that we can rely on is that of the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), who said that the acid test of the success and effectiveness of the NHS in this country was the number of people treated. He speaks from some knowledge and experience as it was his party that cut spending on the NHS in real terms during the last Labour Government in 1977-78. To bring the matter up to the present day, despite all the bluster and the individual case studies about which we have heard today, we have still to hear a commitment from the Opposition Front Bench to match the Government's pledge to increase NHS funding year on year above the rate of inflation.

All that we need to do to see the success of the NHS is to look at the figures. Despite all the arguments about finished consultant episodes—a basis for gathering statistics, the origin of which lay in the last days of the last Labour Government—so long as we use the same yardstick, we can track an increase in the amount of treatment available to individual patients in the NHS. When all the rhetoric and party politics are stripped away, that is what really matters.

We know that more than 3 million more treatments were carried out in 1995 than in 1979—and 1 million more than in 1991, when we introduced the NHS reforms. That means that 3,500 more treatments were carried out each day. Do not those statistics put into stark perspective the individual cases culled from hon. Members' constituency correspondence? The number of hip replacements is up from under 29,000 in 1978-79—and from zero not many years before that, when the operation was not available—to more than 58,000 last year.

Another acid test of whether the NHS is working well is waiting times, about which we hear much less from Opposition Members than we used to. Could that be because since 1987 the number of patients waiting more than a year for hospital treatment has been cut from more than 200,000 to just 15,000? Half of all patients are seen immediately and half of the remainder are seen within five weeks. Nearly 75 per cent. are seen within three months and 98 per cent. within a year.

Another commonly accepted yardstick of the health of a specific nation and of its health service's success is life expectancy. We know that in Russia male life expectancy has decreased in the past few years, but a child born today in this country can expect to live two years longer than a child born in 1979. Over the same period, the proportion of babies dying in the first year of life has fallen by almost a half. By any standards, those are impressive figures.

We have heard about the increase of 55,000 in the number of nurses and midwives and of 22,500 in the number of doctors and dentists. We hear a lot about so-called bureaucracy in the NHS, but it is worth remembering that, according to recent figures, for every senior manager in the NHS there are no fewer than 77 other people providing direct care to patients.

Of course, measuring the success of the NHS is not only a matter of figures; it also depends on the experiences of individual patients who present to their doctor or their local hospital. As I go around local GPs' surgeries and local hospitals, I think that the experience of patients is much as is reflected in the figures. Record numbers of patients are being treated—some 39,000 were treated last year in Eastbourne hospitals, and that figure is likely to be exceeded this year. Around 40 per cent. of the electorate in my constituency is of retirement age or older and, on average, as happens across the country, the elderly members of the population account for a greater proportion of NHS spending than other age groups, as is absolutely right and proper.

The increasing figures do not happen simply by accident; they are the result of the magnificent efforts of doctors, nurses, ancillary workers and—yes, let it be said—managers. We have increased funding year on year and we have promised to continue to do so. This year's increase for my area was the second largest in the country—some £15.8 million extra in cash terms for the local health authority, which represents a real-terms increase, after inflation, of 2.38 per cent. Even the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) was good enough to describe such increases as "relatively generous" and he was absolutely right.

A primary care-led NHS is a cornerstone, if not the cornerstone, of Government policy. Primary care is doing well, not only in my constituency, but across the country. By April, some 60 per cent. of patients in this country will be part of a fundholding practice. Only the other day, I visited one such practice in my constituency—that of Dr. John Clarke and his partners—and was present at the unveiling of a new bone scanner to gauge conditions such as osteoporosis. The scanner was installed at that practice, but it will be available for use by other GPs throughout the area. That would have been almost inconceivable in the old NHS and it is a perfect example of the flexibility and high aspirations of the modern NHS under the Conservative Government.

Another exciting development in and around my constituency has been the recent setting up of a pilot total purchasing project, which involves family doctors and all 15 practices in Eastbourne and the surrounding area and covers a staggering 135,000 patients with a total purchasing power of £70 million. It is an incredibly impressive scheme and I believe that it is the largest in the country. The board represents some 70 GPs in nine non-fundholding and six fundholding practices, as well as the health authority and the community health council. I foresee provision in many other parts of the United Kingdom developing in a similar manner and our local total purchasing project will show the way.

We have heard a great deal in the debate about winter pressures. The problem tends to happen every year: it is a combination of influenza, cold weather and illness among medical staff. Like other hon. Members, I keep in touch with the accident and emergency department at my local district general hospital and staff there have been coping well. I spoke recently to the consultant, Mr. Rowland Cottingham, and to the chief executive and they believe that they are coping well, despite the extra pressures. I hope to visit the accident and emergency department again very soon. I should mention in passing that Mr. Cottingham and his colleagues were recently involved in the piloting in my area of the health services accreditation initiative, which was launched only a few days ago as a national programme for the NHS.

Nationally, we have learnt the lessons of previous winters. As mentioned, we have set up the national intensive care bed register and we have pumped an extra £25 million into the system to help it to cope with winter pressures. In my area, arrangements for handling emergency hospital admissions have been agreed between East Sussex, Brighton and Hove and the aim of that co-operation between hospitals in our area is to ensure that hospital beds will always be available for emergency patients. The hospitals have agreed to keep the Sussex ambulance service up to date with how many beds are available and to work together, sharing the pressure, if one hospital is full. Local GPs are also being kept informed. That is a sensible, straightforward way of dealing with the inevitable peaks and troughs of pressure on accident and emergency departments.

Finally, I turn to Opposition policy on the national health service—if policy is not too ambitious a word to describe the ragbag of prejudice and anecdote that we have heard today from Labour Members. The problem facing the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) is this: the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) has bowled out his middle stump—indeed, he has gone further and broken the hon. Gentleman's cricket bat over his knee. The hon. Gentleman therefore has no way of promising extra money for the NHS—it would appear that that option has gone. Either the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East means what he says, in which case a Labour Government—if such a thing were ever to happen—would apply Conservative spending plans, or the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury is right to promise extra money for the NHS and his right hon. Friend is wrong. Which is true? We should be told.

The Labour party is now apparently committed to working on the basis of the Conservative Government's spending plans if Labour were to win an election—this at a time when Labour has still not matched nor come close to matching our pledge on NHS spending. The British people do not need to take our word on NHS spending—they need only look at our record to see how, year after year after year, we have increased spending on the NHS in real terms and how the Government have made it a priority. NHS spending has increased by a massive 74 per cent. in real terms since 1979; as we have heard, it now represents spending of £724 for every man, woman and child in this country, whereas the equivalent figure in real terms for 1978-79 was only £444.

The other worry lurking behind what passes for Labour party policy on health is the trade unions. We have heard once or twice today about the winter of discontent. It has been rightly said that a two-year freeze on public spending would be the equivalent of two winters of discontent. Last time, the dead remained unburied, cancer patients had to cross picket lines for treatment, and earlier today my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Mr. Hendry) told the moving story of how his father was treated at that time when he was suffering from cancer.

The people to whom I talk on their doorsteps and in my surgeries have nothing but praise for our NHS. Opposition spokesmen have a vested interest in denigrating and running down the NHS and the efforts and commitment of those who work in it. It is a measure of their growing desperation that the picture that they paint of the NHS is wholly unrecognisable, not just to those who work in it but to those who use it. Anyone who has recently used the NHS, or who has a close family member who has, will have nothing but praise for it. I suggest that Opposition spokespersons talk to those people instead of listening to the horror stories that they have been spinning today. The fact is that the NHS is a great British success story, and it deserves the support of us all.

Mr. Gerry Steinberg (City of Durham): I want to discuss two topics that have resulted from the NHS reforms; and to be very parochial. The first is the new district hospital for Durham; the second is the shortage of hospital beds in Durham.

The project for the new hospital was promised more than 20 years ago. The old area health authority and the North-West Durham health authority had had the lowest capital expenditure in the whole northern region. In the early 1990s, therefore, it was agreed to build a new district general hospital. In February 1992, when the choosing of a site for the new hospital was proving difficult, the then chairman of the North regional health authority, Peter Carr, wrote to me as follows:

"You can be assured that the new hospital will be constructed. The capital funds have been set aside and the Durham project is top of our priority list."

Five years later, we still have no new district general hospital, and I am not confident that we will ever get it.

Since then, the Government have refused to build any new hospital buildings out of public sector funds and have turned to their so-called private finance initiative, which is a complete and utter failure. At the moment, the PFI is nothing but a con trick—a promise of new hospitals which just do not happen.

In 1994, the Minister for Health told me that, since the launch of the PFI in 1992, the NHS had been encouraged to exploit the benefits of collaboration with the private sector. He continued by saying that, increasingly, the private sector is bringing in its innovation, dynamism and experience to the NHS, to improve services and get better value for money. Perhaps the same Minister tonight will tell me where there has been a successful PFI incorporating these conditions: it is certainly not in Durham. I am led to believe that there is not one in the whole country either. Indeed, the Library told me this morning that no building work had started on any scheme, and that there was no date set for any to start.

I was originally told that the preferred bidder and the business case would be finalised by the end of 1994; yet today, at the beginning of 1997, we have not even reached that stage. Is that an example of the success of the private finance initiative?

In 1996, the trust told me that the full business case had been prepared, and that—in conjunction with County Durham health authority—the preferred option would be forwarded to the Treasury for final approval. We are still waiting. The trust continues to claim that this is quicker and more efficient than building in the public sector; and the trust continues to tell us that the hospital will be completed quicker than it could have been by the public sector. What a load of hogwash.

The cost of the PFI process so far has been well over £1 million; this cost has been incurred just by the procedure, nothing else. Meanwhile, the trust's financial position has worsened. More than 50 beds have been closed; theatre sessions have been reduced; targets have been set; and there are limits for certain operations. The trust was told that it had to save £2 million during the current financial year. Those measures are a direct result of financial pressures, but they are also in line with the trust's long-term strategy for the new district general hospital in Durham.

In 1996-97, there is a £2 million loss of revenue. In 1997-98, a further £2 million loss is projected. For 1998-99, another £1 million loss is projected. Even with all these savings, there is still no guarantee of a new hospital being built. An interim rationalisation plan continues in place—the running down of services in the sister hospital at Shotley Bridge, and the transfer of services to Dryburn in Durham.

The situation in October was so grave that I received a letter from the consultant dermatologist, Mr. Ive, and signed by another eight senior consultants at the hospital. It concerned the acute crisis in medical services in north Durham. He said:

"There is a great danger of a collapse of general medicine, including cardiology and heart attacks in North Durham, as a result of a halt being called to a process of site rationalisation, whereby Shotley bridge was going to gradually decant into Dryburn. The situation has gone so far that we are now unable to recruit junior staff to Shotley Bridge beyond February and the Post Graduate Dean would certainly not allow junior staff to work there beyond that time."

What a dreadful situation for the health service in Durham to be in.

I do not blame the hospital trust or County Durham health authority, although both could have acted slightly differently at times. The fault clearly lies with the Government, and with the health reforms that have created this appalling mess. I blame privatisation and the breaking up of the health service.

As for building the new district general hospital, things go from bad to worse. Last September, the director of technical and leisure services for Durham city council contacted me by letter. He informed me that senior members and officers of the council had met representatives of the North Durham Acute Hospitals trust, the health authority and representatives of Consort Healthcare, which is the PFI partner of the authority. He wrote:

"It is apparent that for the hospital to be built and fitted out, the PFI partners wish to raise finances by the utilisation of surplus land on the Dryburn site for a retail development. Senior members are concerned that the City Council will be faced with the proposal for inappropriate development to finance a funding gap to provide a much needed district general hospital. They feel that the citizens of Durham should not be required to make such a choice, nor would they be able to recommend that they do so."

In effect, it was being requested that a supermarket be built in the hospital grounds in one of the most sensitive parts of Durham—a suggestion both stupid and unreasonable. I immediately made my position clear on this issue, and said that I would not support such a supermarket development on the hospital site and would not be prepared to have the council or myself blackmailed into accepting the retail development, even if it meant losing the new district general hospital.

The trust was adamant that it was blackmailing no one, but was simply requesting that the land be built on to make extra money to help fit the hospital out. However, the presentation which the hospital trust gave the local authority made it clear that there was an attempt to influence the council's decision on whether to grant planning permission on the basis that the hospital would not be built. It said:

"Funding issues: funding shortfall exists. Not possible to realise full extent of service provision. More existing buildings retained and new buildings left as a shell until cash available. Disposal of surplus land necessary. Complete scheme relies on maximum return on surplus land. Food retail development is only solution for surplus land to bridge the gap."

It was clear that, unless the trust obtained planning permission to build a retail development, our district general hospital was threatened. That is what the PFI means—no new facilities unless the private sector can make a killing.

I shall now deal with the lack of beds in the hospital. In 1995, prior to the cost improvement measures taken in the hospital, there were 670 beds. At one stage before that, there were 900 beds. There are now 580 beds. The original outline business case, which was approved in December 1994, gave the PFI bid a figure of 565 beds. We are now told that the trust has undertaken a fundamental review of bed numbers and the number of beds in the new PFI bid has been cut to 454.

The trust tells us that that is all that is necessary. I neither accept nor believe that. The drastic cut in the number of beds has taken place simply because of the amount of cash available under the PFI bid. If we ever get a hospital, it will not have enough beds. How on earth can a new hospital with 454 beds cope when the present hospital with 580 beds cannot cope?

Morale is so low among consultants in the hospital that many are thinking of leaving. When I discussed the matter with a consultant, he said: "There is a smell of decline." What are we coming to when a consultant says that there is a smell of decline in a hospital? The interim rationalisation programme has made virtually no savings, and straight cuts will have to be made over the next three years. Cuts totalling some £8.6 million—15 per cent. of the budget—are now forecast. That is even higher than originally thought.

If the PFI bid cannot produce more than 450 beds, it is not worthy, and should be looked at again. The brand new state-of-the-art hospital that has been described, with 450 beds, will be unable to cope.

Although I have been receiving complaints from my constituents over the past year or so about the lack of beds, in the space of a week, I have been contacted on two separate occasions about the lack of beds in the hospital.

On one occasion, Mrs. Budd, a constituent of mine, had been on a waiting list for a serious operation. She was twice given a date and, on both occasions—once in October and once in November last year—her operation was cancelled and no further date was offered to her. She was informed that her operation had been cancelled because, although the consultant could do the operation, no intensive care bed was available for her after the operation. I was told this morning that last week she was given another date. Guess what happened—the operation was cancelled again. It is a sad state of affairs when a consultant cannot proceed with an operation because he cannot be sure that an intensive care bed will be available once the patient has had the operation.

A further appalling case was brought to my attention at the beginning of January. Mr. Taylor, an 84-year-old from my constituency, was admitted to hospital for treatment, but, unfortunately, no beds were available. Eventually, he was found a bed, but he tragically died some days later. The coroner was so concerned about this case that in court he advised the man's family to contact their Member of Parliament, because, he said, the case was so serious. The hospital is currently investigating the case.

The twist in the tail is that the chief executive of the trust, Mr. Brian Waite, the most vociferous supporter of the PFI bid, has done a runner. I am told that he has gone to a job with neither promotion prospects nor a wage increase. He has gone to Carlisle. Who would go to Carlisle when he could stay in Durham? I should have thought that Mr. Waite would have wanted to wait for the PFI bid to be completed and see his dream come to fruition. Perhaps he thought that, by the time that happened, he would have retired and might need a bed in a geriatric unit in Durham, which would not be available because all the beds would have been closed. That is probably why he has gone.

Mr. Waite's departure sums up the exact position: had he believed that the PFI would give us a new hospital, he would have waited to see it come to fruition. The fact that he has left tells us clearly what he felt was happening with regard to the future of the bid.

The private finance initiative is a farce, as are the national health service reforms. I suspect that the case in Durham is not unique, and, in the meantime, my constituents wait for a new district general hospital and have a steadily deteriorating service.

9.3 pm

Mr. Piers Merchant (Beckenham): There is often a tendency in the House to generalise to such an extent that the conclusions are almost worthless. Conversely, individual cases are sometimes dealt with so specifically that extrapolation to policy is virtually meaningless.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), to whom I listened with great interest, as I always do, is a past master at those two dubious arts. Today he surpassed even his usual ability in that respect. I was astonished at his nerve in citing a handful of sad and undoubtedly unacceptable cases and giving the impression that those illustrated the norm, which they palpably do not.

The hon. Gentleman seems to luxuriate in the idea of crisis. He has a fantasy that the national health service has reached such a point of crisis that it is about to collapse, which is plainly untrue. When he is unable to establish that theory, he insinuates that there is a cover-up and he cannot get all the facts. The only cover-up is the Labour party's policies—or lack of policies—on health.

The hon. Gentleman's speeches in the House are usually of a high standard, but today he rambled, probably because he saw lurking behind him the figures of his party's Treasury spokesmen. If they exercise such influence on him in opposition, I shudder to think what would happen if he were in government. The effect was that no policies emerged until the end of his speech, when he plucked out of the air two ideas that appear to be policy.

The first was about saving money. The hon. Gentleman claimed that he would be able to save £100 million by cutting bureaucracy. The House needs to know precisely how he will do that. One hundred million pounds is paltry, compared with what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already saved recently in bureaucratic costs: £300 million—three times that. How does the hon. Gentleman square that claim with the supposed policy of his party to restore the regional level of NHS bureaucracy? The regional level was cut out by this Government, saving precisely £100 million.

The hon. Gentleman's second policy seemed to be to do away with the internal market, yet he seems to defend the purchaser-provider split. That is a strange semantic exercise. I fail to see how he will do away with the market but keep the mechanism of the internal market. He owes the House a detailed explanation of how that will operate, what the cost will be and what disruption will be caused to the NHS by another apparently large reorganisation.

We also need to know what the impact of Labour's policy, whatever it may be, will be on the PFI. I listened with considerable interest to the remarks of the hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Steinberg) on that, because he described a situation surprisingly similar to that in my constituency, but moving in an entirely different direction.

Will the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury stop all the PFI schemes? How will he explain that to the people in the towns and cities throughout the country who are expecting hospitals to be built because PFI schemes are virtually in place? How will he justify robbing them of their hospitals?

What will the Labour party do about GP fundholding? How will it explain its intentions to the thousands of people who are benefiting because they are on the lists of GP fundholding practices? What will the hon. Gentleman say to them? What is his policy on GP fundholding? What he says in the Chamber contradicts what he told The Guardian on 1 November, when he seemed to advance some powerful and rather impressive arguments in favour of GP fundholders.

Dr. Hendron: I am in medical practice and have some experience of such matters. Some fundholders and their patients do very well, but is the hon. Gentleman aware that many non-fundholders who want to become fundholders are now not accepted? Government funding in the north of Ireland has not been ring-fenced for patients of non-fundholders. That is a serious problem—I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman has encountered it.

Mr. Merchant: I am grateful for that information. I am not an expert on Northern Ireland and I was not aware of the situation there. Thousands of my constituents benefit from belonging to GP fundholder practices and I welcome a change in the law that would, I hope, extend the scope of GP fundholding and make it more easily available to other GPs. I hope that that opportunity will be extended to Northern Ireland also.

The Labour party's final policy admission concerns the fundamental question of funding the NHS. I will not labour the point—which has been made effectively in the debate not only by Conservative Members but by the Liberal Democrat spokesman, the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes)—but, if the Labour party is to convince people that it has a credible policy for the health service, it must have a credible policy for funding the health service. That is completely lacking from its policy agenda. The Government have pledged to ensure that funding for the health service increases in real terms every year for the next five years. That is a powerful, and I think very welcome, pledge to the people of this country.

The remainder of my remarks shall concentrate on some local topics affecting my constituents which also illustrate important elements of national policy. I think that we can measure the worth of a policy most effectively by gauging how it affects individuals in a particular area. We should not use single examples or make national generalisations, but look at the impact of policy within a constituency or a health authority area.

My constituents consistently raise three issues with me. The first is waiting lists. That is a good-news story as far as the health service is concerned. Waiting lists are potentially the source of greatest concern to the ordinary person. Therefore, their reduction must be a priority and, when that is achieved, it is a triumph. That is precisely what has happened in my constituency. In the year end at March 1996, not one of my constituents waited for more than 12 months for medical treatment. That is a dramatic improvement on the record of the previous 10 years. I am assured that the results will be just as good this year, give or take a handful of people—we are seven over at present and we were seven under a few weeks ago. I am sure that the yearly average will show a wait of no more than 12 months. I think that that is real and welcome progress.

The results in my constituency match the national figures that have been cited: a reduction since 1987 from 200,000 people waiting 12 months or more for treatment to only 15,000. That is a marked policy achievement that reflects the Government's commitment in that area. Our record funding for the health service of £43 billion and the extra £1.6 billion that will be spent next year are reflected at a local level. I pay tribute to Mark Rees, the chief executive of Bromley hospital, for ensuring that funding is well used at local level. Nationally, 75 per cent. of all patients are treated within three months, which is another excellent achievement.

The second issue is accident and emergency services. It is a difficult area and I do not disguise the fact that the service is not running perfectly in the Bromley area. However, to speak of a crisis or of collapse would be completely to distort reality. The period over Christmas and new year is always difficult owing to a surge in the number of accident and emergency cases. Local staff are working extremely hard to handle the increased work load and they are succeeding admirably. Although there are some unacceptable cases of people waiting too long for treatment—they receive emergency treatment immediately, but must sometimes wait in A and E until beds become available—there is no question of the system collapsing or of the A and E unit being closed. That is because of the forward planning that was done. Bromley hospital has created a new observation ward, into which it could channel some admissions for observation before moving them on to hospital beds when needed.

[Mr. Merchant]

It is important, too, to appreciate why there is a difficulty in that area. It is all very well hon. Members giving examples of problems that have emerged, but unless the reason is understood, little can be done to tackle them. The reason in Bromley is complex and long term and could not be solved overnight. For historical reasons, we have four different hospitals, serving a population of around 250,000, whereas ideally we would have only one.

Because we have four small hospitals, when A and E patients come in, they then have to be observed and stabilised, and, if it is decided to admit them, many have to be transferred to another hospital in the borough. There is no other way of handling the situation, because the hospital with the A and E department is not large enough and cannot be expanded. There is no room; it is right in the centre of the town. Therefore, they have to be moved elsewhere, which brings me to my third and final point.

There is a crying need—it is the only solution to this and a number of other local health problems—for a new acute general hospital. That would solve the problem of transfers and create a much more efficient system. There would not be the complex process of managing beds, wards and specialities in different locations. Patients would not have to be moved around, transported from hospital to hospital. There would be no need for diagnostic transfers. All those problems could be solved with a new acute general hospital. That is a PFI operation.

I return to the speech of the hon. Member for City of Durham. Bromley has been in a similar situation, in that, originally, 20 years ago, the need for a new acute hospital was realised. In 1992, there was a problem with planning over the then chosen site. We have now passed the planning stage, the preferred bidder stage and the interim business plan stage. We are now finalising the final business plan. All that has been achieved in a remarkably swift period, which shows that the PFI can work.

Shortly, a submission will go to the Treasury. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to do his best to ensure that, when the Treasury considers this case, which I believe it will in February, it does so thoroughly, and that a decision is expedited so that we can see bricks and mortar—the construction of a new hospital—because it is a priority for the people of my area. It will show that the PFI works, and will overcome many of the smaller problems to which I have alluded.

It is because I believe in the national health service, in the provision of free health care for all, across the board, that I also support the PFI. I believe that it will bring a bright new future for health care for my constituents, and will be another strong argument as to why they should support Government policy on health.

9.18 pm

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): I shall be as short as possible, Mr. Deputy Speaker. However, I want to draw the attention of the House to the situation that has emerged recently in the Dyfed Powys health authority. Two days before Christmas, the health authority published a strategy document in which it made some swingeing recommendations. I believe that it published the document only two days before Christmas because it wanted to defuse the public reaction that it feared was inevitable. That reaction is now mounting and it needs to be taken seriously.

The review is the outcome of a funding crisis that the health authority has for the moment. That crisis is being passed on to the trusts within the authority's area. The crisis has been caused by factors that I shall not take up now. However, the health authority reveals in its document—this part of it I believe—that it is underfunded because rurality is not considered significantly in the formula. It is a large region—the whole of Dyfed and Powys—and so needs four district general hospitals for a population that would need only two in an urban setting. Those hospitals are needed because of travelling distances.

The document states:

"there is a strong case for additional funding separately from a capitation basis for an area which has the scarcity of population and geographic area of Dyfed Powys."

The authority says in the previous paragraph, however, that it does not think that the Welsh Office will respond. It thinks that the formula will not be changed, and that even if it were, things might be made worse.

That is an appalling example of defeatism and a signal to the Welsh Office that the authority intends to do the business that the Welsh Office wants of it, which is to balance the books and cut services. In reality, we are talking only about cutting services. Let us not mince words about that.

The health authority reckons that it must pull back or save more than £11 million over the next four years. Accordingly, it makes proposals that are designed to achieve such a saving. First, it is proposed to reduce the number of trusts from eight to two or three. There is no problem with that in theory but the proposal raises the question why so many trusts were created only four or five years ago.

Secondly, it is proposed to close eight of 19 community hospitals. That is peculiar, given the endorsement from the Welsh Office in a document published only in August 1996, which emphasised the important role that community hospitals should play. I shall not quote at length from the Welsh Office document now, but another important institution in Wales, the Office of Research and Development for Health and Social Care, argues that community hospitals should or could be playing an enhanced rather than a reduced role.

It is clear that the health authority has not thought through its proposals for community hospitals. Its document states:

"We are prepared to discuss other options which would save the necessary money and provide effective services. In view of this, we are not being specific on the hospitals which close. We believe we have to work with our trusts".

It continues in that vein. It is clear that the authority is looking for cuts without having made a clear analysis of why community hospitals should be closed. On what basis has it made such a radical proposal—to close nearly half the cottage or community hospitals in the area?

The third proposal is to reduce the range of treatments or specialisms at a number of district general hospitals in the name of centralising activity. It is claimed that that is necessary because of an increasing trend towards specialisation and that sort of thing.

In reality, if the range of specialisms at a place such as Bronglais were reduced, the status of the district general hospital would be reduced. Indeed, it would no longer be a district general hospital. It would not survive in a meaningful sense as a DGH. That is an unthinkable option, bearing in mind the fact that the nearest other DGH is 50 miles away at Carmarthen. The others are much further away than that.

The content of the document is poor stuff. The paper is full of vague proposals that are based on unjustified preconceptions. Crisis management is masquerading as strategy, and that is unacceptable. If the proposals were implemented, decisions would be taken that in all likelihood we would be bitterly regretting five years later.

What is to be done in all the circumstances? Two things should be done now. If action is not taken, public reaction will justifiably be fierce. First, the health authority and the trusts should commission a properly conducted and objective study of the health care needs of Dyfed Powys. They should do so in association with the Office of Research and Development for Health and Social Care, which has expert knowledge and experience. It is in the business of building up a research understanding of health care needs in Wales. To that extent, I am much in sympathy with the Liberal amendment. The outcome of such an objective study, and the evidence that it provides, should be the basis of any restructuring.

There is a funding crisis and the Welsh Office could and should step in with £4 million per annum additional funding until 2000 when, according to the health authority, the situation would improve because the cuts resulting from the change in the formula would no longer apply. We need that kind of money. We need a proper approach to restructuring and a strategy based on evidence, and we need money in the meantime.

Many people in Wales are looking forward to the election, because they hope that the position will improve thereafter. In view of what has been said in the past few days, I question whether their optimism is justified. Many of us are profoundly worried that Labour has put itself in such a position that, following the election, it will find it difficult to add to public expenditure and investment, even though it may decide that it needs to do so. That issue will loom large in the next couple of months in the debate on health care in south-west Wales.

Ms Tessa Jowell (Dulwich): This has been a necessary and timely debate, but not one that the Government wanted. On two occasions, my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) sought an emergency statement on the winter crisis, but the Secretary of State declined to make one.

The British Medical Association said that this winter's crisis is the worst ever, and it provided a catalogue of evidence in support of that claim. What was the Minister's response? On the radio—not in the House—he said, in effect, "This is the winter. What do you expect? Demand always rises in the winter." Of course it does, but we expect the Secretary of State to be ready for it. He should be ready for the 'flu, bronchitis and other ills that winter brings, and for the inevitable and predictable spate of accidents caused by icy roads and footpaths, not to mention the increased fragility of elderly people in freezing weather.

The Secretary of State and his colleagues have obviously been on a course at the Yorkshire Water school of management studies. Only there could they have learnt to be surprised at the inevitable effects of the seasons. For Yorkshire Water, summer comes without anticipation of drought. For the Government, winter brings surprising new demands on the health service.

The Secretary of State will go on any radio or television programme at any hour of the day to tell a disbelieving public that there is no difference between Labour and the Tories on health. The Government believe that the market is the cure-all for the national health service. We shall get rid of the internal market. We shall keep commissioning separate from the provision of care, but co-operation, not competition, will be our approach, and it will work. That is what people who work in the health service want, because they know that that will begin to dismantle some of the obstacles that stand in the way of the delivery of best patient care.

As hospitals are forced to compete like businesses, so the purpose of their existence—the care and comfort of patients—is relegated. It is now commonplace for patients who arrive at a hospital to find that it is so short of beds—because they have been taken by emergency admissions—that planned operations have to be cancelled. Many of my hon. Friends have given examples of that problem. Other hospitals are so short of money that doctors, nurses and operating theatres work at below capacity, unable to perform operations until the next financial year. Increasingly, it is only the patients of GP fundholders who are able to have their operations before the end of the financial year.

The public are understandably mystified by this misallocation of resources—but not Ministers. Cancellation of operations and discrimination between patients on grounds other than clinical need are part of the ineffable wisdom of the market. It is the triumph of the ideologue, but the politics of the bargain basement.

My hon. Friends have given clear examples of the crisis. My hon. Friends the Members for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden), for Warrington, South (Mr. Hall), for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell) and for City of Durham (Mr. Steinberg) expressed concern on behalf of their constituents. Ministers have scorned the use of individual cases—and so would Opposition Members, if it were not that those cases illustrate the experience shared by so many others, and demonstrate the pressure on the service.

A 70-year-old man died in Sheffield after being ferried 90 miles from his home in the west midlands, where a bed could not be found for him. In London, 22 patients had to spend the night on trolleys at Kingston hospital, while patients awaiting treatment at Lewisham hospital have been told that they will not be seen until the end of the financial year. In Liverpool, 30 acutely ill patients were left waiting in a hospital corridor after a ward was forced to close. Those are the everyday stories of our national health service during this time of winter crisis. The examples that my hon. Friends and I have given, however, are not—as Ministers try to claim—what patients should have to expect from the NHS in winter.

The growth of bureaucracy has become a cancer in the operation of the national health service. According to the British Medical Association, since 1990 it has cost an extra £1.5 billion a year. That was entirely predictable, because every organisation has its own overheads. When organisations are competing, it is difficult to share, and each trust has its own director of staff, technology and communications; but, if resources were allocated properly, the overheads could be shared, as they were in the past. The internal market is an extravagant and inefficient way of allocating resources in a national health service.

Of all the fictitious slogans ever coined to mislead the public, none was more misleading than the one that proclaimed that the national health service was safe in Tory hands. What are the origins of the failure? First, there is the pace at which acute beds have been closed throughout the country, which has been described so clearly by my hon. Friends on the basis of their experience in different parts of the country, and which has given change such a bad name. For most people, change means less: it means that their local hospital will close, and that nothing will be provided in its place.

Secondly, the competition between hospitals that has resulted from the internal market means that, instead of co-operating, hospitals have become what they have aptly been described as—city states at war with each other. Thirdly, there is the demoralisation of staff who must push paper and fill in forms rather than tending patients and performing operations. That demoralisation is driving doctors and nurses away from the national health service in numbers that begin to threaten the service itself. Let me make it clear that Opposition Members draw a clear distinction between the bureaucracy that, like bindweed, consumes the efficiency of our national health service, and the importance of skilled and effective management, to which we pay tribute.

Fourthly, there is the failure to provide elderly people with support as part of community care. We know—any visit to any accident and emergency department over the past few weeks will have shown—that, overwhelmingly, the patients who are lying in bays waiting for beds are very elderly people. A ward sister said that the average age of 18 of the patients whom she had nursed in temporary beds on a recent Saturday night was 85.

It would be asking too much of the Government to admit that they were wrong, but it is not too much to ask Conservative Members before they vote to think of their constituents. This winter's crisis was not inevitable, nor was the deterioration in standards of care. It was not like that before and it does not have to be like that in future. A few days ago, a senior nurse told me, "We simply did not have patients on trolleys in 1989."

Sir Raymond Whitney: The hon. Lady has just said, "It was not like that before". She is right, because during the time of the Labour Government, 7 million people were treated each year. Now we treat 10 million patients a year. There are 55,000 more nurses and 20,000 more doctors than when Labour was in government, and they are all paid more. There are no NHS strikes to prevent people getting into hospital. The hon. Lady is right; it was not like that before.

Ms Jowell: That intervention shows precisely the problem with Conservative Members. They paint a picture of the national health service that is unrecognisable to those who work in hospitals and to patients throughout the country who are waiting for treatment. As usual, Ministers have failed to notice, even less to accept, the recent advice to London hospitals by inner-London chief executives whose study of the balance between planned and emergency admissions led them to recommend a bed occupancy rate of 85 per cent. instead of the 98 per cent. or more than 100 per cent. at which most hospitals are now required to operate under the strictures of competition.

As today's King's Fund report makes clear, psychiatric hospitals are barely coping because in some cases bed occupancies are running at 125 per cent. It is called hot bedding. In paediatric intensive care, 70 per cent. bed occupancy is recommended to guarantee consistent levels of care. Apparently, there is a difference between the inevitable and the entirely predictable. Ministers believe in the inevitability of patients on trolleys, cancelled operations and the consequent despair, but apparently none of it is predictable.

My hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Gunnell) spoke about the growth of the NHS as a safety net service. There is an intolerable and rising level of violence in accident and emergency units. For staff seeking to offer treatment, it is appalling and unforgivable that people in need of emergency treatment should attack those who are there to help them. However, that is what happens when the accident and emergency department becomes the safety net and the court of last resort.

There is an alternative to the crisis. Even at this late stage in their life, let the Government admit that the internal market, or what Dr. Sandy Macara of the British Medical Association prefers to call the infernal market, has failed. Let them free hospitals to co-operate in delivering a public service rather than forcing them to compete as private businesses. That would create flexibility and allow hospitals to match beds and treatment to need. That is especially important at this time for the elderly who make up the majority of those who are queuing for beds.

We shall shortly publish proposals for a recovery service that will bridge the gap between hospital and home for elderly people. I have no hope that the Government will accept our proposals, but I urge them to study them carefully during their leisure days. They will have plenty of them in opposition. We must stop the haemorrhaging of staff, particularly nurses, from the national health service.

The Secretary of State said on the radio this morning that the national health service can never be perfect. Perhaps that is the standard that Conservative Members are prepared to settle for. The achievements are great, but they are great despite the Government rather than because of them.

For the sake of staff and patients, we have attempted in this debate to puncture the Government's complacency and provide a glimpse of the difficult reality being faced by our hospitals throughout the country, but we have no hope that the Government will listen, and act on what they have heard. Rebuilding the national health service will come with a Labour Government after the next election.

9.40 pm

The Minister for Health (Mr. Gerald Malone): General elections are won on substance and there has been no substance from the Labour party on what will be one of the key battlegrounds of the general election whenever it comes. Early in her speech, the hon. Member for Dulwich (Ms Jowell) mentioned co-operation, not competition. That is the only policy that the Labour party has to offer for health. It is a cliché, a mere slogan, which is as meaningless as the social contract of the 1970s. Anybody involved in the health service will understand that that is so.

Many hon. Members have participated in the debate and I should like to deal with the detailed points they raised. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) was concerned about the Longbridge primary care centre in his constituency. Approval for funding of £2.5 million for that centre has now been forthcoming and we are awaiting planning permission, which is being sought. I hope that there will be rapid progress.

Mr. Burden rose—

Mr. Malone: If the hon. Gentleman does not mind, I will not give way, because I want to respond to all the points raised rather than enter into a debate on each of them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) spoke wisely and with care about the real world of the health service as she has experienced it in her constituency. Not for her the single unsubstantiated allegation: she had gone to considerable effort to find out what was going on in the hospitals in her constituency this winter of difficult pressure.

What my hon. Friend told the House was probably typical of what is happening in many hospitals. She said that there was an excellent spirit among the staff and that many of them returned to work during periods of leave when other staff were ill. She talked about positive management of the problems in hospitals, with team work helping to solve the problems that many of them face when there is increased pressure, which we concede has occurred during this winter.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) introduced what I thought was an interesting approach, and the House may agree. He wanted to take politics out of the NHS. Whenever we hear that from a Liberal Democrat spokesman, we look to our constituencies to see whether the party is taking politics out of the NHS there. I thoroughly agree that the NHS should not be the political football that the Labour party tries to make it, but admonitions from the hon. Gentleman suggesting that we need a system of independent statistics, to be set up in a way that he did not entirely explain, are bizarre.

My hon. Friends will be aware of the tactics of Liberal Democrats in their constituencies when it comes to presenting statistics. We have nearly all been subject to spoof surveys issued by the Liberal Democrats' campaigning department, announcing what the results of the survey should be before it has been carried out. At least I accept that the hon. Member for Dulwich probably made some telephone calls before she reached her conclusions. The party of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey does not even bother to do that.

I can also tell the hon. Gentleman that, if we are to hear any lessons about playing fair with the health service, perhaps he or those responsible for his party's operations will stop parliamentary candidates across the country setting up false stories so that they can simply knock them down. I had an example of that in my constituency this week. The prospective Liberal parliamentary candidate set up a story about a closure, which was a complete myth and was not even being suggested. He then said that he would be the saviour to step in and solve the problem. It was all bogus. We need no lessons from the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey about independent statistics of that kind.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Sir R. Whitney) was right to remind us of the history of the national health service and how far its roots go back beyond 1947-48. In an excellent speech, he made it perfectly clear that, as a Government, we had custody over these matters before the inception of the NHS, which has developed in our hands for far longer than it has been in the hands of the Labour party.

The hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Gunnell) seemed to support the spending plans of the British Medical Association. I hope that he has got that message through to his Front-Bench team. Many Opposition Members were keen to support every suggestion that extra spending should take place in the NHS—that was a common theme of the debate. I suggest that all those Opposition Members look to their Front-Bench spokesmen to find out whether the commitments that they expect to be honoured if Labour were ever elected would be honoured. On the basis of the stated policy of the Labour Front-Bench team, that would not happen.

The hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South also referred to private finance initiative schemes. I can confirm that 32 schemes have been completed, at a value of £78.6 million. In spite of what the hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Steinberg) may have asked for in the Library, if the Library does not have the information, I will undertake to put it there.

I hope that Opposition Members understand that the shilly-shallying of Opposition Front Benchers about their proposals for the PFI damages the prospects of building hospitals and facilities in each and every one of their constituencies.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight) said something important about the changed structure of the NHS, which the Opposition are criticising. She said that our reforms have given us some facts about costs, so we have been able to save money. Labour has consistently voted against that. My hon. Friend is right to remind us of that fact; when the Labour party says, "Co-operation, not competition," and says that it believes in the purchaser-provider split, but not in the internal market, it is saying that it wants to avoid all the difficult decisions that have to be taken in health care if one is going to drive better-quality health care out of the system for every pound of the taxpayer's money. The two go hand in hand. Ask anyone in the national health service if that can be done entirely comfortably and one will be told that Labour's policies are an Alice-in-Wonderland world.

The hon. Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Hall) asked about intensive care facilities. I can give him the figures for the north-west region, where 20 additional intensive care beds have opened in the past 18 months, bringing the regional total to 204. Six have been commissioned this month. These have been funded from national challenge moneys announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State just before the end of the year.

Mr. Hall: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Malone: I have already said that I do not intend to give way. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made it clear that that was part of an important strategy that he had put in place to tackle the winter problems that we knew we would be facing, and that is working extremely well.

In addition, nine extra high-dependency beds have been opened this month, a further 11 are funded to open in the year beginning April 1997 and an additional intensive care bed is to open in Warrington general hospital in April, following discussions between the Warrington Hospital NHS trust and North Cheshire health authority. I hoped that the hon. Gentleman would welcome that improvement in facilities in the area that he serves as a Member of Parliament.

Mr. Hall: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In my speech, I recognised the fact that that extra bed was being provided and it is wrong for the Minister to suggest that I did not do so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. That is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Malone: My hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) listed the achievements of the health service in his area. As he and I both know, that is a hard-pressed area for the health service in south London. I want to respond to his points.

With changes in the health service, when a reordering of services is needed to meet new clinical demands and needs, there will always be an on-going debate about the right balance of provision. I assure my hon. Friend that there is no suggestion that the Government are following a rigid template towards a conclusion. Of course, as change takes place we consider its effect on individual services; the provision of a higher-quality service is the watchword that governs those developments.

My hon. Friend also made a specific point about the chronically sick. He may care to note two points in that regard. First, the general improvements in primary care facilities in London as a whole, funded through the London implementation zone, are certainly helping to deal with the chronically sick. Secondly, my hon. Friend will understand and acknowledge that the National Health Service (Primary Care) Bill, currently in another place and shortly to come to the House, provides excellent opportunities for primary carers to do exactly as he suggested, and bring together innovative services to deal with special problems such as the chronically sick.

The hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) made several points, many of which centred on funding. I shall ensure that his other points are drawn to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, but I want to respond to some of the funding points now. For 1997-98, £1.642 billion has been made available for health and personal social services, providing an extra £56 million over the previous year. The hon. Gentleman may need to argue out the figures at a later stage, but I did not entirely recognise his interpretation, because they represent a 3.5 per cent. cash increase and a 1.5 per cent. increase allowing for inflation.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the comparison between Northern Ireland and the rest of the United Kingdom—and England in particular. We are spending about 15 per cent. more per capita on health and social care in Northern Ireland than in England. There have been various difficulties, not least in the present year, but the figures speak for themselves and reaffirm the Government's intention to continue to honour our commitment to the health service, despite adverse circumstances.

My hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Mr. Hendry) spoke about fundholding. He was right to speak of the benefits of a system that the Labour party would simply sweep away. I am delighted to endorse what he said. As he pointed out, I visited his constituency on one or two occasions, and I have seen the innovations that are taking place there, not least the modern cottage hospitals that are often manned by primary carers.

The general practitioners' plans about which my hon. Friend spoke cannot be stifled by the Labour party—particularly because that party will never get into government—or by health authorities, because if, after the National Health Service (Primary Care) Bill becomes law, GPs propose plans to rearrange primary care services in my hon. Friend's constituency, there will be an automatic right to bring them to the Secretary of State for approval as pilots.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell) spoke about his constituents and funding. As I pointed out during the hon. Gentleman's speech, following three bids for special national funding, Nottingham health authority has been funded very generously in real terms for next year, receiving £500,000 of extra funding.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson)—until recently my parliamentary private secretary, but now able to participate in these debates—pointed out that in his constituency there are pilots in purchasing that he knows would be abolished by a Labour Government. He was right to point that out, because those pilots are providing great benefits for his constituents.

The hon. Member for City of Durham asked about the trust business case. I can confirm that it was received by the NHS executive headquarters and by Her Majesty's Treasury in December 1996, and I hope that a decision to approve the full business case will be taken shortly. It is more likely to proceed with his active support than with the denigration that he tended to bring to the issue during the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant) rightly pointed out that the Opposition were luxuriating in an idea of crisis. That was characteristic of their speeches, especially those of their Front-Bench spokesmen, which were devoid of policy content. My hon. Friend rightly pointed to good management initiatives in his constituency that were managing the pressure.

I shall ensure that the speech of the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Dafis) is drawn to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Not only the House but the country could reasonably have expected to hear in this debate what the Labour party would seriously propose for the health service in the coming general election campaign. The truth is that nobody now believes the Labour party on health. To every interest group, it peddles high expectations that are shot down by the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). Even when the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) dines with the private sector, no new treatment that is canvassed is entirely ruled out. He nods his head and says that all is possible. He and other Labour spokesmen dine with the private sector to give it false assurances that Labour would be no threat.

I understand that the private sector has invested a considerable amount in Labour's shadow health team over the past two years. Just as one team goes out the door after pudding, a new one comes in for the first course of the next meal. In spite of all that, no one believes that the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury will deliver. Every solution to the problems of the NHS suggested by Opposition Members in this debate has implied more cash, which Labour is not prepared to pledge.

Labour has made one firm pledge, which was alluded to by my hon. Friends. It pledged to abolish GP fundholding, but it could not even get that right. That policy is Labour's two-card trick. On almost the same day, Labour managed to get two headlines: "Labour set to scrap fundholding" in The Independent, and in Doctor magazine, "Labour promises to retain fundholding".

On NHS savings, which will be the sole visible means of support for the health service under a Labour Government, we hear a variety of things. We hear that the savings will be £100 million and that it will all come from bureaucracy—but from where? Will it be health authorities, trusts, GP practices, or practice managers? Again, part of the problem is that it is a two-faced policy. A headline in This Week said, "Managers will not lose jobs in £100 million drive says Smith". The head of Unison, Bob Abberley, said that he was pleased about Labour's move away from attacking NHS managers. However, today Labour has attacked people who do a first-class job of delivering quality care in the NHS—and delivering it in a way that Labour would never have thought possible.

We heard nothing of some of the plans that Labour used to trumpet. It used to talk about using part of the £100 million savings to reduce waiting times for cancer surgery. A British Medical Association spokesman—Labour is usually keen to talk about such people—said that cancer surgery was usually done pretty promptly and that it was not helpful to set zero waiting lists. A simple matter of its declared policy has turned out to be an own goal for Labour.

At the centre of the debate lies the question of resources. Everyone in the health service understands that, although we can secure increased efficiency year on year, it is the commitment of the Government through our lifetime and beyond into the next Parliament to sustain spending on the NHS in real terms that is at the core of how our health service will grow. Labour's Front-Bench spokesmen have not yet matched the Prime Minister's pledge to increase spending on health during the next Conservative Government year on year on year.

I can tell the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury that no Labour delegation that has come to my office has not sought resources even greater than those that we are spending. The implication of every speech of Opposition Members has been that the Opposition will be satisfied only with far more spending. When the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East issues his strictures, he should look to the party behind him. There, every single one of them sits, political eunuchs one and all—all their spending parts neatly snipped away from them by the right hon. Gentleman. In a secret meeting at the weekend, the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury was not part of the magic circle.

Mr. Kevin Hughes: (Doncaster, North) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

MADAM SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House notes that the National Health Service is providing high quality care to more patients than ever before; congratulates the dedication and professionalism of the National Health Service's staff during the recent cold weather which has placed exceptional demands upon them; believes that the National Health Service requires a growing budget for patient care and therefore welcomes the Health Service Guarantee given by the Prime Minister to increase spending on the National Health Service in real terms in each of the next five years, including an extra £1.6 billion for patient care in 1997-98; and believes that this guarantee reinforces the Government's consistent record of investment in the National Health Service and its professional staff.

10.32 pm

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): I beg to move,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Selective Cull (Enforcement of Community Compensation Conditions) Regulations 1996 (S.I., 1996, No. 3186), dated 18th December 1996, a copy of which was laid before this House on 18th December, be annulled.

Madam Speaker: I understand that with this, it will be convenient to discuss the following motion:

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy Compensation Order 1996 (S.I., 1996, No. 3184), dated 18th December 1996, a copy of which was laid before this House on 18th December, be annulled.

Dr. Strang: The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will not be surprised to hear that the Opposition have tabled the prayer in order to debate this important subject, although we do not intend to vote against the selective slaughter programme.

The selective slaughter scheme that the House is debating tonight is part of the Florence agreement that the Prime Minister accepted in June. The House will recall that the Prime Minister said that the Florence agreement meant that all the conditions for lifting the beef export ban would be met by last October. However, today the beef ban is in place 100 per cent. and the Government have delayed progress for six months.

In September, the Government announced that they would not meet their side of the Florence agreement after all. Ministers gave various reasons for the delay, citing, first, the new scientific work available. However, as we pointed out at the time, any new scientific evidence simply meant that we could have a more effectively targeted selective slaughter scheme and certainly did not justify the Government's reneging on the Florence agreement.

The Minister also gave as an excuse the statement that the backlog in the Government's over-30-months scheme meant that there was not the abattoir capacity to begin a selective slaughter programme. I make the point that the enormous backlog—in October last year, it was estimated at 400,000 animals—was the Government's fault. They were responsible for the chaos. We appeal to the Government to ensure that the implementation of this slaughter scheme is operated considerably more efficiently and without all the problems that surrounded the OTMS.

Secondly, I do not accept that if the political will had been there, the Government could not have made some progress towards implementing the Florence agreement. The Minister admitted in December that no attempt had been made during the six-month delay even to identify the animals that were likely to be slaughtered under the selective slaughter programme. Valuable time was wasted.

The final reason that the Minister gave for the six months in limbo was that if we went ahead with our side of the Florence agreement, the European Union would not meet its side of the bargain and start to lift the beef ban. That is the most important question that the Minister must answer tonight. Now that the Government have done a U-turn on the Florence agreement, what hope can he offer our beef industry, our farmers and our food industry that the European beef ban will be lifted? Does the Minister care to follow the Prime Minister's example of last June and give us a timetable for the lifting of the ban?

The Government have still not submitted the working paper to the European Commission regarding the lifting of the ban on certified herds. I trust that the Minister will enlighten us on that. Indeed, if Radio 4 was correct this morning, I trust that he will advise us that the formal submission will go ahead and that progress can be made so that we can at least achieve quickly the first step of allowing the export of beef from certified herds and then have the whole ban lifted.

It is a terrible day for our livestock industry when Parliament has to agree that thousands of productive animals are to be slaughtered. It is vital that the selective slaughter programme is carried out sensitively. Some farmers and herdsmen will deeply resent the fact that animals that have not reached the end of their working lives are to be compulsorily killed. The cattle, some of them high-value pedigree animals, will have been a source of great pride to the herdsmen and farmers involved.

The Ministry must adopt a flexible approach to minimise the damage to farm businesses, accommodating concerns such as the operation of the milk quota scheme, and seeking to ensure that any herd involved in the compulsory slaughter is treated in such a way that farm businesses do not lose out in terms of fulfilling the milk quota. There is also the quota for suckler cow herds. It would be wrong if businesses were penalised through a reduction in the suckler cow quota as a result of animals being slaughtered under the programme. Indeed, I hope that the Minister will be able to assure us that the flexibility will enable them to avoid not only a reduction in quota but losing out on any suckler cow premium payments as a result of the scheme.

The House will also be aware that there is concern about the definition that the Government are using to determine herd size. If more than 10 per cent. of the animals in a herd are to be slaughtered, the compensation is so much higher and a premium is payable. There is great concern, however, that on this occasion the Government have, unusually, chosen to include for the first time heifers in calf. That will reduce the number of herds that qualify, in terms of over 10 per cent. of the animals being taken.

The Minister will be aware of many of the concerns about which the National Farmers Union and the Country Landowners Association have written to us. I trust that he will address these in the course of the debate. I must also impress upon the Minister that the highest standards of animal welfare must be upheld during the implementation of the programme.

There is the issue of maternal transmission. The Minister will remember that the Oxford study paper, which was published by Roy Anderson and his colleagues, included an assumption of maternal transmission. Indeed, Roy Anderson and his colleagues advised that the most effective targeting scheme would make some allowance for such transmission, albeit on a small scale. Is it the Minister's intention that if there is no change in the present fairly inconclusive position, and bearing in mind the evidence that will become available in February or March, nothing will be built into the targeting to include maternal transmission? It would be helpful if the Minister cast further light on the matter. As he knows, the Ministry has made it clear in its consultation document that a decision will be taken in February or March.

I know that many Members wish to speak in the debate. In conclusion, I remind the House that there can be no doubt that we would not be facing a crisis on such a scale had it not been for the fact that successive Conservative Governments throughout the late 1980s and early 1990s delayed in regulating to protect human and animal health. Above all, they failed abysmally to implement and enforce the regulations that they had put in place.

As I have said, it is a terrible day when the House has to agree to the slaughter of thousands of our cattle. However, the industry is facing a crisis on a huge scale.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Strang: This is a short debate that will continue for only one and a half hours. To allow as many hon. Members to speak as possible, representing as they do the length and breadth of the United Kingdom and all political parties, I do not intend to give way.

This is a terrible day. I am sure that the House accepts, however, that we must sanction the slaughter of so many productive cattle. The industry is facing a crisis and the worldwide ban on the export of beef and beef imports is inflicting enormous damage and is costing thousands of jobs and damaging livelihoods. The only mechanism available to us to get the ban lifted is to implement the Florence agreement, and for that reason we believe that the Government are right to set about putting into effect the selective slaughter programme of that agreement.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Douglas Hogg): The House has discussed the selective cull on a number of occasions and is well acquainted with the issues. Furthermore, the time allocated for debate is short. Therefore, my intention is to be brief.

There are two statutory instruments before the House. The first is the Selective Cull (Enforcement of Community Compensation Conditions) Regulations 1996 and the second is the Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy Compensation Order 1996.

The House will be aware that there is another order, the Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy (No. 2) Order 1996, which provides the powers to restrict and slaughter animals. That order is not subject to parliamentary procedure, but was made available in draft to hon. Members last summer when we discussed the cull before the summer recess.

The selective cull compensation regulations, if I might so describe them for brevity, make provision for the enforcement of certain requirements of the relevant Commission regulation, which itself provides for European Union co-financing of the compensation. The requirements relate to the slaughter, treatment and disposal of animals subject to the cull. They are identical to those for the over-30-months scheme. These regulations create offences and specify penalties.

The other order is the Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy Compensation Order 1996, which revokes and replaces the 1994 order. It contains new provisions that prescribe the amount of compensation payable for animals slaughtered under the selective cull. The compensation arrangements are based on the proposals that we discussed last summer with farming organisations and others. In drawing up those compensation proposals, we have tried to strike a balance between reflecting the cost to the farmer and avoiding overcompensation. Although it has been difficult to strike that balance, I believe that we have got it about right.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on pressing ahead with the selective cull. I hope that our partners in Europe will respond on their part of the deal. I put it to him that, until the tracing arrangements for the cull have been fully completed, we will not know what the impact will be on particular herds. On compensation, will he consider sympathetically any cases that may emerge of herds that turn out to be particularly badly affected?

Mr. Hogg: I am about to give details of the compensation. I suspect that my hon. Friend has in mind the problems that may be experienced by the closed herd and the suckler cow herd. I shall deal with that in the next few moments.

I shall briefly summarise the compensation provisions. For male animals, compensation will be at the market value. For female animals, it will be 90 per cent. of the replacement value or the market value, whichever is the higher. That is in recognition of the point put to us by farming organisations last year that replacements may cost more than the present value of the animal to be replaced.

In addition, a top-up payment will be available for herds that lose more than 10 per cent. of their productive animals. That is designed to meet the concerns of farming organisations, by recognising the dislocation to the business during the re-establishment of the herds. It will be available to suckler herds as well as to dairy herds. The top-up is subject to a ceiling of £250 per animal, which reflects a maximum deemed value for top-up purposes of £1,000.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that this saga has caused enormous anxiety and concern among farmers, including many in my constituency? Will he explain why he has adopted such an arbitrary and artificial definition of a herd, and why the top-up calculations are so restrictive?

Mr. Hogg: We have to define a herd for the purposes of the regulations. In defining a herd, we have taken into account the productive animals. That seems sensible. I suspect that what is on my hon. Friend's mind is the inclusion in the definition of in-calf heifers. If we were not to include in-calf heifers in the definition of a herd, the compensation payable to a farmer would depend on the exact moment that the veterinary experts visited the farm. That would create a difference between a farm where the heifers had not calved and a farm where they had calved. That disparity would be impossible to justify.

As to the basis of the top-up, in the end we must make a judgment. There are two elements to the compensation that we will pay. First, there is the full value for the beast itself; and then there is the top-up in respect of the dislocation. We must strike a balance. I believe that we have struck it fairly, but clearly it is a matter on which people have a variety of views. I am persuaded that the balance is a fair one.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): I listened carefully to my right hon. and learned Friend's explanation in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash). Surely the issue of in-calf heifers is just as complicated at one end of the scale as it is at the other. It is just as complicated for inspectors to adjudicate on whether the in-calf heifer is to be included as it is to decide whether the heifer has conceived or not. Does the Minister concede that it is most unusual—unprecedented, in fact—to include in-calf heifers in such an equation?

Mr. Hogg: There is much that is unprecedented in this matter, not least the slaughtering of healthy beasts, but we have done our best to be fair. My hon. Friend might consider this question: why should in-calf heifers not be included in the definition of a productive herd? I have had to consider the argument both ways, and I have concluded that it is fair to include in-calf heifers, for the reasons that I have given.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Hogg: I am going to make a little progress; then I will give way.

Mr. Marlow: It is on that point—

Mr. Hogg: I am going to make a little more progress; then I will give way.

I have been talking about the valuation for individual beasts, but I also mentioned the question of the top-up. Closed herds will receive one and a half times the normal top-up payments, which is intended to reflect the greater difficulties that are likely to be experienced by owners of such herds in obtaining replacement animals, and hence a longer period of disruption.

Mr. Marlow: May I take up the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill), and ask how it is possible to know whether a heifer is in calf or is about to return to service? Must a pregnancy test be carried out, or what?

In the case of pedigree breeding stock of high value, in terms of thousands of pounds, will farmers be compensated to the extent of that value?

Mr. Hogg: A distinction needs to be made between the compensation paid in respect of top-up, and the compensation paid in respect of the individual beast. For top-up there is a ceiling value of £1,000, which means that each animal can attract a payment not exceeding £250. Compensation for the beast itself, however, will be at full value as at the date of valuation, in accordance with the formula that I have already outlined. As for whether or not a heifer is in calf, that will be a matter for determination during the visit to the farm by the veterinary expert, as a result of the consultation that will take place between the farmer and the expert.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hogg: I will make a little more progress; then I will give way to the hon. Gentleman.

We fully appreciate that, despite these measures, the coming months will be difficult for many of the farmers affected by the cull; so we will try to be as sensitive and flexible as possible in the general conduct of that cull. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) asked about that. The operation of the cull will be explained to and discussed with farmers, and veterinary officers will endeavour to keep them fully informed about discussions affecting their businesses.

It is clearly in our interests, and those of the industry as a whole, to complete the cull as rapidly as we can. Our aim is to complete it within six months, but, within that overall aim—

Mrs. Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hogg: I will finish this section of my speech, and then give way to the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy).

Within that overall aim, where it is reasonably possible, we shall try to take farmers' wishes into account when timing the slaughter on individual farms. For example, when a cow is in calf we may discuss with the farmer the possibility of delaying slaughter until it has calved, and the calf can properly be separated from its dam. If a farmer is to lose a large proportion of his herd, we could consider slaughtering in two groups rather than slaughtering all the cattle together.

Mr. Hardy: I may be wrong, but I suspect that the deep anxieties of dairy farmers may be more nearly met by these various arrangements than those of the beef producers, particularly the small ones. The Minister was kind enough to give way and allow me to make a similar point some months ago. Does he not appreciate that the smaller beef producer facing the "upper millstone" of the economic effect of the BSE crisis and the "lower millstone" of the disintensification policy that the Ministry is pursuing could threaten the smaller farmer, and imperil entry into, and maintenance of interest in, farming among such people? That itself would appear to contradict Government policy. Will the Minister re-examine the position of those smaller beef producers, to ensure that they are not ruined by the performances of the past year or so?

Mr. Hogg: I do not share the hon. Gentleman's pessimism. Leaving aside payments made under the 30-months scheme, which have gone a long way towards underpinning the market, we have made available about £265 million in direct support of beef producers. Markets have recovered somewhat over the past few months, although I accept that they are at a lower level than they were before the crisis.

Looking forward, it is clear that there will have to be a change in farming practice. The consumer is expecting a change from the past and I suspect that there is an imbalance between production and consumption that will have to be addressed. As I have said, I do not take the hon. Gentleman's pessimistic view.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Over the holiday period, the Minister with responsibility for Scottish agriculture made an optimistic statement about the prospects for the return of Scottish beef to European markets. He even estimated the percentage of the market that could perhaps be recaptured when that return was allowed. I have been trying to work out the basis for that optimism. Will the Minister give his estimate of the date on which that return might be realised, as the Prime Minister has done? Given the measures that have been put in place, on what date does the Minister expect Scottish beef to return to European markets?

Mr. Hogg: I shall shortly outline the steps that we intend to take with the European Commission to secure a relaxation of the ban. However, our optimism is based on the high quality of Scottish beef, a factor that is acknowledged throughout Europe.

Mrs. Helen Jackson: The Minister says that he expects the cull to be completed in approximately six months. Does he mean that in that time the cull and the disposal process of the slaughtered beasts will be completed, bearing it in mind that so far a mere 3.8 per cent. of those disposed of under the 30-months scheme have been finally incinerated?

Mr. Hogg: By the cull, I mean the slaughter. There are large quantities of beef, particularly as a result of the 30-months scheme, in cold storage and it will take a long time to dispose of that. When I mentioned six months, it was in relation to the slaughter programme and did not relate to the beef in cold storage plants.

I shall now deal with maternal transmission. What we are discussing does not include measures in relation to maternal transmission, if I may use the jargon. I hope that we shall have a clearer view in February or March about whether there is true maternal transmission. When we have that evidence, we will be better able to determine whether it would be right to seek to add to the numbers contemplated under the present arrangements to take account of potential maternal transmission. At this time I am unable to say whether we shall seek to extend the cull to reflect possible maternal transmission. That will depend on our assessment of the scientific evidence that I hope will be available in two or three months.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hogg: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not give way. I should like to make some more progress.

Subject to the House agreeing the statutory instruments, I currently expect the first visits to farms in Great Britain to begin tracing cattle to take place in the next few days. The first visits will be to the natal herds—those in which BSE cattle were born. After that it will be a matter of tracing any animals that have moved from those herds. Our aim is to complete the process of tracing and culling the affected cohorts within six months. That is the matter on which the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mrs. Jackson) sought further clarification. The tracing of animals moved out of these cohorts might take a little longer.

As I have said, I recognise that the cull will create uncertainty and upheaval for many of those farmers affected, and that it represents an interference with their private property. Nevertheless I commend it to the House because, without it, there is no prospect of any lifting of the export ban on United Kingdom beef. I am pleased to see that that point is now generally accepted by farming organisations and by my colleagues in the House, including the Opposition.

By implementing the cull, all five of the preconditions in the Florence agreement will be met and it will allow us to move to the second part of the agreement which sets out the procedures for a relaxation of the ban. We are ready with a proposal for a certified herds scheme to submit to the Commission. I anticipate submitting our proposals early next month. I must tell the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East that it would be presumptuous of me to submit any proposals to the Commission before getting the clearance and approval of the House, which is what I am seeking and which I regard as a necessary precondition to the next step.

Our certified herds scheme would permit exports of meat and meat products from animals whose movements are fully documented and which could be certified as having no association with BSE. Once we have secured agreement on such exports, we shall aim to move on rapidly to other categories, such as animals born after a given date. In other words, we regard certified herds as being the first step in the relaxation of an unjustified ban on British beef and beef products.

Mr. Tom King (Bridgwater): In seeking the approval of the House, will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm the cost of the scheme to the British taxpayer? Am I right in thinking that it is an entirely a United Kingdom cost and does not involve any refund from the Community? On the terms that have been set out, can my right hon. and learned Friend tell me what the Government are putting forward as funds to meet the cost of the scheme?

Mr. Hogg: The net cost is about £120 million. My right hon. Friend is not entirely right to say that there is no co-financing. There is co-financing to about 70 per cent. of market value. That does not take account of all the elements of compensation encompassed within the compensation scheme. My right hon. Friend will have noticed that I talked about 70 per cent. of market value and he will recall what I said about top-up and about the fact that replacement value is one of the benchmarks for calculating compensation. The recovery is based on market value. As I have said, doing the best we can, the net cost will be about £120 million.

Mr. Welsh: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hogg: No, because I have given way to the hon. Gentleman's party already.

On the basis of my comments, I commend the statutory instruments to the House.

11.2 pm

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I believe that all hon. Members would prefer not to have to debate this issue, but here we are. Many of us have to take a serious and sober attitude towards this issue as we represent many livestock farmers.

A farmer in Cornwall wrote to me yesterday saying:

"It is a very dangerous precedent to kill healthy animals on this basis, a thing the United Kingdom has never done."

I believe that that is the view of many hon. Members.

There are only two possible justifications for the action: first, that it will accelerate the eradication of BSE in the British beef herd and, secondly, that it will accelerate the reopening of the worldwide beef export opportunities. It must be on both counts that we test the statements made by the Minister today.

Many hon. Members on both sides of the House will recall the words of the Prime Minister on his return from Florence. He said:

"It is now up to us in this country—the farming and ancillary industries and the Government—to ensure that we meet them. The point is that this timetable is essentially in our hands.—[Official Report, 24 June 1996; Vol. 280, c. 22.]

When the Minister replies, I hope that he will be more specific about the timetable that he sees ahead of us as a result of the action that he is asking the House to take. To justify it, the Government have to believe that this scheme will accelerate both the eradication of BSE and the reopening of the export markets.

Some important questions were left unanswered. First, after Florence, why did Ministers not at least consult the industry so that they could move as quickly as possible as soon as the legislative process had been completed, so that we would not have these last-minute glitches? Six months have been lost during which such consultation could have taken place and uncertainty could have been removed. As it is, livestock farmers have found their business plans totally up in the air because they were not able to plan ahead.

Secondly, will the cull be managed in the same way as the over-30-months scheme? As yet, we have had no answer to that question. On 16 December, when the Minister made a statement on the subject, I asked him whether the accelerated cull would be by competitive tender, enabling the participation of all those slaughterhouses—they are represented by Members on both sides of the House—that have been squeezed out of the over-30-months cull and have lost out disastrously as a result. I was given no answer. When I raised that matter in the debate on the Christmas Adjournment on 18 December, the Leader of the House assured me that he would put that point to the Ministers responsible and get an answer, to ensure that there was no profiteering out of the new programme as there has been with the over-30-months scheme. I have had no answer as yet, nor have I heard one today.

Thirdly, what notice have Ministers taken of the response from the farming organisations to the Government's consultation document? The definitions in paragraph 11 are still incredibly vague, causing widespread concern. There is considerable concern at the apparent mismatch of cohort years with feeding groups. Do we yet know that the scheme is acceptable to the Commission, or are we passing something that is still a pig in a poke as far as acceptability in Brussels is concerned? Representations have been made to the Minister and copied to many other hon. Members from the Scottish National Farmers Union, the Country Landowners Association, the South-West National Farmers Union and individual livestock farmers, all of which have been constructive and positive—not negative in the least, but they still have not had an adequate response in terms of the statutory instruments placed before us today.

On statutory instrument No. 3184, there has already been much discussion on both sides of the House about the definition of a herd. Clearly, the issue of in-calf heifers is incredibly important for closed herds. Since the Minister acknowledges that closed herds will have considerable difficulty in replacing without great cost, and that the dislocation to the management of those herds will make things extremely difficult, surely it must be important to establish what farmers and their representatives think is the best way to define a herd. As hon. Members have said, the new definition is totally unprecedented. There must be an extraordinary reason for including in-calf heifers in the way suggested. The Minister used the phrase "productive animals only". Why can we not stick with that definition? Similarly, in schedule 2, the way in which consequential loss is compensated is still causing considerable concern.

Suckler cow producers also have a major problem. We are receiving representations from all parts of the country. Surely it is essential for Ministers to allow producers to ghost those animals during the period when they are being retained for suckler cow premium. Otherwise, it will cause a major problem for the cash flow of the enterprises concerned.

Similarly, flexibility is being quoted on all sides. The Minister says that he intends to be flexible, but there is nothing very flexible about the provisions of the two statutory instruments. It is difficult to foresee how the provisions can be extended to ensure that there is flexibility to assist farmers who have a particular difficulty.

We must consider, for example, the question of local milk supply, especially where there are producer-processors and producer-retailers, and most especially where there are speciality milks such as Channel Island or organic milk. There will be a major problem if that is not taken into account in compensation. There must be maximum flexibility in the timing of the way in which cattle are taken to cull.

Flexibility may be the Minister's watchword—I hope that it is—but there is no evidence so far, from our experience of the over-30-months cull or from what we have heard today, that flexibility will in fact be delivered. In its response to the consultation document, the National Farmers Union, summing up the position of most livestock farmers represented by hon. Members of all parties, said:

"The removal of healthy animals off farms will be traumatic. A sensitive approach will be needed throughout in order to secure the cooperation of producers, many of whom will be seeing a lifetime's breeding work disappear. Whilst the national benefits of the scheme are well understood, many producers are participating in the scheme with the utmost reluctance."

We should all recognise that everyone who takes part in the scheme will do so with great reluctance. It is not a scheme in which anyone would want to participate. In those circumstances, the unwilling participants, who are the victims and not the authors of the situation, have every right to expect from the Government—from every Minister and official—the maximum flexibility, sensibility and sensitivity to their needs.

Mr. Paul Marland (West Gloucestershire): As the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) said, this is an extremely disagreeable subject to have to debate, but if we do not debate it, the situation will go on for ever. The only reason for having the debate and for introducing a selective cull is to get the ban lifted. I should like a reassurance that the European Community will accept the method of selection that we use, and that it will not use it as an excuse and say that we should have a different method of selection.

Mr. Marlow: Moving the goalposts.

Mr. Marland: Exactly. We do not want the Community to move the goalposts. We want it to accept our method of selection and consider lifting the ban. There is no doubt that with the passage of time attitudes towards the selective cull have changed, and not only among farmers. The farmers of Gloucestershire—obviously the ones whom I know the best—were against the selective cull to start with, but now they are all in favour.

In the debate that we had in November on BSE, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) gave a cast-iron commitment that he would support a selective cull order of the type that we are debating today. To many of us, it does not come as much of a surprise that on this matter, as on so many others, the hon. Gentleman and the whole of his party have changed their minds. I well remember that when we discussed the export of live animals, the Labour party as a body came out against it; but when Labour was last in office, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East was in favour. The Labour party does one thing when it faces in one direction, but something completely different when it faces in the other.

It is also worth remembering that already more than a million cattle have been slaughtered under the scheme to try to eradicate BSE in this country and that the forecast for the selective cull is about 100,000. The answer to the question whether the Government will cope competently and implement the measures well is that of course they will. The Government can be relied on to learn from and take advantage of past experience, so we shall have a totally worry-free operation as we carry out the cull. If we do not go ahead with the selective cull, the ban on the export of British beef will never be lifted.

I and farmers in Gloucestershire favour the selective cull because it will restore confidence. I do not know about other Members with rural constituencies, but confidence in British beef among the beef eaters of Gloucestershire never went down. The beef sales of an independent butcher in Newent in my constituency, Andy Crease, never fell off. The favourite Sunday lunch in the Forest of Dean is still British beef, as it always was.

I hope that the implementation of the selective cull will restore the confidence of institutions such as schools, too many of which have banned British beef. I hope that McDonald's, the brand leader in the fast food industry, will quickly reintroduce British beef to its restaurants. I salute, as will other Conservative Members, the Meat and Livestock Commission's campaign to rebuild confidence in British beef mince.

We want worldwide sales of British beef to take off again because the markets are still there. Foreigners want to buy our beef. [Interruption.] Yes, foreigners want to buy British beef. I say that again in case there was a misunderstanding and the Labour party changes its mind again and decides to back British beef instead of continually chipping away at it and at the British agriculture industry.

Many months ago, I told the House that I had discovered at Gloucester market that there were outbreaks of BSE in France. Few believed me or my source of information at the market, but it is now widely recognised that BSE is endemic in France, Belgium and Holland. I wonder whether hon. Members know that the Russians and Egyptians have banned the import of beef from southern Ireland because there have been 70 BSE cases there in the past year. If they are going to ban the import of beef from Ireland, what does the European Community propose to do about the export of Irish beef?

Mr. Gill: Is it not terribly unsatisfactory that Russia can ban the importation of beef from five Irish counties but that the same beef can be exported to the United Kingdom, to the detriment of British cattle producers?

Mr. Marland: My hon. Friend has pinched my next point. I understand that the price of British beef has fallen by 5 per cent.—it may be more; he can correct me if I am wrong—as a result of the import of Irish beef.

On the detail of the slaughter, I join other hon. Members in urging my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister that his Department should be as flexible as possible in the execution of the policy so as to minimise the losses of income that farmers will sustain. It should be sensitive to farmers' replacement plans. That is especially important for farmers who are carrying extra in-calf heifers on their farms to replace the stock that will be taken out by the cull.

Compensation should help farmers, not penalise them. I believe that it is wrong to regard in-calf heifers as being involved in establishing the herd. That is a serious departure from normal measurement practice, as only productive cattle are included in Government schemes, legislation and for taxation purposes. Why change that? The inclusion of in-calf heifers penalises farmers who seek to help themselves with replacements, especially as some of them may be carrying extra cattle on their farms.

It would be sensible to reconsider top-up payments, which are not available until at least 10 per cent. of the herd has been slaughtered. With the extra heifers that farmers are carrying on their farms, that could seriously disadvantage the very people whom we are seeking to help. Perhaps the top-up scheme should be on a sliding scale so that it is not cut and dried at 10 per cent. and there is some give in the system.

The setting of a maximum value on the compensation payable for a beast could further disadvantage those valuable pedigree herds, which, as other hon. Members have already said, may have been built up over the lifetime not only of the current owner but of his father. I hope that that matter will be reconsidered.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I do not like to interrupt my hon. Friend, but I think that he may have made a mistake. There are two elements in the compensation—compensation for the individual beast and the top-up. There is neither ceiling nor cap on the compensation for the individual beast—full value will be paid. The cap applies only to the top-up formula.

Mr. Marland: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for putting me right on that because that is a weight off my mind. If I made a mistake, I am quite happy to admit it. We want the farmers to co-operate with the scheme, some of which is voluntary. If we expect them to step forward and volunteer to participate in it, we must make the compensation scheme as fair as we possibly can.

As I said earlier, we want to get the ban lifted. To do that, we must know what the quid pro quo is from the European Union. Other hon. Members have mentioned the Florence agreement. It is true that before today's debate we had instigated five out of the six conditions that were laid down at Florence in order to get the ban lifted. As a result of today's measures, we shall instigate six out of six.

For a long time many of us have thought that the EU has had its own agenda: to inflict pain on UK farmers while letting others walk away without persuading them to take any steps to put the problem right. I have already cited the example of southern Ireland. I very much hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will take steps to ensure that there is no more duplicitous behaviour within the EU, and that the ban is lifted as soon as possible.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn): There is considerable interest in the debate because, although one understands that there is a political rather than a scientific imperative behind the need for the statutory instruments, it is generally accepted by hon. Members on both sides of the House that the accelerated cull, regrettable though it is, must go ahead. That is why I believe that the House will not divide on the measures.

I shall briefly address the issues that are of most concern to the farming industry because I know that a number of colleagues wish to speak. The Minister will be aware of the considerable disquiet that has been expressed by many hon. Members about the definition of the herd. It is proposed to define it as including the replacement heifers in calf. That is contrary to accepted practice in all countries of the United Kingdom. Farmers believe that that has been done to reduce eligibility for the top-up payments. In view of the representations made tonight, I ask the Minister to reconsider the matter.

The industry has obviously welcomed the fact that the Government have accepted the case for replacement value to be the basis of compensation for the cattle. After all, we are dealing with some of the most productive of the dairy cows in our herds, and they will be slaughtered when they are at their most productive capacity. Considerable disappointment has been expressed, however, at the fact that that compensation has been limited to 90 per cent. of their replacement value. I am sure that the Minister will have noted all the representations on that.

The way in which dislocation costs are calculated is also a matter of concern. I am anxious particularly about small dairy farmers—they may lose only one or two cows, but that may not represent 10 per cent. of their herds. In those circumstances, will the Minister consider whether an element of flexibility should be included in the system because, proportionately, the small producer will lose substantially more than the larger producer in terms of their herds' productive capacity?

It is important that compensation is paid promptly, particularly for productive cattle, which must be replaced quickly. Many farmers had to wait a considerable time before they received their compensation under the over-30-months scheme, which had a considerable impact on their cash flow problems. Will the Minister give an assurance that the compensation payments under this scheme will be paid promptly, so that farmers can ensure that they have the money in their bank early enough to pay for the replacement of their stock? Will he also ensure that the farmers are made fully aware at an early stage of when the payments will be made?

My final point relates to the raising of the beef ban. As the Minister is aware, many of us have been persuaded of the necessity of the accelerated cull because of the prospect of the ban being lifted as a result. I understand what the Minister has been saying tonight and his reluctance to give us a firm date for raising the ban, but the industry is waiting for his views and the Government's views on that subject. He will understand that it is because of that prospect that farmers support the regulations on accelerated culling. In his winding-up speech, or in some other form, will the Minister make it clear that the lifting of the ban forms the basis of the statutory instruments?

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I am grateful for the chance to contribute briefly to the debate.

I do not believe that the dispute at the heart of the measures necessarily extends across the Floor of the House. All of us who represent farming constituencies know only too well the unprecedented damage and turmoil that the beef industry has suffered over the past 10 months. Our dispute is with our European partners and, to a degree, with the European Commission.

I do not see myself as one of the most extreme Euro-sceptic Conservative Members. I have always tried to be measured in the comments that I make about Europe. The debate is the best opportunity that we have had for a long time to put on the record the fact that the farmers, the beef producers, of the United Kingdom—it is commendable that so many of our colleagues from Northern Ireland are present, and I shall be brief because I am sure that some of them want to contribute—have made great sacrifices over the BSE problem in the past 10 months, or even eight or nine years. It is high time that the rest of Europe recognised the sacrifice that has been made.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): And America.

Mr. Greenway: And America—the hon. Lady is right.

When the cull that we are debating tonight is completed, it will mean that 1.2 million animals will have been slaughtered. I cannot claim that there is a shred of scientific support for the slaughter of any one of them. They have all been slaughtered for political reasons because the European Union decided, in its infinite stupidity, to impose a ban on British beef as a result of the statements made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

The European Union made a gross misjudgment. It judged that, because BSE might be seen as a problem confined to Britain, if British beef were banned, it would reassure consumers throughout the rest of continental Europe. Of course, the ban had the opposite effect. Every housewife or consumer, not just in Europe, but throughout the world, has concluded that if—it is still a big if—there is the prospect of humans contracting a brain disease as a result of eating beef, they should not buy it. All cases of Creuztfeldt-Jakob brain disease throughout the world cannot have occurred as a result of British beef. I do not believe that the link has been proved. The decision to ban British beef reinforced in the minds of consumers throughout Europe the idea that all beef may be harmful. For that reason, beef consumption throughout Europe has slumped. It is to the credit of our meat industry, our farmers and our consumers that consumption of beef in Britain has not fallen to the levels seen in other countries. That, combined with the massive financial support that the Government have given to the industry, means that we still have a beef industry for the future.

The European issue is exacerbated by an outrageously hypocritical draft report that was recently published by the European Parliament—the so-called Ortega report—and we need to examine carefully two issues relating to that. We understand that the report has been highly critical of the British Government's response to the BSE crisis and that there is also some criticism of the European Commission. In fairness to the Government—I remember many of the debates we had in the late 1980s, when I was first elected to Parliament—I must point out that they have been working one step at a time. Facts were not known and scientific advice emerged generally. We are now much clearer on what needs to be done to ensure that the beef on consumers' plates is safe.

With the benefit of all that hindsight, however, what has the European Parliament recommended should be done to protect consumers throughout mainland Europe? Precisely nothing—none of the measures that we have implemented to ensure that our beef is the safest in the world has been recommended by the Parliament for implementation in the rest of Europe. We are well on the way, not only to eradicating BSE from British herd, but to ensuring that, once eradicated, BSE does not return and that British beef on consumers' plates is the safest in the world, but I am gravely concerned about whether we can say the same about the rest of Europe.

It is acceptable to suggest that the incidence of BSE in Europe is not as high as it is in Britain, but I cannot understand why the rest of Europe continues to turn its back on the prudent measures that we have introduced in respect of specified bovine offals, meat and bonemeal. I am worried that, because of that, we shall see more evidence of BSE on the continent and that the worst of all worlds could befall our farmers—that we have the cull in order to get the European ban and the worldwide ban lifted, but that in two, three or four year's time, other countries will impose a ban on European beef because of the increase of the incidence of BSE in other member states.

I hope that I am wrong, but I want my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister to take a message to the European Councils dealing with this matter: that we are prepared to ask our farmers to continue to make this sacrifice, but that we expect the other member states to deliver the goods—not only to lift the ban, but to implement the necessary measures throughout Europe. It is no good saying that Britain will be free of BSE unless we can say that Europe is free of BSE.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. In the 20 minutes available for the remainder of the debate, four hon. Members hope to catch my eye. I hope that they will all be successful.

Mr. William Ross (East Londonderry): In the light of what you have said, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall be as brief as is humanly possible.

The hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) drew attention to the turmoil in the beef industry and on farms during the past year or so. We in this House would be remiss if we forgot all the other people who have lost their jobs or whose businesses have gone to the wall. We must not forget the tremendous misery that this whole affair has caused to the ordinary men and women who depended on a week's wages from the beef industry in one form or another. While I have every sympathy with the farmers, we should also remember the misery that has been suffered by others.

The statutory instruments deal with Great Britain, but the Minister will know that the corresponding orders affecting Northern Ireland passed into law about two weeks ago, even though they were laid on the same day, 18 December. I am curious to know why the orders for the whole of the United Kingdom were not dealt with on one day. Perhaps that has to do with our different legislation; but this is a UK-wide problem, so we should make every effort to deal with it uniformly.

Every farmer in the country will welcome this further step towards clearing up the BSE crisis in the UK, and will hope that the certified herds scheme will be acceptable to Europe. I trust that we will rapidly be able to clear up the remaining stock that may have come in contact with BSE. I am, however, still worried about the suckler herds. What protection will be offered to producers' claims for suckler cow premiums, for example? If those herds are decimated, the farmers concerned could lose out. Furthermore, could such producers be exempt from the quota usage rules for long enough to enable them to get back into full production? That may apply more to closed than to general herds, but the problem needs attention.

Has the problem of flagged holdings, as opposed to flagged animals, as yet been resolved? The matter urgently needs sorting out, but I am not sure that much progress has been made so far.

The Minister will understand that farmers' losses will be compounded by the changes in the green pound. I am told that another change in its value could be here in 50 days' time; it will cause more mayhem and another fall in the price of beef. If the price fell correspondingly in the butchers' shops and supermarkets, we might not mind so much.

Farmers are concerned when they hear advice to the effect that they must finish their animals a bit earlier. The plain truth is that Northern Ireland has long been engaged, with Government encouragement at every level, in producing large, heavy animals for the continental market. Any man who has ever reared cattle knows perfectly well that cattle first grow their bony frames and then put on the beef after that. It is impossible to finish a large-framed beast before it reaches a certain maturity. It is therefore ridiculous to believe that an animal bred to finish at 450 kg can be finished at 350 kg—it is nonsensical, but intervention weights keep dropping, and I should like to know what the Minister intends to do about that, to relieve the producers.

Sir Jim Spicer (West Dorset): My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister and his team will know only too well that, over the past year, it has been Dorset in particular and the west country in general that have been hardest hit by BSE. I wonder whether, six months ago, the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) would have liked to have been a Minister telling the farmers in north Cornwall or Dorset, "We have this enormous backlog of animals to deal with under the 30-months scheme, but of course I want to talk to you today about the continuing problem we will face once that is done."

In the past two debates in the House, I have quoted my county chairman, John Hoskin, who has been hit harder than almost anyone. Had the hon. Member for North Cornwall tried to approach John Hoskin not just in May, June or July but in August, September or October with such a farcical suggestion, I know exactly what the response would have been, and the hon. Gentleman would have caught the next train back to North Cornwall and probably moved on beyond there as well.

Over the past six months, my right hon. Friends have dealt with the most massive task that we have ever had. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made one point clear: this is the greatest crisis that we have faced since the last war, and we have dealt with it. People may criticise, but no one else could have done more than we have to deal with more than a million cattle in the time that we have done it. Let there be no more hypocrisy from the Opposition on that point.

We have lived up to our side of the bargain, and we are now doing what we ultimately promised, at the behest of the National Farmers Union and the Country Landowners Association. They have all reluctantly come to accept that we must go that little extra mile. We are going that little extra mile; we shall complete our part of the Florence deal, and the ball will then be firmly in the court of our European partners.

There remains a big question. There was a time when I had stars in my eyes about the European Community and thought that, if it said that it would do something, it would do it. I am not so sure now. The ball is, however, in its court and, if it does not live up to the undertakings that it has given, we must face up to the fact that we must go it alone. We must make our own dispositions, not just for one or two years but up to 2001 and beyond.

When we debated the matter on 15 May with the hon. Member for North Cornwall and others, I said that, within those dispositions, if our European partners did not lift the ban, we would have to consider taking action against them and say that, unless the beef that they produced was up to the standard and quality of ours and had the same safeguards, we would have to think about banning their beef and building up a fortress Britain in terms of beef. That is the last thing that we want, but the ball is in their court and they must play their part.

By 2001, BSE will be eradicated in this country, but will it be eradicated in Europe? As my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) said, we doubt that very much, so we must ensure that we have access to those world markets.

I thank my right hon. and Learned Friend the Minister and all those who played their part in bringing us to this point where we can do our final part. If the others do not live up to their side of the bargain, I simply say, "Let it be on their heads, not on ours."

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): In two short sentences, I should like to remind the House of the great calamity that BSE has been to the Northern Ireland farming community. Of a population of 1.5 million, 60,000 people representing 8 per cent. of the work force are engaged in the farming industry. Two thirds of the farms in Northern Ireland, small as they usually are, are involved in rearing cattle, and they produce a disproportionately high 12 per cent. of the entire UK herd. That is the enormity of the problem facing the Northern Ireland base industry—agriculture—which consists mainly of cattle rearing.

Those in the farming community generally welcomed the proposals for the selective cull and they want it implemented as quickly as possible so that they can re-enter the European market. Northern Ireland exports 75 per cent. of its meat, and 50 per cent. outside the United Kingdom.

I want to raise with the Minister one or two quick points for consideration, as they are causing concern to farmers in Northern Ireland. Although the farming industry in Northern Ireland accepts the reasoning behind the voluntary nature of the slaughter of the 1989-90 cohorts, and the fact that there is a problem given the traceability in Great Britain, nevertheless that traceability is total in Northern Ireland. Could not the slaughter of those 1989-90 cohorts be made compulsory in Northern Ireland? It could be carried out quickly and efficiently, thereby completing the five requirements of the Florence convention.

The other matter that farmers want the Government to address is the proposed method of counting herd size, which will be used to calculate the compensation top-up payments for the cull. We know that it differs from the method that is already in operation for the temporary reallocation of additional milk quota. The method used for calculating herd size for the temporary milk quota allocation should be used for the purpose of the cull as well.

The Ulster farmer is concerned that top-up payment is triggered only when the producer loses 10 per cent. of the herd. The Minister spoke about flexibility. It would be beneficial to the very small farmers, of whom Northern Ireland has a considerable number, if there was a tapering scale from 1 per cent. to 9 per cent. The flexibility offered by such a sliding scale would bring adequate and proportionate benefit to the very small farmer.

The certified herds scheme should recognise the part played by the selective cull as a step towards certification. To ensure that the scheme is of practical benefit, the farming community offers four proposals for consideration. First, as has been said, the flagging of herds should be introduced, instead of the flagging of farms. The flagging of herds occurs throughout Europe. The UK is the only country where farms are flagged. I understand that that is the result of an administrative slip-up at an earlier stage. It could be corrected virtually by the stroke of a pen, if that is done now.

Secondly, the certification of animals should replace the certification of herds. Thirdly, all animals born after 1 August 1996 should be eligible for the scheme, irrespective of the BSE status of the holding from which they originated. Fourthly, BSE-affected herds should be accepted into the certified herds scheme once they have completed an agreed restriction period of no more than six years.

In view of the time restrictions, I am grateful for the opportunity to make those points. I ask the Minister to consider them in the light of the flexibility that he said would be adopted. In recognition of the enormous problem that we have in Northern Ireland, where the industry is such a fundamental part of our economy, I ask him to address the issues sympathetically.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim): I shall not repeat the matters raised by my two colleagues. They have underscored what is in the mind of the farming community in Northern Ireland. As a Member of the European Parliament, let me tell the House that there is no promise from Europe that, if we do what we are doing tonight, we will receive a firm assurance that the ban will be raised.

The damnable report due next month will raise the matter to new heights. It has been purposely planned so to do by the political managers in Europe. There will be an attack on British beef and wild accusations which will reverberate throughout Europe and build an almost impassable wall.

I regret that my proposal in a previous debate was not adopted. Because Northern Ireland has the traceability scheme, we should have proposed that as a pilot scheme, carried out the cull according to the Florence terms in that part of the UK and awaited Europe's reaction. If Europe had said no, the Government would have known that their actions tonight would not evoke the response necessary.

Baroness Denton, the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland with responsibility for agriculture and the economy, announced recently that Northern Ireland had weathered the BSE storm. It has done nothing of the sort. A review of the economy, which will be released this week, states that not only the farmers but the food processors, road hauliers, feed merchants and renderers of Northern Ireland will go under. We are facing the biggest crisis since world war two. If we do not find a way out, the agricultural sector—the basis of the entire Northern Ireland economy—will go under. I must be a prophet of doom tonight—I cannot be anything else—because we would be foolish to believe that, by taking this action tonight, we shall see the ban lifted in Europe. That will not happen.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): Having listened to the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), I am tempted to say that I agree with all that he said and to add nothing further. However, I must take this opportunity to proclaim my faith in British beef and in the British farming industry, particularly in so far as it affects my constituents.

I ask my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister to consider the question of compensation. I appreciate the fact that a huge amount of money has been spent supporting the beef and dairy industries in the past nine or 10 months, but will he ensure that payment is made under the scheme as speedily as possible? As other hon. Members have said, there is nothing worse than having to wait for one's money—especially in circumstances such as this.

I also draw my right hon. and learned Friend's attention to the question of economic loss. I acknowledge that there will be almost 100 per cent. compensation for individual beasts, but I am concerned about the potential for tremendous economic loss with the top-up regime. For example, if 40 per cent. of a herd is culled, it will be almost impossible to return that herd to an economic basis—not least because the milking cows introduced into the herd will take some time to come on full stream and milk at the same rate as the cows they replaced. I urge my right hon. and learned Friend to bear that factor in mind.

I also ask my right hon. and learned Friend to keep an eye on the nature of replacement beasts, especially if they come from abroad. We must be assured that the beasts that are introduced into the United Kingdom pass our stringent tests for quality. Can we be sure that they will not have been fed meat or bonemeal, which would cause a new schedule of disasters that we would face at our peril?

I hope that the brevity of my few short points will commend them to my right hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): I preface my remarks with a tribute to the patience and tolerance displayed by the meat and livestock industry during the past 10 very difficult months. Those in the industry on either side of the farm gate—both those who have been compensated and those who have not—have adopted a most responsible view in a joint endeavour to see British beef once again assume the position that it rightfully deserves as the best in the world.

In July, I sponsored early-day motion 1180 which said, among other things, that there was no guarantee when the beef export ban would be lifted. I believe that those comments are equally true today. We are debating the issue tonight, not for scientific reasons or because of human or animal health considerations, but because of purely political considerations. Right hon. and hon. Members have already referred to that fact.

What I regret more than anything else in this whole sad business is that our Government, who up until 27 March last year steadfastly said that every action they took in respect of beef and the safety of food in the British Isles would be based on scientific evidence, have been driven because of force majeure from that position to the point where today our every consideration, our every resolution, is dictated by the politics resulting from the fact that we are now subject to the vagaries of the European dimension. That is a matter of very great regret.

We will have needlessly slaughtered more than 1 million cattle to comply with this political imperative, in just the same way that, as I speak, fishermen at sea are dumping back into the sea thousands of fish that are perfectly saleable and could provide meals for housewives and their families; in the same way that, because of the failure of politicians to make the right decisions, 3,750,000 head of poultry have been killed to comply with the zoonoses orders when so many of us well know that the answer to that problem was to convince the British housewife, the cooks and the chefs in kitchens to cook their eggs and poultry correctly.

For how long can the animal kingdom tolerate this abuse, brought about by the failure of politicians to discharge their responsibilities properly and adequately rather than to blame the fowl of the air, the beast of the field and the fish in the sea for their own inadequacies?

Because of what we are doing tonight, which is serious and to a greater or lesser extent immoral, we must put the European Union on notice that, unless what we are doing tonight results in the ban being lifted, we can no longer tolerate this imposition.

Finally, I say one thing specifically to my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister. The inclusion of in-calf heifers in herds is unprecedented. It is without justification, and I do not think that the House has been convinced tonight by his explanation. I just hope that he will find some way in which to amend the statutory instrument to ensure that in-calf heifers are not included in the herds for compensation purposes.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I am conscious that the debate concludes in five minutes, so I hope that the House will forgive me if I answer many of the points briefly—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hogg: I should have said, "With the permission of the House". I am so sorry.

I entirely agree with the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Sir J. Spicer). It was very important to complete the removal of the backlog under the over-30-months scheme before we embarked on the selective cull.

My hon. Friends the Members for West Dorset, for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) and for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) asked whether there was a timetable for relaxing the ban. There is not. We will proceed as fast as we can, in stages, but I do not conceal from the House that this will be a difficult task and will take time. I do not wish to mislead anybody on that point.

Mr. Welsh: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hogg: No, I have only three minutes.

Various important points were made about the suckler cow premium, for example, by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang). I am aware of the point, which relates to the culling of cattle during the retention period. We take the view that the culling of cattle during that period is covered by the force majeure principle. We have already approached the Commission on that point. We have not had a concluded answer yet, but our arguments are strong, and I hope that we shall get a sympathetic response.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Gloucestershire (Mr. Marland), and others, asked whether the Commission was happy with the eradication plan as is. The House will remember that the plan as it was submitted at the time of the Florence agreement, was approved by the Standing Veterinary Committee and received the endorsement of the Commission. That does not mean that we will not face suggestions that we should extend the scheme to a cull based on maternal transmission in certain circumstances that I outlined to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East.

There will be tendering for the period after 1 April. The hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones) and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) talked about prompt payments. Payments should be made within 21 days of slaughter or registration, whichever is the later. In reality, that will be 21 days from slaughter, and that is extremely important.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale talked about the temporary committee of inquiry. There is only a draft at this stage. Lord Plumb said properly that it is based on prejudice, not on evidence. I take the view that Ministers who are accountable to the House should not be summoned by the European Parliament simply because it is seeking to exercise a supervisory role over nation states. I regret that the Liberal Democrats appear to take a different view.

The hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross) raised an important point about the green pound and revaluation. The hon. Gentleman knows that there have been many devaluations over the past few years. He knows also that as regards 60 per cent. of the direct payments there is a freezing at current rates, which is worth about £200 million.

We have been criticised for not listening to the farmers. I do not believe that that is true. We adopted replacement value as a consequence of what was said to us. The second consultation paper on cohorts reflected the points made to us by the farming industry, as did our proposals on consequential loss.

My hon. Friends the Members for Ryedale and for West Gloucestershire made an important point about the absence of a specified bovine material regime in Europe, and they were entirely right to do so. The absence of such a regime is lamentable. The matter was considered at the December Council and Agriculture Ministers decided not to accept the Commission's recommendation. I regard that as a serious omission.

I take no pleasure in the statutory instrument, for all the points and reasons that have been advanced by other hon. Members. If we do not agree to it, however, there is no prospect of securing any relaxation of the ban. On that basis, I commend it to the House.

Question put and negatived.

SCOTTISH GRAND COMMITTEE

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 94H (Scottish Grand Committee (sittings)),

That the Order of the House [6th November] shall be amended in paragraph (6), by leaving out the word 'Scotland' and inserting the words 'the Town Hall, Montrose'.—[Mr. McLoughlin.]

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 102 (European Standing Committees),

Draft Budget for 1997

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 9372/96, the draft general budget of the European Communities for 1997, SEC(96)1677, the Letter of Amendment No. 1 to the preliminary draft budget of the European Communities for 1997, PE252.724, the European Parliament's resolution on amendments and proposed modifications to the draft general budget of the European Communities for 1997, 11689/96 and 11690/96 on the Council's Decisions on the European Parliament's proposed amendments and modifications to the draft general budget of the European Communities for 1997, and the unnumbered explanatory Memorandum submitted by HM Treasury on 15th November relating to the Letter of Amendment No. 2 to the draft general budget of the European Communities for 1997; and supports the Government's efforts to maintain budget discipline in the Community.—[Mr. McLoughlin.]

Question agreed to.

Pinderfields Hospital

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. McLoughlin.]

12.2 am

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): I am grateful for the opportunity to talk about what I term my local hospital. Pinderfields hospital, which is located in my constituency, is an acute services general hospital, offering good and much needed services to the people of Wakefield. The hospital has wards in permanent buildings and temporary buildings. The temporary buildings were erected in the early 1940s to provide medical treatment for wounded personnel in the forces during the second world war.

On at least three occasions, programmes have been launched to replace the old outdated wards with new, modern wards with modern facilities. In the past 17 years, the Government have made a number of promises to build new premises. The most recent promise, of 1995-96, was made under the private finance initiative proposals. The publicity and hype about those proposals have now faded, due to the Government's policy on hospital mergers. I want to make it clear to the Minister that we do not need a merger, and that we want to develop our own Pinderfields hospital.

People who rely on Pinderfields for medical services keep asking when the new buildings will be ready. Perhaps I could extract a response from the Minister on that issue. The conditions under which nurses and staff work, and the premises in which patients receive treatment, would not be tolerated by many hon. Members, who would demand changes and improvements.

The hospital has recently been under tremendous pressure because of the number of referrals from general practitioners and the number of admissions through the accident and emergency unit. The local newspaper, the Wakefield Express, is a creditable newspaper with a creditable reporter. On 10 January, its headline read: "Hospital on brink of crisis". That referred to Pinderfields hospital. Health officials admitted that, had there been a major accident or incident in December or January, the hospital would have had to close its doors to all but the most urgent cases. Due to the dedication and sterling work of the staff at the hospital, it remained open and continued its good work.

Wakefield area health authority provided funding for extra beds to cope with the high demand. It opened a short-stay surgical ward at the nearby Clayton hospital to help to minimise the impact on waiting lists. That was sound judgment by the health authority.

My concern is heightened by the fact that the Wakefield area health authority is facing an overspend in its budget of about £5 million in the current year. It also has an over-commitment of almost £6 million on the expected budget allocation for 1997-98. The hospital is facing a financial crisis, and the stress on the staff due to the extra admissions and the heavy work load is exacerbated by the overspend on the budget and the cuts required to keep within budget. The staff are conscious of the fact that further economies must be made to keep within the budget provision.

There is no evidence of unjust spending. The hospital works within the Government's guidelines, and there are no surpluses. The problem is with the formula for the allocation of resources, as set by the Department of Health. Pinderfields hospitals faces a deficit of £3 million in the current year, with a further debt of £3 million for the fixed costs of the transfer of neurosurgery from Pinderfields to Leeds later this year. Will the Minister explain how such a crazy situation arose? Pinderfields had a first-class neurosurgery unit, which provided a first-class service. It was a regional unit stationed at Pinderfields, but it was stolen from us and located in Leeds.

Why should we have to pay £3 million fixed costs? That will push the hospital budget further into deficit. Why should the purchasers of services from Pinderfields hospital pay the costs of the neurosurgery unit that no longer exists?

All the health agencies in Wakefield, including Wakefield and area health authority and the three trusts, are concerned about the funding formula applied by the Department of Health for health care in Wakefield. I readily accept that there is no perfect formula for allocating resources, but there are fairer formulae than the one that currently applies there. How, for instance, did the Minister arrive at his decision that the population in our area was falling, which was one of the reasons for reducing our resources? I do not consider that to be true.

Why are we penalised for being a low-paid, low-income area? That is how the formula applies in Wakefield and we are being told that, in some areas where incomes are higher, we do not need as much. Why should the fact that only 1.75 per cent. of our population consists of ethnic communities influence the allocation of resources?

Does the Minister take into account the elderly population who suffer from respiratory diseases? A mining community such as ours contains chronically sick people, and a significant number of children and adults are troubled by asthma. The Wakefield and Pontefract asthma group is committed to addressing the apparent gap in provision between hospital and community, and to developing closer collaboration between primary and secondary care.

Does not such suffering influence the Minister's decision on a formula for the allocation of resources? We need money to ensure that our hospitals have a respiratory consultant. Research shows that the recording of information with such a consultant is far more accurate and revealing than it is with a non-respiratory consultant.

Earlier, I referred to the transfer from Pinderfields of the neurosurgery unit, which used to generate an income of around £3 million a year, which helped to provide services at the hospital. I consider the loss of that £3 million a betrayal of Pinderfields and of my constituents.

Wakefield community health council raised the loss of revenue with the regional health authority, which promised that £1 million would be given in assistance, that a "regional centre of excellence" would be provided at Pinderfields and that an MIRI machine—which is a kind of scanner—would also be provided. None of those promises has been fulfilled. Mr. Ron Beneford, chairman of Wakefield community health council, agrees with me that all at Pinderfields hospital feel betrayed by the regional and national health authorities.

Will the Minister give me an assurance that the promises made to the community health council will be fulfilled? If we cannot rely on promises made in good faith, how can we trust the people who made those promises and reneged on them—or the people in authority—in the future? The funding of health care and the formula for allocating resources are fundamental to Pinderfields hospital.

As I have said, there is a massive acute services deficit in the Wakefield area, yet it is reported that GP fundholders in the district have underspent by £7.6 million over the past three years. Why is primary health care in surplus, while secondary and acute health care are in crisis? The malaise is caused by crazy accounting.

Pinderfields hospital provides intensive care and high-dependency units, but additional demand could leave the hospital in difficulty. Last year, Wakefield health authority considered the provision of intensive care and high-dependency units at Pinderfields, and there was some investment in additional units. That investment had a serious impact on the health authority's budget. Will the Minister assist Wakefield health authority to cover the cost of the extra intensive care units that had to be provided?

I have spoken about promises. When the maternity hospital at Manygates in Wakefield was closed, a new maternity unit at Pinderfields was promised, but the promise was not fulfilled, and we again feel betrayed by the Government. My constituents use Pinderfields hospital and the staff there would like to be able to see to the needs of patients. One of my constituents who suffers from multiple sclerosis needs Interferon treatment. Pinderfields would like to treat that constituent with Interferon, but cannot do so because of the cost. My constituent tells me that patients in the south of England can get treatment without difficulty. That is another example of the north-south divide.

The treatment that the hospital can afford to give my constituent makes her feel worse, and she complains about the deterioration in her health because of what I have described. I have written to the Secretary of State for Health on this matter and received a response, but the issue has not been resolved.

Pinderfields hospital contains the Yorkshire regional spinal injuries unit and the famous burns unit. Because the neurosurgery unit is being stolen and taken to Leeds, there are fears that, if Pinderfields and Pontefract hospitals are merged, we could lose two prestigious units and finish up with two cottage hospitals. That is another reason for objections to the proposed merger.

I have made the case for Pinderfields hospital to be given special consideration by the Minister. I seek fairness and justice, and that is not unreasonable.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Horam): I am glad to have the opportunity to respond to the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) and to congratulate him on securing time to debate a subject that is linked to health services in Wakefield—Pinderfields hospital. This is the fifth time since January 1995 that we have had an opportunity to debate health services in Wakefield. Opposition Members certainly deserve full marks for persistence. I acknowledge that you also have an interest in this area, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I, too, have an interest, because, as the hon. Gentleman will be aware, I went to school in Wakefield. I have known Pinderfields over many years, particularly when I was a teenager.

I have listened to the hon Member's concerns and the case that he has outlined against the proposed merger of the trusts at Pinderfields and in Pontefract. I am aware of the strong local feelings on the proposal. However, as I said in the Adjournment debate in November on the proposed merger of the two trusts, it seems that some hon. Members might be trying to link two separate issues—the management of the acute trusts at Pontefract and Pinderfields, and the delivery of services.

The consultation, which, as the hon. Gentleman knows, ended last week, was on a proposal to merge two trusts, not on a proposal to change the health services in the Wakefield area.

The proposal that is under discussion in Wakefield, and in Pontefract, is a proposal to merge two trusts—or, to be more exact, to dissolve two trusts and create one new one. It is a proposal to change the management structure of NHS trusts in Wakefield, and it is not a proposal to change the services.

The responses to consultation on the merger proposal are now being considered by the NHS executive. It is likely to be referred to Ministers for consideration shortly. I must and will keep an open mind until the appropriate time. As I have said, I am aware of the strong local opposition to the proposal, including from local hon. Members and from the local community health councils. On the other hand, I am told that there is strong clinical support for a merger from local consultants and from general practitioners.

As I said in November, Wakefield health authority has announced that it will look again at its health strategy, and will hold a separate public consultation on that later this year.

The Secretary of State for Health is required to consult on proposals to establish new health trusts. There has now been a long consultation, lasting from July 1996 until the middle of this month, on the proposed merger of Pinderfields and Pontefract trusts. As soon as it was realised that more was needed to be done to fulfil the statutory requirements, Wakefield health authority was asked to consult on behalf of Secretary of State, and the consultation period was extended. That has meant that consultation has taken longer than might have otherwise been the case.

However, the extra consultation period will certainly not be wasted. All the views expressed during both periods of consultation have been passed to the NHS executive, and will ultimately be seen by Ministers. The extension has allowed local people almost double the usual time to express their views. There can be no doubt that the consultation period has been thorough.

Many factors need to be taken into account when considering a proposal such as this. We will carefully consider the adequacy of the consultation process and the views of local people, including those who took the time to sign a petition organised by Normanton town council and presented by the hon. Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Trickett) recently. We will also look at the likely impact on effectiveness, efficiency, and accessibility of the potential creation of a new trust. Any potential economies of scale will have to be balanced against any possible loss of patient choice.

I can assure hon. Members that this is most certainly not a fait accompli. We had a statutory responsibility to consult publicly, and we will weigh the results both fairly and carefully. We will look closely at the interests and the health of the people of the Wakefield health authority area.

The hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) have previously expressed concern about the results of past consultations. I understand their feelings on this subject. In particular, they have cited the investment in rehabilitation which the former Yorkshire regional health authority had planned to place in Wakefield, following agreement that neurosurgery should be concentrated in Leeds. There were good reasons for concentrating neurosurgery in Leeds, but I understand the way in which the hon. Member for Normanton expressed his feelings this evening.

We cannot turn the clock back to 1994, because the regional health authority was abolished in March of that year, almost three years ago. We live in a changing world, but it is also a fact that the NHS executive northern regional office has offered support in the form of research and development support worth around £50,000 for an academic development in rehabilitation medicine. So at least something will come to Wakefield out of that situation, which is now past and gone.

The hon. Gentleman also reported on the winter pressures that he has experienced in the local hospitals in the Wakefield area, particularly in Pinderfields hospital. Although the position is undoubtedly difficult at this time of year—it usually is—the trust is coping and has coped well. Indeed, I hear that some general practitioners have complimented it on its performance.

Some non-urgent elective admissions have had to be cancelled, but the Pinderfields hospitals trust chief executive has emphasised that the percentage is small—about 33 out of around 1,000 planned operations. Hospitals cancel operations occasionally, but they try to keep cancellations to as few as possible because a cancellation is undoubtedly extremely unfortunate for the patient concerned—it is very disappointing indeed. It is only right that emergency and urgent cases should have priority.

As the hon. Gentleman said, the trust has made six new beds available at its Clayton hospital to ease the pressure on Pinderfields. A similar thing has been happening throughout the country. Admissions units have been opened and additional beds made available where possible. I am glad that Pinderfields was able to make that effort to ease the pressure. I am sure that that sort of sensible management move has helped during this winter.

Once the proposal for a merger is decided, we can look at the management arrangements. Meanwhile, Pinderfields hospitals trust has an able acting chairman and an experienced acting chief executive, in a trust that has also recruited 25 new consultants since 1993—a considerable investment in the appropriate skilled health care for the area.

I also recognise that the Pinderfields hospitals trust is facing a complex set of interdependent issues. As I have said before, the ultimate goal is to ensure that sustainable, high-quality and cost-effective clinical services are provided with modern facilities. Although the consultation on the proposed merger and, separately, the configuration of health services will take time, those processes should ensure that whatever solution emerges is based on informed debate among the public and the professions. I am committed to seeing that that happens.

The hon. Gentleman also, very fairly, raised the question of the finances of the health authority, the trust and the GP fundholding practices, which, as he knows, are extensive in the Wakefield area. I must point out that, in November, we announced that an additional £1.6 billion would be available to the health service next year to safeguard and improve patient care.

Hon. Members have criticised the funding for Wakefield, but the health authority is above its weighted capitation target. Despite that, it will receive an integrated revenue cash increase of £5.3 million next year, which is a real-terms increase of £2.3 million, or 1.6 per cent. Surely that is not a cause for complaint. Wakefield has done rather better than the average, despite the fact that it is over its capitation target.

The hon. Gentleman was also concerned about how that capitation target is made up, and was worried that the needs of Wakefield people were not taken into account. I acknowledge his interest in the problems of asthmatics and in the National Asthma Campaign. I was glad to hear about the activities of the Wakefield and Pontefract asthma group. I am sure that that is very relevant. I can well imagine the sort of respiratory diseases that are common in that area.

I assure the hon. Gentleman that the formula, particularly next year, when it has been adjusted to take account of community health needs, including mental health, is more focused on need than it has ever been in its history. If anything, the sort of area in which Wakefield is situated will have gained from the reformulation of the formula for the cash handed out next year.

I also want to stress that the work on the formula is undertaken as a result of the effort and research by York university. It is independent, and considers objectively the population needs of areas such as Wakefield. It is as objective a measure as we can possibly make it. That is the basis on which the Wakefield health authority gets its money.

The hon. Gentleman was also concerned about the trust's finances. Certainly, I would not deny that there have been some problems over the finances—that has been the case for some time—but I am assured that the situation is not deteriorating but is, on the contrary, improving, and that a firm three-year plan is in place to resolve the problems. That will be affected by the merger, but it is none the less in hand to put things on a sound footing. There is no reason to believe that that sensible approach will not be successful.

The hon. Gentleman further expressed concern about the amount of money in the GP fundholding system and asked in effect whether it could in some way be transferred to help with the problems in the acute hospitals. My point about that is that it would essentially destroy the whole point of the GP fundholding system, which is that, where fundholders generate surpluses, they can put them back into improving primary care. They must be allowed to do that.

The health authority may hold those surplus funds for the moment, but they are in effect held in trust on behalf of the GP fundholders who generated them, and it is right that they should go back into primary care. We are, after all, talking about a primary care-led service.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be aware that Wakefield is at the cutting edge of a primary care-led system, because about 82 per cent. of the population are in 33 GP fundholding practices, and it is expected that that proportion will rise to nearly 100 per cent. by April this year. Wakefield is setting a trend in that area, which will be extremely good in the medium and long term for the health of people living there.

I should also point out that Pinderfields has benefited recently from considerable additional investment. For example, an advanced eye surgery unit was opened last year at a cost of £500,000. It is considered one of the best in Europe, and will certainly reduce waiting times for eye surgery.

Mr. William O'Brien: Will the Minister address the point about the historic debt from the transfer of neurosurgery, which will cost the trust about £3 million, when the transfer of the service is not the trust's responsibility?

Mr. Horam: I take the hon. Gentleman's point, but, in the transfer of the neurosurgical unit to Leeds, revenue is lost but so is cost; so that would not necessarily disadvantage Wakefield, considering the net position, balancing revenue and cost. However, the point was new to me, and I shall certainly investigate it and perhaps write to the hon. Gentleman. I am not sure that he is right: the situation is probably more balanced than he thinks.

The burns unit in Pinderfields is famous and, considering it alongside the other facilities that are available, the situation in Wakefield is extremely promising. The combination of primary development, in which Wakefield is well ahead of most other parts of—

Intensive Care

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Ainsworth.]

9.34 am

Mr. George Mudie (Leeds, East): I should like to express my thanks and the thanks of thousands of my constituents to you, Madam Speaker, for allowing this debate to take place. The people of Leeds were shocked and angered by the death of my constituent, Mrs. Edna Harrison, and it is a tribute to your sensitivity to hon. Members' constituency problems that you have so quickly permitted the subject to be debated.

I also wish to pay tribute to my local evening paper. The current Secretary of State for Health, his predecessor, now the Secretary of State for National Heritage, and the Minister here today, the Under–Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam), are aware that, over a substantial period, the Yorkshire Evening Post has kept the issue of bed shortages in the public domain. As the Minister knows, health provision is largely run by political placemen in the health authorities, who do not see it as being their duty to acquaint the public with the details of local health matters. The public are largely kept in the dark about the true state of the service. That intensive care bed shortages are a matter of public knowledge and concern in Leeds is a sign of how consistently the Yorkshire Evening Post has raised the issue and it deserves the thanks of the people of Leeds for performing that service.

The Minister will be aware that Mrs. Edna Harrison collapsed in her back garden on a quiet Sunday morning two weeks ago. The ambulance arrived at her home and she was rushed to her local hospital, less than one mile away from her terraced home in east Leeds. That hospital is the 1,500-bed St. James's hospital, famed as "Jimmy's" in the Yorkshire Television documentary that has run for some years. It is reputed to be one of the largest, if not the largest, teaching hospitals in western Europe. Despite all that, no intensive care bed could be found for Mrs. Harrison and, four hours later, she was admitted to a Hull hospital over 60 miles from Leeds where, sadly, she died later that week.

Mrs. Harrison's husband and family have shown great dignity and have expressed nothing but praise for the medical staff at both hospitals. I spent some time with Mr. Harrison on Saturday, discussing his wife's sad death. He continues to show great dignity, but he and his family want to know why the long journey to Hull was necessary and why Mrs. Harrison could not have been treated in her local hospital, thereby minimising the danger of travel. The Minister will accept—as does the working party report to which I shall refer later and which the Minister mentioned in his statement of 6 March—that, for an intensive care patient, travelling is always dangerous. The danger can be minimised, but it should be avoided where possible.

Mr. Harrison and his family would have wanted the danger of travel minimised and they would have wanted Mrs. Harrison to be where they and their friends could have an opportunity to visit her, albeit sadly for the last time before she died. They and I accept the conventional wisdom in various statements by Ministers and health officials about the high cost of intensive care beds and the need not to leave them lying empty. Mrs. Harrison may just have been unlucky as she needed treatment at a time of peak demand, and perhaps it was inconceivable and even unreasonable to expect such a scarce and expensive bed to be available locally.

Time will tell, and that individual case is not the reason for this debate. It may have been a factor, but I have asked for a local inquiry into Mrs. Harrison's death, and Healthcare, the local authority and the St. James's trust—the hospital involved—are conducting one. I am far from happy with the initial details sent to me by the authority, which seems unnecessarily defensive about the whole matter. A fuller and more objective report will no doubt follow.

After our discussion on Saturday, the family and I intend, unless the report is acceptable, to raise a number of other matters. Those include the sheer inconvenience of a family having to travel 60 miles to see a seriously ill mother; the impracticality of the husband finding himself in Hull with no money and being told that he must find his own accommodation and his own way back; and the sadness and distress of the son driving 60 miles having been told that, when he arrived, his mother would be dead. All that, when that family live almost in the shadow of the biggest teaching hospital in western Europe. Those practical problems were compounded by the shabbiness of the accommodation for families staying on the premises because the patient is expected to die, and the fact that other family members and friends could not join in the grieving process as the death occurred 60 miles away in the middle of the week and it was impossible to get the time to leave work and go there.

The family have rightly raised a number of matters that will be referred to the ombudsman. I am sure that, somehow, we shall have the circumstances surrounding Edna Harrison's death properly examined. I was pleased to see that the Minister, in a public statement, expressed his sorrow about it and his determination to ensure that the facts were thoroughly looked at and any lessons learned.

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Leeds, South): Does my hon. Friend know whether an inquiry was made as to whether a bed was available at Leeds general infirmary, which is only two to three miles from Mrs. Harrison's home? I understand that there is a system whereby the nearest bed can be obtained, and perhaps that was in Hull. It seems incredible, however, that with two such large hospitals within such a short distance of that lady's home, she could be found accommodation in neither. Clearly, the travel problems that my hon. Friend describes would not have been the same had she been able to go to Leeds general infirmary.

Mr. Mudie: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. He is aware that, although I shall primarily discuss east Leeds, for which St. James's is the local hospital, all Leeds Members and, because of the regional significance of both hospitals, all Yorkshire Members, know the pressure that is consistently put on intensive care beds at both LGI and Leeds general hospital.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): I am advised that there are intensive care beds at Dewsbury hospital, but because there is no money to finance their introduction, they are left idle and without function. That should be dealt with also in the Yorkshire region.

Mr. Mudie: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. Both my hon. Friends remind me of a pertinent fact that deserves examination by the Minister: the two beds that were even nearer but were not even considered. They were at Killingbeck hospital, which has been the subject of an Adjournment debate between two hon. Members present today. Killingbeck hospital is due to close next year and it will be terrible if those beds are not brought into operation simply because of that fact. The explanation is that the beds are ring-fenced for cardiac cases, so no one thought to include them on the register or even inquire whether they were empty. A rumour is going round Leeds that they were empty and available, and they are even nearer to Mrs. Harrison's home than St. James's hospital, so that matter deserves investigation. It would be criminal if bureaucratic ring fencing, however good the reasons for it, excluded Mrs. Harrison from prompt treatment at a hospital that was so close to her home.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): I have just come down from my office having done a local radio programme involving Mrs. Harrison's brother-in-law. He wanted to make it absolutely clear that the care that she was offered by doctors and nurses was the best in the circumstances, but that the system was wrong, which is the point that my hon. Friend is making. Has he looked at how beds are managed in the Northern and Yorkshire region, in the light of the Government's abolition of the regional health authority? In the past five years, our region has lost more hospital beds—27 per cent.—than anywhere else. The regional health authority's role in planning care was important for the likes of Mrs. Harrison. I should be interested in my hon. Friend's thoughts on that point.

Mr. Mudie: My hon. Friend makes an important point. The cuts in hospital beds in Yorkshire have been savage. Only last week, my hon. Friend drew the House's attention to an unhappy case and the circumstances surrounding it, at Pinderfields hospital in his constituency. Yorkshire's grave health funding problems and the underlying problem of a lack of intensive care beds become an issue when they culminate in individual cases such as this. Although Mrs. Harrison's death prompted me to raise this matter, the real issue is the fact that the local hospitals' inability to admit her when she desperately needed intensive care treatment was not an isolated incident. Such an incident was predicted, but, as with other events in Leeds, elsewhere in Yorkshire, Warrington and Newcastle, the House was told that it would not happen, as Ministers had listened, learned and taken steps as a result of similar incidents last winter.

I primarily make the case on behalf of my community for an examination of the situation and prompt action in my local hospital. There has been an increase arising from the March statement—one adult intensive care bed and one paediatric intensive care bed—but at the risk of seeming ungracious and ungrateful, I emphasise that we desperately need more. Whatever the situation elsewhere, Yorkshire and the north-west seem to have problems, as explained so well yesterday by my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Hall). When a senior figure in the national health service refuses a Member of Parliament a document on the matter, that must make alarm bells ring throughout the service, if not in the House.

I shall let my colleagues make the case for their areas. Apart from the common problem of growing debts and underfunding, the matter should be judged in the light of local circumstances. I am content for the situation in Leeds to be judged on its merits.

The House may not need reminding of last winter. We in Yorkshire witnessed a number of horrifying incidents, culminating in the death of a young child who had been driven through a snowstorm from Manchester. We witnessed the spectacle of a retired policeman being touted round a dozen hospitals in Yorkshire before being flown 60 miles to Scarborough, where he died before he could be admitted. We heard senior, well-respected consultants in Leeds speak of a crisis.

I want to get across to the Minister a point that the Secretary of State seems not to take on board, especially in respect of Leeds and Yorkshire: throughout the year, the two city hospitals in Leeds regularly—not just seasonally—turn away patients. Yesterday I was at St. James's hospital and saw the book of refusals, in which there was not a blank page. Certainly the situation gets worse in winter, but the two consultants responsible for managing intensive care beds at the two major hospitals in Leeds have consistently said that it is not a seasonal problem. It may be exacerbated seasonally, but it is a regular problem. They made that statement last winter, when once again they had to turn away seriously ill patients because they had no spare intensive care beds.

So serious was the position in Yorkshire and elsewhere that after last winter the Secretary of State was obliged to make a statement in the House in March. Last week, sadly, he refused to do so when similar incidents were being reported this winter. On 6 March he stated:

> "I told the House earlier this year that I would undertake to ensure that we learn the proper lessons from the general pressure on the emergency services this winter. I shall set out to the House this afternoon the steps that I am taking to ensure that that happens."—[Official Report, 6 March 1996; Vol. 273, c. 356.]

In three brief paragraphs, he dealt with the intensive care beds crisis. He relied largely on the report of a professional working group that examined best practice in the use of intensive care, to which I shall return. With his Commons performance on 6 March, the Secretary of State drew a line in the sand. He accepted that there were lessons to be learned from last winter, he outlined his solutions and the inference was clear: this winter, we would not expect a rerun of the unhappy experiences of last winter.

Sadly, we continue to experience problems in Leeds and Yorkshire. I have raised the tragic case of Mrs. Harrison. The week that she died, Dr. Mark Bellamy of St. James's hospital commented:

> "We are sailing extremely close to the wind and sooner or later we are going to come unstuck."

The same week, the following examples occurred: a Leeds patient faced a possible trip to Birmingham or London; Leeds patients were sent to Grimsby, more than 80 miles away; patients were sent from Airedale to Stoke; Bradford patients were sent to Doncaster; and Newcastle patients were sent 100 miles to Edinburgh. In the week that Mrs. Harrison of Leeds died in Hull, a 71-year-old male pensioner was sent from Hull to Leeds for an intensive care bed and died a few days later. Those patients were not sent to a particular centre of excellence because of their specific complaints—they were shipped around because of bed shortages.

A Leeds consultant and British Medical Association representative commented after the death of Mrs. Harrison:

"There are many more incidents which are not reported in the media. The fact that it is going on is very worrying."

A Leeds consultant, Dr. Mark Darowski, was quoted as saying:

"Mr. Dorrell has not learnt the lessons of last winter."

Dr. Andrew Cohen, the St. James's intensive care manager with whom I spent some time yesterday, said:

"Resources are stretched to the absolute limit. The strain has been caused by the increase of illness we always see in winter and the only way we are going to avoid this sort of problem is if there is an increase in intensive care beds. There is a chronic shortage across the region and the country as a whole."

Dr. Andrew Bodenham, intensive care manager at Leeds general infirmary, stated:

"We are just playing musical chairs all the time."

I do not think that he meant to be humorous when speaking about seriously ill people.

It is accepted that last winter there was a shortage of intensive care beds. The Minister took steps in good faith to overcome it, but the signs are that the problems continue. As it is a matter of life and death, the Secretary of State should act urgently. Yesterday, during the health debate, he attacked my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), claiming that all that my hon. Friend did was

"to parade a few individual cases that are supported by incomplete facts, to make a half-researched charge about the Government's record, wave a shroud, repeat the mantra that Labour will abolish the internal market and base metal will be transformed into gold."—[Official Report, 21 January 1997; Vol. 288, c. 755-56.]

I have not waved any shrouds. Without getting angry, I have tried to express the anger felt in Leeds. I have not used political comments. I have used comments from doctors who have the unhappy task of deciding who is to have an intensive care bed and who is to go on the dangerous search for a bed elsewhere.

I hope that the Minister will consider the following points. First, he underestimates the regular demand for intensive care beds in cities such as Leeds. The consultant at St. James's hospital is a sober, responsible, committed person who weekly faces the task of turning away seriously ill people.

I thank the Minister for the two additional beds that were made available after the March statement. However, the ward has 13 beds, but 18 bays. I do not understand why it seems to be impossible for health officials to sit with the consultant responsible for the service, examine the records, determine the true level of demand and make provision accordingly. It seems that Ministry officials would prefer not to ask the question, because they do not want to know the answer. They fear that the reply may not suit them.

I understand the cost implications, but if that is the reason for the failure to ask questions when lives are at stake, that is unacceptable. As part of the discussions arising from the Minister's March statement, Andrew Cohen made a number of requests. Apart from the additional one paediatric and one adult intensive care bed, nothing else has arrived.

The Minister should understand and make allowances for the effect on demand when intensive care beds are located in a hospital with many regional facilities. I am told that my constituents in east Leeds gain from having so many specialties or centres of excellence at St. James's hospital. However, the Minister knows that those specialties make regular demands on intensive care beds. When someone such as Mrs. Harrison collapses, she must compete for a bed with patients who have been moved to intensive care from other departments within the hospital. Dr. Cohen must decide whether to stop an operation or deal with the inevitable emergency that will result from denying new patients intensive care beds. He advocates separating dedicated intensive care beds from general intensive care beds at Leeds general infirmary and St. James's hospital, and that proposal should be considered.

What is happening with the trust and health authority regarding the provision of high-dependency beds? The Minister appreciates the vital role that those bodies play, both physically and financially, in providing a valuable safety net. However, the health authority and the trust have taken no action to increase the number of high-dependency beds at St. James's hospital—in fact, all eight high-dependency beds are dedicated to the other specialties. In March, the Secretary of State and the professional working group said that such beds play a vital part in health strategy. When patients are admitted to hospital, staff usually determine the availability of intensive care beds with a view to moving patients to a high-dependency unit. That is not possible at St. James's hospital and we must ask why.

The Secretary of State requested discussion, consensus and transparency between intensive care beds, high-dependency beds and the other specialties, but nothing has happened. The trust and health authority have used the Government's money to provide only two extra beds. Is the Minister aware of that fact? Is he monitoring the situation? If so, what is he doing about it; and, if not, why not, as it was a vital part of the 6 March statement?

Does the Minister agree that there is something slightly obscene about forcing seriously ill patients to criss-cross the country in search of intensive care beds? I accept that, if patients require specialty treatment that is available only in Birmingham, it is common sense to transfer them to that hospital. However, seriously ill patients should not be expected to criss-cross the country in search of treatment. Surely specified geographical areas, such as west Yorkshire and south Yorkshire, could combine and squeeze out enough money to provide an agreed safety net, so that we do not see ghoulish transfers of seriously ill patients to hospitals 60, 80 or 100 miles away. It is acceptable for my constituents to travel to Bradford, but not to Bridlington.

I am three years older than the health service, so I have not known anything else—in a way, it is responsible for me, although I have worn better than it has. No hon. Members catch my eye when I say that, but like others of my generation, I know about the pre-health service conditions. Mr. Deputy Speaker, you come from a mining community and you will understand what I am about to say. Why do we cherish and love the health service? Why do those who know nothing else protect it instinctively? It is because our dads and grandads have told us what happened before the NHS was established. You will know more about it than I do, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as you have a long history in the mining industry, and mining communities established many health schemes.

We cherish the national health service because, before it existed, doctors would visit their patients at home. They would ask, "Where is the patient and what is wrong?" The next question would be, "Do you have insurance and can you pay?" Millions of people who could not pay invariably did not receive treatment. The health service introduced free treatment at the point of service that was available when needed. That is why we cherish the health service. The NHS should be there for anyone who requires its services—it may be a matter of life and death. Unfortunately, in the past few years, people have complained that—for whatever reason—the health service was not there when they needed it. That is why Mr. Harrison is aggrieved and why I was prompted to seek this Adjournment debate.

Mr. William O'Brien: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. We should remind the Minister that many hospitals in Yorkshire—such as Castleford, Normanton and District hospital and others in Hemsworth and south Kirkby—were built using contributions from miners who had small wages, but who knew the value of health care. I am pleased that my hon. Friend has expressed a sentimental view. It would be wrong not to highlight the fact that those hospitals have closed or are now in private hands. That is the disaster that affects mining communities: hospitals built with miners' contributions can no longer serve the people. I am pleased that my hon. Friend has drawn attention to that important issue.

Mr. Mudie: My hon. Friend makes a good point.

I ask the Minister to consider the quiet points that I have made. I understand that individual cases will always cause concern, but there are too many serious incidents at present and that is totally unacceptable.

10.7 am

Mrs. Bridget Prentice (Lewisham, East): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie) on securing this Adjournment debate and on the way in which he has expressed his feelings about the health service and his constituents. I hope that his comments will be well received by the Minister. My hon. Friend did not engage in tub thumping, but adopted a measured view of what is occurring in the health service. I hope that the Minister will respond in kind.

Hon. Members wish to debate the intensive care beds situation because there is a real crisis in the health service. We do not wish to panic people: this is what our constituents are telling us. It is tragic that we must debate the same subject every winter because the internal market is not working properly. My hon. Friend mentioned the statement made by the Secretary of State on 6 March 1996—almost a year ago—in which, referring to the winter before last, he said:

"This winter has seen those emergency services put under considerable strain."

He added:

"I have . . . charged the chief executive of the NHS with a specific responsibility of reporting to me at the end of June and again at the end of September on the plans being made by each health authority for emergency services in its area."—[Official Report, 6 March 1996; Vol. 273, c. 356.]

Nevertheless, we hear that in Yorkshire, in London, in the north-west, in the north-east and everywhere else people are experiencing exactly the same problems this winter, if not worse, as they experienced last winter. I hope that the Minister, in his response, will take into account the fact that we believe that what the Secretary of State said on 6 March last year has come to nothing. Indeed, difficulties in our health service seem to be a great deal worse.

I shall mention only two issues. First, I shall talk about my local hospital at Lewisham. Secondly, I shall refer to one of my constituents. I make no apology for raising a constituent's case. I do not believe that individual cases are isolated. Surely they are examples of what is happening throughout the service. I agree with my hon. Friend that many incidents are not commented upon in the media. Indeed, he quoted a doctor to that effect. The cases that we can raise in the House, or which are raised in the media, are only the tip of the iceberg. That is the problem. We are able only by individual cases to draw Ministers' attention to what is happening throughout the service.

Lewisham hospital is a general hospital serving the people of Lewisham, although it is part of the Lambeth, Lewisham and Southwark health authority. Early in December 1996, it was necessary to cancel all non-elective, non-urgent surgery cases. It is ironic that the health authority felt that it could not fund any more such cases. Why was that? That situation was reached because Lewisham was doing even better than had been predicted. The hospital was seeing more people, treating them and doing all the things that the Secretary of State constantly tells us is happening.

So successful was Lewisham, however, that it ran out of funding and could no longer proceed. As a result, people who had dates to go into hospital to be treated were told at the beginning of December, "We can no longer admit you because additional funding is not available." Indeed, that funding will not be available until after the end of March this year.

With my hon. Friends the Members for Lewisham, West (Mr. Dowd) and for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms Ruddock), I have spoken to the health authority and to a Minister. I am not convinced, however, that Ministers are aware of the depth of the crisis. People in Lewisham, particularly, have been waiting for four months and more for admission—over and above the time that they waited to get their date for treatment in the first place. There will be more suffering, people's needs will become greater and costs will increase. As my hon. Friend said, costs will inevitably increase if people are not treated at the time of need.

I shall now move on to the specific case of one of my constituents, Mrs. Queenie Harrild. The case has had a media profile because Mrs. Harrild's family wants to ensure that what happened to her will not happen to anyone else. I pay tribute to the family's courage at a time of bereavement in being able to speak up for others when Mrs. Harrild died. She died because she had to wait five times to have a heart bypass operation. The operation was cancelled on every occasion. I shall go into the case in some detail.

Queenie Harrild was 69. She had been retired for only about four years. Like anyone at that age, she deserved to have a long and fruitful retirement with her husband. She had a bypass operation seven years ago. During the last few months, however, she had been suffering chest pains. She was admitted to Guy's hospital on 13 December.

On 16 December, she was told that she would be transferred to St. Thomas's hospital the next day. She was packed and ready to go. Her husband was at the hospital with her comforting her, giving her support and ready to go with her in the ambulance to St. Thomas's. Late that afternoon, however, she was told that the ambulance had not turned up and that she would be going to St. Thomas's the following day.

On 18 December, Queenie was packed and ready to go again. Again the ambulance did not turn up. This time, she was told that there were no beds available at St. Thomas's and that she was to be discharged, yet the family was told that her name was at the top of the list for the operation at St. Thomas's.

On 21 December, she was told, again, that she was to be transferred to St. Thomas's the following day to be operated on on the Monday. Late on Sunday afternoon, she was told, yet again, that she would not be transferred because no one had told the ward at St. Thomas's that she would be arriving.

On 23 December, Queenie was bathed twice. She went without food in preparation for the operation at Guy's. She was told that she would be sent to St. Thomas's some time that afternoon to be operated upon the following day. Again, later that afternoon, the operation was cancelled.

That process went on until 3 January. In between times, Mrs. Harrild was told that she would be discharged and sent home. She was then told that she would be sent to Lewisham hospital. These instructions went back and forth. She was prepared for an operation on four occasions with a pre-med. She went without food so as to be ready for an operation, only to be told that it had been cancelled. It was cancelled because an intensive care bed was not available. On five occasions there were planned operations. On five occasions her consultant said, "You will have your operation tomorrow."

Mrs. Harrild died on Saturday 4 January, three weeks after she had been accepted into hospital. Of her last 48 hours, 34 were spent without food or drink because she believed that she was to have her operation. At one point she was told that it would be performed privately. It appears that the doctors realised the emergency that they were facing, but that did not happen either.

Mrs. Harrild's family feel—I think that they have some cause to feel—that they lost their mother because the doctors involved had to make a choice between one patient and another, and determine who would be given the spare intensive care bed. It is not the role of doctors to play God, and no doctor wants to do so. It is outrageous that they are forced to make such choices.

The consultant at Guy's who was caring for my constituent said that heart surgery at the trust had been severely affected "for several months". That being so, Mrs. Harrild's case is not an isolated incident at Guy's. There has been a crisis for some time. The consultant said that heart surgery had been severely affected "for several months" because intensive care beds were permanently full. Dr. Bob Knight said:

> "This was a disaster for Mrs Harrild and a terrible tragedy for her family, made worse by the feeling that if things had been dealt with in some other way she would still be here."

Dr. Knight is absolutely right. It is a terrible tragedy for Mrs. Harrild's family, but it is one that they could come to terms with if they had any confidence that the Government will ensure that what happened to Mrs. Harrild will not happen to other people. That is why I am participating in the debate today. I want to hear from the Minister that the Secretary of State's speech of 6 March 1996 was not just warm words, but had some significance, that it meant that something will happen about intensive care beds, and that the crisis that we suffered last winter, and are suffering again this winter, will not happen a third time.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): I do not know whether my hon. Friend has seen a press release that the Department of Health put out on 24 December showing that £500,000 was spent on purchasing additional intensive care beds in the South Thames region. It lists the extra beds by authority, but not one additional pound of expenditure has been allocated to Lambeth, Lewisham and Southwark, my hon. Friend's health authority. Will she press the Minister specifically on why the allocation is as shown in the press release and why her inner-city health authority, which faces problems that were so graphically described to the House, was excluded from the additional allocations?

Mrs. Prentice: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that point. He described very succinctly the problem in funding for Lambeth, Lewisham and Southwark. As there has been a crisis right across that health authority for some time, I hope that the Minister will make a specific response.

I repeat once again that I hope that the Minister can assure us that the case of Mrs. Harrild, like that of the constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East, will not be repeated; that he will not say that these are isolated incidents; that he will recognise that they are symptoms of the deepening crisis in the health service; and that he will commit the Government to doing something quickly to resolve it.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I shall follow on from exactly where the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mrs. Prentice) left off. She and I have spoken. I have also spoken to a third colleague who, coincidentally, reflects, because of the party membership of each of us, the fact that this concern is not a party issue. All Members of Parliament have a duty to ensure that the health service works. The hon. Lady told the story of her constituent, Queenie Harrild. Queenie's son and his wife are represented by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), and the hospital Queenie died in is in my constituency.

Like the hon. Members for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie) and for Lewisham, East and me, who have participated in the debate, other hon. Members also wanted a debate on intensive care facilities, because in spite of the efforts that the Minister and the Government have made in the past year, which I recognise, we are clearly not providing sufficient intensive care beds.

The White Paper "The National Health Service: A Service with Ambitions", which came out in November, set out the four principles on which the Government believe the NHS should be run. It should be "universal in its reach, available to anyone who wishes to use it; high-quality; . . . available on the basis of clinical need"

and

"responsive, a service which is sensitive to the needs and wishes of patients and carers."

By definition, that means that, in both emergency services and intensive care services, the facility has to be where it is needed and when it is needed.

The announcement that the Secretary of State made last year, to which colleagues have referred, which was the starting point of the last chapter of this debate, was very clear. He said:

"Decisions about the resourcing of intensive care cannot be subsumed into general arrangements for other areas."

We have to look at intensive care—and with it goes high-dependency beds and other extra care beds—but we have to look at it separately. When considering resources, beds and their availability, as the hon. Member for York (Mr. Bayley) implied in his intervention, we have to look at this category of service on its own.

I should like to know, either this morning or by answer later, whether the Minister can now update the figures that show where all the additional beds have been allocated. I ask because, in addition to the announcement made just before Christmas, the Secretary of State, in yesterday's debate on the national health service, said that he had announced the distribution of some of the money—£4 million—just after Christmas to bring forward to this financial year the expansion of intensive care planned originally for next year. He said

"it would be used to deliver almost 100 extra adult intensive and high-dependency beds in the last quarter of this financial year."—[Official Report, 21 January 1997; Vol. 288, c. 761.]

Apparently, there are to be a further 100 beds between 1 January and 31 March. We need to know not just where they are but which are intensive care beds and which are high-dependency beds.

Mr. Mudie: When we ask the cost of an intensive care bed, we are always told that it is in the region of £500,000 but, amazingly, the Secretary of State seems to have announced £4 million for 100 intensive care or high-dependency beds. Is that funding to last up to the start of the new financial year? Will the Minister assure the House that the full year's funding in the next financial year is available in the health service budget?

Mr. Hughes: That is another very good point to which we need to know the answer. Of course intensive care beds cost more than high-dependency beds; that is why we need to see the breakdown by area and type.

The third special report of the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration, published on 16 October 1996, made it clear that "one of the prime duties of the NHS Executive is to ensure that Parliament is not . . . deprived of information by which it can judge the overall performance of the Health Service."

Parliament, and representatives of people like the family mentioned by the hon. Member for Leeds, East, and the Harrild family, need information regularly.

The Royal College of Nursing tells us that there are two reasons why there is a problem. First, there is a shortage of intensive care nurses. I should like the Minister to respond to that. It cites the example that the Royal Sussex county hospital had 11 vacancies out of an establishment of 65, and that Manchester has to recruit intensive care nurses from abroad. Secondly, the RCN says that the guidelines that set the establishment of intensive care beds are too strict. The British Medical Association, in its recent review of the winter crisis, confirmed that the shortage of intensive care beds was a national, not a localised, problem.

After the initial speeches in the debate last night, I went to Guy's hospital, because, coincidentally, the community health council meeting was also taking place. The first item on the agenda was the case of Queenie Harrild, and David and Pauline Harrild, her son and daughter-in-law, were there. The meeting accurately highlighted the questions that I want the Minister to answer.

At the meeting last night, answering questions was the consultant in charge of intensive care at Guy's, Dr. Richard Beale, who is clearly a man of huge sympathy. He told us the story of how the beds at the hospital that he manages are always under pressure; how staff are being reduced to danger levels to be able to take people in; and how they are having to juggle, as the hon. Member for Lewisham, East rightly said, between people who are brought into hospital to wait, and people who suddenly overtake them because they are emergency cases who will otherwise die, almost in the next minute or two.

At the end of the meeting last night, Pauline Harrild said that her mother-in-law was in Guy's "waiting to be saved", but she was not saved. We want to know whether we will have a health service that has sufficient intensive care beds to ensure that a bed is available for people who are identified as needing an operation that requires an intensive care bed. We have, I am told, fewer intensive care beds per head of population than all similar comparable countries. If that is true, we clearly need more. That does not mean that there should not be high-dependency and other beds to which people requiring intensive care can be released, but we must face the hard fact that more intensive care provision is needed.

The consultant was clear about the fact that our area in south-east London—the Lambeth, Southwark and Lewisham health authority area, containing Guy's and St. Thomas's trust—needs more beds. If it had had more beds, people such as Queenie Harrild would have been treated. There is no escaping the simple resource implication: more beds are needed, and more staff are needed to look after them.

It seems to me that our ultimate aim should be to distinguish between emergency and elective or planned admissions, otherwise someone like Mrs. Harrild will always be overtaken by another patient who is, for example, suddenly downstairs in the accident and emergency department. We must ensure that there is planning so that we do not experience such crises. That planning must be national, regional and local, and must be done accountably and democratically. Unless we have such a system, we shall regularly fail our constituents and the public as a whole.

As for now, we plainly do not have enough intensive care beds. That is clear to many hon. Members on both sides of the House. Let me tell the Minister that, if there is one thing that must continue to be given priority by the Government in this financial quarter and in the remaining time of this Parliament, it is that we act in a way that ensures that the deaths that have been reported to the House today have not been in vain.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): First, let me pay tribute to Warrington hospital, of which we are all proud. It has a dedicated staff, an efficient chief executive and a chairman who takes a deep interest in what goes on there.

Warrington has a population of 200,000, which is growing year by year. The hospital, however, must also serve the surrounding region, which brings the total number to 350,000. At present, there are only three intensive care beds for all those people. It is impossible for the hospital to manage with so few beds. As a result, patients have had to be transferred, and one of those patients—a Mr. Pitcher—unfortunately died during the process. The coroner took the unusual step of being highly critical of the fact that that gentleman had been subjected to a 30-mile journey.

The shortage of beds worries not only Warrington hospital and trust, but the purchasers, North Cheshire health authority. The problem is finance. We had an extremely constructive meeting with the authority on Monday, following which we understand that one extra intensive care bed is to be provided. That is good news, which is welcomed not only by my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Hall) and me, but by the people of Warrington.

As we have heard this morning, however, the crisis affects not only Warrington or, indeed, the north-west region, but the whole country. I invite the Minister to deny the fact—which has been reported to me—that three weeks ago there was not a bed to spare in the whole of England, and that if more admissions had been necessary, patients would have had to go to Glasgow.

I particularly want to draw attention to the strange story of what happened when my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South asked the north-west regional office for copies of the reports prepared for the Secretary of State, which have been mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mrs. Prentice). They were sent to the chief executive, Alan Langlands, but they were for the attention of the Secretary of State. Having applied to the regional office, my hon. Friend was given a copy of the report on emergency care. I have a copy here. When he asked for a copy of a similar report on intensive care, however—it had been submitted to Alan Langlands—my hon. Friend's request was refused.

How can Members of Parliament do their job if they are not given all the information that they need in order to present their case? Surely this should not be allowed. Will the Minister answer these questions: why was that report suppressed, who made the decision to suppress it, and will it now be released? It seems to me that, in relation to intensive care, there must be a horrible smell at the bottom of the NHS garden. Will the Minister now come clean? Will he tell us that we can have the report on intensive care, and will he explain why my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South was not allowed to see it?

Mr. Mike Hall (Warrington, South): I thank my hon. Friend for raising this issue. I believe that the document has been published, but that the region did not want to release it to me in time for yesterday's debate. It is a cover-up, and the Minister should first apologise and then give a commitment that the report will be placed in the Library. Then we shall all be able to see for ourselves whether that intensive care report submitted to Alan Langlands and the Secretary of State does indeed show that there is a problem in our region.

Mr. Hoyle: I hope that not only that report, but similar reports from every other region, will be released to the Members of Parliament who need to see them. Otherwise, it will be impossible for us to be well informed and to do the job that our constituents sent us here to do. That shows above all else that there must be a crisis in intensive care throughout England and Wales.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie) on securing a timely debate on an important issue. I thank him for the measured way in which he spoke of a distressing incident involving the death of one of his constituents, whose family obviously took it very hard. I hope that we do not hear more of the accusations of shroud waving that we heard in yesterday's debate. We are all here to represent people and, I hope, the national health service itself. If attention is drawn to the deficiencies in the service, that should not be interpreted as shroud waving. We should be engaging in an honest and earnest debate about the problems in the NHS.

That brings me to what was said yesterday, and what was said today by my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle), about the report on the Warrington intensive care unit that has allegedly been published in the north-west. If that report has indeed been published, it should be available to hon. Members, and also to the public in the north-west, who pay taxes and use the NHS. I hope that, if it has been suppressed internally, the Minister will sort the matter out.

I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House have noted the growing concern about what is described as the "winter crisis" in the health service, which has appeared to increase daily. Across the country, intensive care bed capacity has been stretched to the limit because of seasonal upturns in emergency demand. It is clear that there are simply not enough intensive care beds to cope with what most of us would consider to be reasonable demand for this time of year.

Clinicians are unable to perform other surgery in hospitals because intensive care beds are full. Operations are being cancelled, and waiting times are increasing because of insufficient spare capacity in the system to cope with sudden fluctuations in demand for emergency care. So the debate is about not one problem but three. First, lack of intensive care beds strains hospitals' ability to cope with emergencies. Secondly, use of general hospital beds for emergency cases results in cancellation of routine work. Thirdly, postponing treatment for cases sometimes referred to as "non-urgent" leads, by default, to those cases worsening and turning into emergency cases. The shortage of intensive care beds aggravates all those problems.

The build-up of pressure in the NHS was entirely predictable, because no one should be surprised that winter comes between January and March or that winter increases demand on our health service. The situation is similar to the annual need to grit roads after snowfall, when everyone seems to be caught out and gritting lorries are not ready to deal with the crisis. This year, we should have been ready for increased winter demand on the NHS, as the problem has been flagged up year after year. I see that the Minister is smiling at the analogy, but the problem has caught us out again.

Every year, hard-working doctors and nurses battle against the odds to do their jobs in a winter crisis. On Monday, I was at a district general hospital in north-east England, and people there told me about how staff had voluntarily worked on new year's day because of staff illness and other problems. They had to keep the hospital going, and it was wonderful to see their dedication. Ultimately, however, I can only wonder why, time after time, the same crisis sneaks up on us.

I do not think that the Government's solution to the intensive care bed crisis—as reported in the press at Christmas, although we could detect the crisis developing well before Christmas—is sufficient. I am bothered because the NHS chief executive has "ordered all casualty and intensive care units to stay open in the run-up to polling day".

That policy was reported after seven London casualty departments had been forced to close for some time during the previous six weeks. Within days of the announcement of the new NHS policy, however, trusts were being forced to defy the order because of a severe lack of intensive care beds and an upsurge in medical emergencies.

Since the new year, there have been numerous problems inside the NHS. Two Surrey hospitals have closed their doors to emergency cases. Two Lancashire consultants announced that they were quitting because of a desperate shortage of hospital beds. The Royal Gwent hospital was accepting only medical emergency cases, and the list goes on. On the situation in London, my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mrs. Prentice) told us that, because of the current winter crisis, all non-urgent surgery has been cancelled in the Lewisham hospital. Patients at St. George's hospital—21 of them at one point—have had to spend nights on trollies. Such an environment is unacceptable to people who work and care for patients in our hospitals, to the British public—who pay taxes to fund the NHS—and to patients and their families, who are under enough stress when a family member is admitted to hospital.

Drawing on 20 years' experience, a consultant at St. George's A and E department said:

"I don't think I have ever seen such a terrible state of affairs."

Such quotes come not from shroud wavers but from those who work every day in our health service to care for people who need care. The head of A and E at the Royal Edinburgh hospital said:

"the whole acute hospital service is stretched beyond its ability to cope."

A senior manager at Edgware general hospital said that the situation was "horrendous". Even the head of the emergency bed service, which is supposed to co-ordinate provision for intensive care places, said that now there was "no room for manoeuvre". The service reported that it was "frantically busy" dealing with shortages in intensive care places.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East spoke in detail about the sad death from a heart attack at the beginning of this month of a 69-year-old London woman. A hospital spokesman had said that "an increase in medical emergencies had put the hospital's intensive care beds under pressure over the New Year."

The very next day, a 70-year-old man who had been seriously ill with liver failure was transferred 90 miles, from Birmingham to Sheffield, because no intensive care bed was available locally. He died soon after, and a spokesperson at the Sheffield hospital said:

"He was in a desperate condition. The transfer would not have been good for him."

I wonder what families think when they hear such statements from a hospital to which their relative has been sent, but such service now seems to be acceptable. In some cases, people who are in desperate need of intensive care can be put into ambulances and transported more than 100 miles to receive care. The situation in our national health service, despite what has been done over the past 12 months, is not acceptable.

In his speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East went into some detail about a patient being taken from Leeds to Hull. As he said, another patient was transported in the other direction, when a man was taken from Hull to Leeds, where a bed was available. That man died also. Last week, a spokesman for Guy's hospital inadvertently provided the best summation of the Tory crisis. He said:

"Every time we thought an intensive care bed was about to become free, an emergency patient arrived. There was no possibility of transferring"— a sick patient—

"to another hospital because everyone else is in the same situation."

Such circumstances demonstrate that we have major problems in our NHS.

As everyone knows, since the internal market was introduced into the NHS, five years ago, we have lost 25 per cent. of NHS beds. That reduction does not help. A fortnight ago, Dr. Sandy Macara, chairman of the British Medical Association, said that the crisis faced by the NHS has occurred because

"There just aren't enough beds, including emergency care, available to deal with what ought to be a predictable and predicted peak demand, and that's because of the way that the internal market works and just not having enough money in the system."

The intensive care bed crisis in the NHS is also a cash crisis. As we now know, so that trusts can continue to operate, the Government will allow trusts, by the end of this financial year, to spend £150 million that should be spent in the following financial year. The Government are effectively deferring NHS cuts until future years. It is unacceptable for Ministers to tell the House that, year on year, more money is going into the health service, because we know that that is not the case. Ministers should ask health service practitioners about efficiency cuts in the NHS. If they were to do so, they would discover that efficiency drives have led to the increased bed loss. Real problems in our NHS will be stored up for the future if we do not tackle the issues head on.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East said that St. James's university hospital, in Leeds, was able to set up two extra intensive care beds—although there are still empty bays on the ward. We cannot run away from the fact that one of the problems facing the intensive care service is the lack of nurses available to staff beds, even when the beds are available. No one can question the fact that that problem exists. I have here a Royal College of Nursing brief for today's debate, which states that the Royal Sussex county hospital has 11 vacancies out of an establishment of 65. I have no doubt that is a major problem across the country.

I conclude with a quotation from a study that the Department of Health commissioned from the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine. The report stated:

"The main reasons for patient refusal is lack of ICU facilities; either the unit is full and no bed available, or beds are physically available but there are insufficient staff to provide adequate nursing".

Something is wrong. It is to the Government's credit that millions of pounds have been put into the service but there is still a problem with intensive care beds. Whatever has been done in the past 12 months is clearly not enough to cater for the needs of our constituents. I hope that the Minister will reply to some of the issues in the time available to him.

10.50 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Horam): It seems a long time, Mr. Deputy Speaker, since you and I were in the House debating health matters earlier this morning. It is as if you and I were nailed to our seats—the Opposition will undoubtedly say that that is a penance.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie) on securing a debate on such an important subject. I appreciate the bipartisan, or non-political, spirit with which he approached the subject, and I should like to respond in a similar fashion. I think it was the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) who said that it was the duty of us all to make the national health service work, and I assure him and the House that that is certainly the wish of Ministers.

I hope that the hon. Members for Lewisham, East (Mrs. Prentice), for Southwark and Bermondsey and for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) as well as my old sparring partner the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) will not mind if I concentrate, at least in the first instance, on the specific points made by the hon. Member for Leeds, East, to whom we are grateful for initiating the debate.

The Gentleman spoke graphically of the circumstances surrounding Mrs. Harrison's sudden illness. Those events are of course a matter of great sorrow, and I should like to express my sympathy and condolences to her family. The hon. Gentleman asked specifically what action was being taken by the health authority in the aftermath of those events although, as his remarks made clear, he will be aware of some of what is happening.

The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the authority plans further work on intensive care, and that work can be classified under three main headings. First, it aims to complete a thorough review—which, as the hon. Gentleman knows, is already under way—into the facts surrounding Mrs. Harrison's transfer from St. James's hospital to the Hull Royal infirmary. Secondly, it aims to ensure that arrangements are in place to guarantee that every possibility of a bed in Leeds has been fully explored before a transfer to an intensive care unit outside the city is considered. Thirdly, the health authority will convene a meeting with intensive care clinicians to consider with them the protocols and procedures within which intensive care services in Leeds operate.

The hon. Member for Leeds, East raised another important point about which we have corresponded—the situation at Killingbeck. We are in fact discussing a separate matter in relation to that hospital, but I shall say a little about intensive care beds there as he raised the matter today. As he knows, there are seven cardiac intensive care beds at Killingbeck hospital, which are dedicated for the use of cardiac patients and support the highly complex specialist services which Killingbeck and the Leeds general hospital provide. It is because of the specialist nature of these beds and the specialised training of the staff involved that they are not made available for general intensive care use. Their availability is therefore not reported.

It is not correct to say that those beds are ring-fenced financially; because of their specialist nature, they are not generally available. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that. In view of the circumstances, however, the health authority has agreed to review, with the local trust, whether, in certain situations, those and other cardiac intensive care unit beds should be made available to provide general intensive care for local people. I must stress that the use of those cardiac beds for general intensive care would require very careful selection of cases—for example, infectious medical cases such as patients suffering meningitis would not be suitable for treatment in a unit containing cardiac surgery patients. The idea is being considered, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman understands that the matter must be handled with great care.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the general expansion plans for ICU beds in the Leeds area, a matter that we have discussed before. He knows of, and acknowledged, the investment of an extra £1 million in Leeds this year to fund one extra bed at Leeds general hospital and one at St. James's. That has been followed by the commitment of an additional £127,000 and a West Yorkshire-wide bid for a further £325,000 for intensive care. That significant investment builds on a general increase in intensive care beds in Leeds in recent years. For example, the number of paediatric ICU beds at the University of Leeds teaching hospital trebled between 1992 and 1996, and beds for adults increased from seven to 10 between 1993 and 1996. An average occupancy rate of 85 per cent. at St. James's ICU suggests that there are sufficient beds for most eventualities.

Mr. Hinchliffe: I have listened carefully to what the Minister said, but I think that he will accept from what he has heard this morning that there is a particular problem in the northern and Yorkshire region of the NHS. We have lost more beds in the past five years than any other region—27 per cent. of our beds have disappeared. That loss has a knock-on effect on intensive care provision in a wider area.

Mr. Horam: There is clearly a connection between the number of beds in absolute terms and the use of intensive care beds. Indeed, the hon. Member for Rother Valley commented on that. Nevertheless, in this particular instance I am talking about the provision of intensive care beds in the Leeds area and more generally. As the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) knows, there is a major new development at the Leeds general infirmary. The cost is £72 million, and phase 1 will come into operation this year. That offers the opportunity to look again at the balance of intensive care and high-dependency beds in the hospital to ensure that there is more flexibility to provide intensive care at peak periods.

Mr. Bayley: A number of the paediatric intensive care beds in Leeds are specialist beds related to heart surgery, burns or other clinical disciplines and are not available, or appropriate, for general use. Will the Minister separate the figures for those specialist beds as it would be wrong to count them with general paediatric intensive care beds?

Mr. Horam: I take the point. Paediatric intensive care beds should be considered separately from general intensive care beds, although my information is that the intensive care beds I am talking about are for general, not specialist, use. The specialist beds that I was talking about are at Killingbeck.

I also take the point raised by the hon. Member for Wakefield. It is important to consider the matter not on a Leeds basis, or indeed a York basis, but on a regional basis.

Mr. Hoyle: The debate has been initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East so it is important that the Minister deals with the points that he raised, but I hope that he will leave himself time to say why the report was not given to my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South which, as I said earlier, prevented him from having all the information that he needed for yesterday's debate.

Mr. Horam: I should like to look into that. I shall write to the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien), who raised the point today and in yesterday's debate, and to the hon. Member for Warrington, North.

As a result of the additional regional funding that we have provided for adult intensive care and high dependency care this year—the £4 million that we were talking about—an extra five intensive care beds and six high dependency beds are being opened in the Northern and Yorkshire region. More will be opened in the region in the next financial year as a result of the extra £5 million that we have earmarked for adult intensive care and high dependency beds, to be matched by £15 million from the growth money provided by local authorities. A stream of new provision is under way.

In the little time that we have left, I should like to point out to the hon. Member for Lewisham, East, who commented adversely on the plans made for this winter by my hon. Friend—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order.

St. Helena

11 am

Mr. Mark Wolfson (Sevenoaks): Its isolation, its history and its position—a tiny dot in the south Atlantic—make St. Helena a romantic and beguiling place. It does not disappoint. From the island's first appearance as a misty bump on the horizon until the Royal Mail ship St. Helena drops anchor under the towering cliffs flanking Jamestown harbour, and when visitors leap ashore up the same steps as Napoleon used, the sense of history is everywhere.

Fascinating as that is, I requested this debate to address the present-day issues of St. Helena and the Saints who live there. My colleagues and I are grateful for the speed with which the debate was granted by Madam Speaker.

The hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke), who is in his place, Lord Beaumont and I visited St. Helena with the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. Those who know St. Helena will not be surprised to hear that we were given a warm and friendly welcome. Arrangements for the visit were well structured—we had an opportunity to meet many islanders at a large reception at Government house, and we had well-organised briefing papers and discussions. We all felt that the way in which the visit was put together was a credit to the island's Government, staff and elected councillors, and made best use of our time, which was short because of the shipping schedule.

Despite being on the island for only two and a half days before the ship left for Cape Town, we were able to get a clear picture of the problems facing St. Helena. I regret not having been able to lean over gateposts for a chat and meet people in the street. I should also have liked the opportunity to see more of that beautiful and interesting island, but that would have required a longer visit, which would not have been easy for the CPA to fund or organise.

The four key issues that came up over and again were: citizenship; communications—or lack of them—with the island; the commitment of the United Kingdom Government and Parliament to St. Helena; and the constitution. I shall deal with those four Cs in turn.

The first issue is citizenship. Many hon. Members—but by no means all, as I have found from talking to some—will be aware that full British citizenship and the right to live and work in the United Kingdom were removed from the Saints in 1981, and they regard that as a serious and continuing injustice. Citizenship is the key and burning issue for them.

The restoration of the right for Saints to live and work in the UK, quite apart from citizenship, would have many beneficial effects on the island: it would benefit the island economy, because money would be remitted to families still there; the opportunity to work in the wider world in the UK would motivate the islanders further to make progress at school and afterwards; and—this is a key factor in moving forward the development plan for the island—it would bring back outside experience and expertise to St. Helena, particularly from those who might have had entrepreneurial experience in the United Kingdom. Unless the island benefits from such experience, the strategic plan, on which the Government's policy hinges, is unlikely to be effective.

Those two issues of citizenship and development are linked. All those from the House who visited St. Helena believed that, after the handover of Hong Kong later this year, Parliament should again address the issue of citizenship in the interests of justice and practical economics. I am not having withdrawal symptoms about my decision not to stand for Parliament again, but I shall regret no longer being here to advance these arguments—particularly that on citizenship—in the interests of St. Helena.

My second point is about communications. Almost every other place in the world is becoming more accessible and more closely tied to the rest of the world by better air transport links and improved roads. St. Helena, in contrast, has become more isolated in recent years. In the days of sailing ships, 1,000 ships a year called at St. Helena. Until the 1970s, many of the Union Castle vessels sailing between the United Kingdom and Cape Town called there, giving St. Helena a ship probably every two weeks. They were not the fastest Union Castle liners, but the second category, which carried cargo and passengers.

Since the 1970s, the island's only link with the outside world has been the Royal Mail ship St. Helena. It is correctly called the Royal Mail ship, because it carries the mail, which cannot get there any other way. The standard of service on the ship—the way in which it is run, the food provided and the sociability of the crew in looking after their passengers—is excellent. The ship is also a major employer. It has some UK officers, although some are Saints, and all the crew come from St. Helena. It is run by the Curnow line and is an excellent ship, providing a good service.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for mentioning not only RMS St. Helena but Curnow Shipping, which operates from Porthleven in my constituency. Does he accept that, over the years, the company has shown absolute dedication to not only the running of the ship but the whole cause of St. Helena and the House's responsibility to face up to its problems, which he is promoting in this debate?

Mr. Wolfson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and I entirely agree with his points. The company deserves congratulations.

The ship attracts a large element of subsidy, without which it could not run between Cardiff, Ascension, St. Helena and Cape Town. The shipping line is endeavouring to promote greater use of the ship as a cruise attraction. Indeed, several people who were on board during our visit had used it many times. One individual, a Brit living in South Africa, of great age and character, had journeyed on the ship about 14 times, which is a pretty good recommendation.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): How big is the ship, how many passengers can it accommodate and what contribution would it make to the development of tourism?

Mr. Wolfson: The ship can carry about 140 passengers, but some of that accommodation, which is fairly basic, has to be kept available for the shuttle between Ascension and St. Helena to allow the Saints who work in Ascension and on the Falkland Islands to book places on board the ship as part of their working life. There is therefore always the problem of striking a balance between the extent to which the ship can be promoted for straight cruise tourism and the need for it to service St. Helena. My hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) made the point about Curnow's dedication in trying to hit such a balance effectively.

There is no air strip on St. Helena, which remains a major issue for the Saints. Much investment would be required to build an air strip, and, once built, not only would the running of the airport need Government funding, but any of the airlines that have already considered the prospect would require the St. Helena Government to guarantee a certain number of bookings, so a further subsidy would have to be provided. Britain and our taxpayers would therefore face the problem of continuing subsidies for the future.

In my view, the better chance of progress is through the development of a proper breakwater, which would provide a sheltered harbour for St. Helena, and through improvement of the wharfage facilities, which would be of direct assistance to the fishing proposals—to which I shall come in a moment—and would allow passengers on cruise liners to land more easily. At the moment, a liner cannot go alongside. Even RMS St. Helena has to anchor offshore, and passengers and freight have to be taken ashore in launches and lighters. In bad weather, if they get off the liner at all, passengers have to go down to the lighter in a cage and land on the exciting and slightly hazardous steps, which, as I said, Napoleon used when he landed there.

One of the difficulties is that the cruise liners and the shipping lines become vulnerable under insurance arrangements if any injury or loss occurs to passengers. The captains of the liners are therefore even more cautious than they used to be in allowing their passengers to disembark: it is at the captain's command whether landing happens or not. We know that many liners call at St. Helena with the intention of putting a cruise party ashore for a whole day—which would bring very effective income to the island—but due to the swell cannot do so. Major improvements to the wharfage are therefore absolutely vital. Some such improvements are taken care of in the island's development plan, but I suggest that the British Government look further than the development plan if St. Helena is ultimately to be able better to stand on its own economic feet.

I turn to the UK's commitment to St. Helena, the Government and this Parliament. We cannot doubt that St. Helena is a residual responsibility from the days of the empire. The ancestors of those who live there were employees of the British East India Company. Those who live there now, like their ancestors, do so on the understanding that they are British. They know no other citizenship and belong to no other country. They are a special case.

I referred to the strategic plan for the island, which is entitled "The St. Helena strategic review 1996 to 2001". It is the key policy and development plan for the island produced by the Overseas Development Administration. I should like to refer to a few of its key points. It is endeavouring to provide a way forward for the St. Helena Government, elected representatives and Government employees to produce and implement a strategy for economic growth and greater self-sustainability. The British taxpayers' total subsidy to St. Helena during the period of the plan is about £9 million a year, and covers the ship subsidy and the island itself.

Interestingly enough, only last week the hon. Member for York (Mr. Bayley), in a ten-minute Bill, questioned whether ODA money was best spent on work that does not address the poorest in the world. He cited St. Helena as a country that would not be regarded as being among the poorest. He was not in any way suggesting that it does not have problems or does not need aid. He was making the point that, under the ODA budget, such issues need to be considered, and I think that they are bound to be in future. Making such points in the House increases the importance of the development plan to St. Helena's ability better to stand on its own feet—it will never entirely do so; it would not be realistic to expect that.

The plan identifies tourism, import substitution—especially in agriculture and fishing—some basic manufacturing service industries and construction arising from the contracting-out of capital investment projects as key elements. The plan seemed sensible to all of us who visited the island. I shall make two points about it. First, ODA funding needs to be stable during the implementation of the plan—it is important that the House keeps a close eye on that—and, secondly and most important, the elected representatives on the Legislative Council and the Executive Council in St. Helena should take ownership of the plan. It has not been imposed on them; it was drawn up as a result of intensive discussions on the island. The Government in St. Helena must accept responsibility for implementing the plan. We all know that plans are splendid things, but making them work is what really matters.

When the Foreign Office considers appointing anybody from Britain to the Government of the island, it is important that it chooses people who have a real understanding of commercialism and the importance of commercial activity to the island. A glossy brochure aimed at encouraging investment in St. Helena, which was published before the governor took office, showed a complete lack of understanding of reality. When we explored whether the legal infrastructure or the financial arrangements to encourage such inward investment existed in St. Helena, it was made plain to us that they did not. There was nothing to encourage a company to come to the island, and there has been a lack of understanding by the Foreign Office of the importance of putting the commercial elements together if the ODA plan is to work. In many other areas, the Foreign Office has taken up with both hands the challenge of making our embassies and high commissions more relevant to commerce. They need to do the same in St. Helena.

I wish to refer to tourism, which came top of the agenda in the development plan. Those of us who travelled to St. Helena had to fly, courtesy of the RAF, from Brize Norton via Ascension island, and it was our view that Ascension needs to be brought into the tourism and commercial picture with St. Helena. At present, the Bahamas treaty—a 40-year-old treaty between Britain and the United States—prevents Ascension from having any use but a military one. That will not do if fishing is to develop effectively, let alone tourism. We believe that there is scope for the development of tourism on Ascension, which has the right climate and beaches. St. Helena has no beach and a wetter climate than many people appreciate. These factors must be dealt with, but they cannot be dealt with unless the Government address the problem of the 40-year-old Bahamas treaty, which needs a major review. The strategic and defence issues that existed at the time of the treaty have now changed dramatically, so there is every reason to tackle the problem.

There is good news on the fishing front. Argos St. Helena—a company that has developed fishery activities with great success in the Falklands—has a ship called the Argos St. Helena that currently spends half the year fishing off South Georgia. The weather prevents it from fishing there during the other six months. The company, in negotiation with the St. Helena Government—and with, I am glad to say, a fair wind from the Foreign Office—has now established itself, but has registered in Jersey because of the difficulty of registering a company in St. Helena. That makes my point about the lack of a legal framework. The ship will fish from St. Helena, and the company, with the St. Helena Government, will develop a cannery on the island. Commitments have been made by the British Government to improve the cranage at Rupert's bay, where the cannery will be established, and those must be kept.

I had a positive and interesting meeting with Mr. Thompson, the chief executive of the company. He is an experienced man who has made a significant contribution to the development of fishing in the Falklands. He made the point that increased fishing activity around St. Helena would enable the St. Helena Government to go further in providing a fishing zone around the island. At present, such a zone cannot be policed effectively, but other fishing vessels with proper licences can do a good job in chasing away and reporting on those vessels that may be fishing in the area without a licence or adequate permission. My point about Ascension fits in here. Given that the fish move at different times of the year, the need to be able to fish from Ascension for part of the year and to have fishing vessels based there is important. It is crucial that the job opportunities for Saints that exist on Ascension and, through the Ministry of Defence, in the Falklands are maintained. Those are the only job outlets other than work on the island, which is scarce.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this important debate, and I share his view that, for historical reasons, we have an obligation to St. Helena. My concern in last week's debate related to the fact that the ODA has to weigh our historical responsibility for St. Helena against its responsibility for development in much poorer countries in the third world. Does the hon. Gentleman share my view that it might be better to ask a part of Government other than the ODA—possibly the Foreign Office itself—to take responsibility for dependent territories, in the same way as the Foreign Office takes direct responsibility for other institutions, such as the BBC World Service or the British Council?

Mr. Wolfson: That suggestion is worth considering and, happily, it leads me to my final constitutional point.

If ever there was a case of he who pays the piper calls the tune, it is the ODA and its role in St. Helena. Since the ODA pays for almost everything, our overriding perception was that the ODA experts second-guess practically every policy decision on the island. That is done with the best intentions and because the work involves the use of public money. My taxpayers in Sevenoaks—and those of the hon. Member for York—would expect that public money to be accounted for. However, we found that an ODA expert would give a view and, on some occasions, it was almost a case of the umpire umpiring the umpire. That works directly against the development of the democratic process in St. Helena.

It is sometimes difficult for the Foreign Office team to refer everything to the ODA, whose decisions will most directly affect the island. I am not criticising all the work and the commitment of the ODA to the life and prosperity of St. Helena, as it is vital. But we must encourage those who are politically elected in St. Helena—where there are no political parties—to take real responsibility for the decisions affecting the government of the island.

When there are no political parties, it is difficult for policies to develop and be put through. The policy is developed in the strategic plan, and the Members of LegCo need to feel responsible and must have it demonstrated to them that they have the responsibility for decision making on implementation.

All members of the St. Helena all-party group are extremely grateful for the opportunity to participate in this debate. I apologise on behalf of its chairman, my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin), who is committed to attending the Defence Select Committee; otherwise he would be here.

St. Helena will remain in my mind for many years to come. I shall continue to follow its fortunes with interest, admiration and warm regard.

11.30 am

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I congratulate the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson) on securing the debate, which is timely because the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association recently sent a delegation to the island, of which he, my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) and Lord Beaumont were members.

It is a pity that the CPA can send a delegation to St. Helena only once every 12 or 13 years; I was a member of the previous delegation in 1984. St. Helena is probably our only dependent territory receiving budgetary aid, and it is extremely isolated. What I have to say will not all be good news.

The hon. Member for Sevenoaks made several important points and I agree entirely with all but one. I hope that the Minister listened carefully. Citizenship is perhaps the most important point. The St. Helenians feel isolated and betrayed by the removal of citizenship, and that must be reconsidered either by the Government or by successor Governments. The matter will not go away, and a settlement must be reached as soon as possible.

I also agree with the hon. Gentleman about Overseas Development Administration officials umpiring the umpire. They have a nice time looking at St. Helena and gathering some information and then they second-guess any decisions that are to be made on the island. One of the Members of the Legislative Council, the honourable John Newman MLC, sent me a fax referring to the recent visit by ODA officials. The fax said:

"It is felt that there was insufficient time given to meetings with the Elected Members and that the majority of consultation was undertaken by expatriate officials which consisted of the Chief Secretary, Financial Secretary, Economist and Chief Auditor with no St. Helenian officials included. I raised this matter with the Chief Secretary and my point was noted."

[Dr. John Marek]

That shows us in a nutshell what is wrong in St. Helena. I am not attacking ODA officials, who have integrity and try to do their best for St. Helena, but somehow or other the Saints are not included in the discussions, consultations or decisions.

Another important matter is the ability to take advantage of any commercial decisions. The Atlantic Mammoth project is supposed to be a lottery based on the Internet, although I do not know whether it will, or deserves to, get off the ground. It may be, as the hon. Member for Sevenoaks said, that the financial facilities do not exist on St. Helena to allow the project to go ahead. Nevertheless, the elected Members of LegCo are not consulted, their views are not taken into consideration and their questions are not properly answered.

I received a fax from LegCo, and I suspect that other hon. Members received it, too. It said:

"We, the elected members of the Legislative Council of St. Helena do hereby request that permission, co-operation and assistance be given to the Government of St. Helena by HMG to enable it to increase external revenue by any legal means, and by so doing reduce the amount of Financial Aid given to us by the ODA."

That is signed first by Bill Drabble, and by nine other Members; that is the large majority of the elected Members of the Legislative Council.

What is going on in St. Helena? Is the Legislative Council treated as being of no importance? I hope not. I hope that the Governor and the officials who are sent from the Foreign Office to St. Helena by Her Majesty's Government take elected Members of the Legislative Council seriously. If a proposal is made, it should be considered seriously, and if it truly cannot be put into operation, a proper explanation should be given.

If that was all that was wrong with St. Helena, it would not be much of a problem; but there is more. A programme of improvements needs to be implemented. We must consider whether an airport can be built. My views are mixed, but I think that we could investigate the possibility of a mainland African company flying an aircraft one day a week to St. Helena and back from a coastal town on mainland Africa and using that aircraft on other business for the other six days. It would be reasonably easy to build an airport on the island.

Tourism development is important. Other matters that interest St. Helenians and should be addressed include an integrated port management, development of fisheries, better cargo handling equipment, wharf improvements, a wind turbine, water development, a second 1 MW generator, better electricity distribution, expansion of the bulk fuel installation, better water catchment and drainage; and the social issues, including care of the elderly, waste disposal, housing and all the matters that will inevitably crop up in any civilised society. Those matters are talked about, but nothing much happens.

I want to make a crucial point about the government of St. Helena. I am told that the Governor, in an interview on board MS Explorer, which visited the island, said that he found St. Helena "boring and tedious", and that that comment was broadcast to islanders over the radio. That cannot be right. If the Governor can say such a thing, why is he the Governor? I asked a parliamentary question about that, but the Minister of course glossed over it.

We need some honesty about what is going on. It is said by the St. Helenians that the Governor spends much more of his time away from the island than other Governors. Worse is to come. The police used to be given free transport between their home and the police station, and they were suddenly told, with no consultation or negotiations, that that concession was being withdrawn and that in future they would have between £30 and £50 docked from their monthly pay of about £300. They took the Governor to court. The Chief Justice had arrived, but unfortunately had to leave on the ship before the case could be concluded, because the Government did not produce the files that he needed to determine the case. I am told that the island's Attorney-General said that the case had had to be postponed because of the way in which they were deliberately misled. That is not good. There should not be such Government duplicity with civil proceedings on the island.

On 27 October, there was a 200-strong protest march of teachers and nurses led by elected councillors of LegCo. They wanted to petition the Governor because they had been given only a week's notice that fares on school buses would rise by between £9 and £20 a month. There had been no consultation, negotiation or explanation; they were told by diktat. While many matters on St. Helena are the responsibility of the Government, power is vested in the Governor, not LegCo. Hon. Members must understand that all important powers are kept by the Governor, who is nominated by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in Whitehall and sent to the island.

The Governor would not meet the protesters. I am told that he watched from Solomon's office in Main street and sent the Chief Secretary, Mr. John Perrott, to deal with the deputation. The Governor had previously been manhandled during another demonstration, which is unheard of in St. Helena, which is a civilised place. The last thing that would occur to people there would be to go on a demonstration, let alone manhandle the Governor. I understand that it was simply a case of someone getting hold of his tie, but even so, matters are not right.

The Foreign Office should review the government of St. Helena. A new constitution has been prepared, partly by the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association international secretariat. We must also review whether expatriate officials have empathy, as the hon. Member for Sevenoaks put it, with the people of St. Helena. I do not think that they do.

Finally, there is the case of Mrs. Brenda Cairns-Wicks. She had been a teacher in St. Helena for six years and was an unestablished civil servant. We dispensed with all that 20 or 30 years ago. She became pregnant. Normally, when a teacher becomes pregnant, she gets 14 weeks' leave or whatever, but not a bit of it. The rules and regulations in St. Helena had not been updated and she was required to resign. After her confinement, she would have to apply for another job, if one were available. I brought the matter to the Minister's attention. He is an honourable man and I like him, but it is to his shame that he has done nothing about the matter. She was forced to resign. The rules were changed a week after she resigned, so that others who become pregnant will not face the same appalling situation. Nothing could be done after she had resigned, because her job had already been filled.

It does not reflect well on the Government and shames the Minister. No competent Governor would have allowed it to happen.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Sir Nicholas Bonsor): I do not want to bring this into my closing remarks, so I should like to deal with it immediately. I very much regret what happened to Mrs. Cairns-Wicks, but by the time the matter had been brought to our attention, her job had been filled. She has been told that she can reapply for any future vacancy, but I believe that she is living on Ascension and has no intention of taking up that offer. The Government regret that she suffered from a failure of the law that we rectified as soon as we found it.

Dr. Marek: I am pleased to hear that. The case should never have happened. I hope that if Mrs. Cairns-Wicks applies for another job, she will be given every consideration.

My time is nearly up, but there are other matters that the Government should consider. The ODA has been trying to do its best, but it could change its views on certain issues. The constitution needs upgrading. Above all, when we appoint expatriate officials, we must ensure that they have empathy with the islanders. It is not enough for them simply to be the man or woman from Whitehall sent to rule the island. To some extent, once they arrive, they are the representatives of the island in Whitehall. In the past few years, I fear that that dimension has been slightly missing.

Sir David Mitchell (North–West Hampshire): I speak as secretary of the all-party group on St. Helena and dependencies. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson) on securing the debate. St. Helena is a British dependent territory; its culture is British and its only language is English. There are fewer than 6,000 people on the island. Those people are our responsibility and it is right that we should debate them in Parliament.

I concur with much of what was said by the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek). The House will have sympathy for Saints, as St. Helenians are called. They are almost marooned on an island 700 miles from Ascension and six days' steaming from Cape Town. Inevitably and necessarily, its economy depends on financial support from Britain of between £6 million and £8 million a year. That is a large sum and the Government naturally want to restrain it. However, I shall show that Government policy militates against success in that respect.

Government policy is to persuade the islanders to move towards standing on their own feet. The unhealthy 75 per cent. of jobs in Government employment is being reduced. That is all very well, but as there are only a small number of private sector jobs on the island, the policy has pushed up unemployment to 17 per cent. The Government have responded by advocating self-help, but that is where the British Government have to open doors to enable it to become a realistic opportunity.

There are several matters on which the Government should act. The first is employment opportunities. I know that I am not the only hon. Member who did not realise when we passed the British Nationality Act 1981 that we were closing off the route for St. Helenians to come to work in the UK. I recognise that this is not the appropriate time to press for St. Helena to join Gibraltar and the Falklands in having a general right to seek employment in UK. That should not be done until the Hong Kong issue is out of the way. I should be surprised if the Minister and candidates of all parties at the general election were not approached by Saints in their prospective constituencies and asked for a commitment on that after the election and after the Hong Kong problem is out of the way.

Meanwhile, there are three steps that the Government could take without creating a precedent or other problems, and I urge them on the Minister. First, we could restore the pre-1994 domestic work scheme, under which some 50 permits for Saints to work in the United Kingdom were issued. Secondly, that scheme was replaced by a training and work experience scheme, but it ends at age 35. It would be practical and useful to extend it to 40 or 45. That scheme provides only temporary access to the United Kingdom and only 30 people in St. Helena are currently able to take it up. Making it easier should increase numbers and help tackle unemployment on the island.

Thirdly, general work permits for entry to the United Kingdom from anywhere in the world are issued in respect of specialist skills not available in the UK. Only one Saint has been able to qualify under that scheme. The Government should relax the severe criteria to enable more Saints to qualify and should perhaps place a limit on the number of years that someone can be here—say, seven years. So my first message to my hon. Friend the Minister is that self-help needs opportunity. I urge him to create that opportunity, in a way that will cost him no money and which will help the economy of the island and perhaps make it possible in a minor way to reduce the Government's commitment.

Tourism is a swift route to job creation in any economy, but its development requires an improvement in communications. The only regular access on and off the island is RMS St. Helena. I praise the recent change in its sailing schedules. It now operates more frequently to Cape Town and Ascension island and less frequently on the long, slow journey to the United Kingdom. If tourism is to prosper, we need quicker and easier access from Europe. There is a way in which that can be achieved. The Royal Air Force currently provides a military service to Ascension island as a staging post on the way to the Falklands. We need the Government to put the service personnel flights out to commercial tender and allow tourists to be carried as far as Ascension, with its superb, untarnished beaches. That would reduce from 15 days to four the travel time from Europe to St. Helena and give a tremendous boost to the tourist trade. Self-help needs that opportunity.

As commercial flights to Ascension island are clearly the key, I recently raised the possibility with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. He noted what I said and agreed to come back to me in due course. I look forward, as I am sure many on the island do, to hearing what he can say on that score.

So far, so good, but I have to say that the islanders must be encouraged to create the accommodation and services on the island that modern-day tourists expect. In the past, there has been far too much licensing and far too many restrictions—undoubtedly designed to protect the fragile market of existing providers—but the island needs to be more open and welcoming to competition, which is, after all, the customer's best friend and the best way to raise the standard of tourist facilities.

Before I leave tourism, I have to say that it is not helped when cruise liners visit the island and are unable to land their passengers because there is no mole or decent-sized jetty. Last year, five major tourist vessels were unable to land a single passenger. Indeed, a cruise ship called earlier this month and could not land tourists. That represented a serious loss of potential revenue to the island. So if self-help is to succeed for tourism and local industry, the Government must put in that essential piece of infrastructure.

I illustrate the point in relation to the local tuna fishing industry. The island's boats and its fishing industry have been held back by strict quotas—my hon. Friend the Minister will know about this. The limits are not for conservation reasons, as one might have thought, but are because of the lack of processing capacity for fish when it has been landed. Happily, as a result of the help and encouragement of my hon. Friend the Minister, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the island's Government, Argus Helena Ltd. will open a new processing plant, probably in September this year, and the restrictions will then go. It will then be possible for St. Helenians themselves to build up their fishing industry. However, once the tuna has been landed, gutted and frozen, it needs safe anchorage for dispatch to markets in Japan and Italy. I praise the FCO and the Government for the encouragement that they have given, but a quay, jetty or protective mole is needed. Self-help needs a bit of investment.

I have a question for my hon. Friend the Minister about an inward investment proposal, which would provide some 50 jobs. It has already been referred to by the hon. Member for Wrexham, who, like me, no doubt received a fax from a Swedish company, Swegame, which wants to set up an international lottery, using the world wide web and the Internet. The Internet is spreading like wildfire, as my hon. Friend the Minister will know. It is an immense growth industry. An international lottery on the Internet can expect explosive growth. I understand that the Government are minded to refuse consent. I have also received the fax that the hon. Member for Wrexham received, signed by 21 Members of LegCo. I will not quote it because the hon. Gentleman has done so already. My hon. Friend the Minister should explain the Government's attitude and assure us that he will take into account the views of LegCo. If something is a legal and proper international operation—whatever his reservations, I should like to hear them—and if Gibraltar is allowed to have such an operation and there is nothing to stop it there, why should not St. Helenians be allowed to do so?

I sum up by saying that St. Helena is a responsibility of the House. The Government are right to move the economy of the island to self-help, but if that is to succeed, there must be opportunity. Opportunity requires, first, more access to the United Kingdom for employment, secondly a jetty, mole or quay for safe landing and unloading and, thirdly, the relaxation of restrictions on tourist flights to Ascension island and thence on to St. Helena. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to give assurances on all those points.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): I shall follow up some of the points that the hon. Member for North–West Hampshire (Sir D. Mitchell) made, in a constructive speech. It was a pleasure to listen to the speech of the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson). I congratulate him, as others have done, on raising the situation in St. Helena. His descriptions were as fascinating as his arguments were persuasive. Unlike him, I have not visited the island—the isolation and the time required have prevented me—but I have visited the Falkland Islands. As a result, and because I have been for a long time associated with the Falkland Isles parliamentary group, I have gained a reasonable amount of knowledge over the years of the islands of the south Atlantic. My noble Friend Lord Beaumont has told me about the visit which the hon. Gentleman described. I should like to make only a short speech, so I will follow the structure that the hon. Member for Sevenoaks chose.

We have had a pretty bad record in recent years on the citizenship question. Several hon. Members have referred to Hong Kong. The treatment there of the ethnic minority is potentially a scandal. With respect to the hon. Member for North–West Hampshire, I do not see why St. Helena has to be put in a box until Hong Kong is sorted out. We are talking about fewer than 6,000 people, not a great flood of immigrants. As the hon. Member for Sevenoaks said, those people had British citizenship until 1981 and know of no other loyalty. I should have thought that we had a responsibility to them.

As for communications, I am sure that the hon. Member for Sevenoaks is right about the airstrip. Several hon. Members and my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) said that it was possible. I should like to know how much it would cost, if the Minister is able to say roughly.

Sir David Mitchell: I know that time is short, but there is a problem. If some potential tourist traffic is creamed off on to air landing, the viability of RMS St. Helena will be reduced and the demand for subsidy of its operation will be increased.

Sir Russell Johnston: That is a fair point. Of course, if resources are limited and the number of people using the transport mode is limited, one may have to decide between one and the other. I agree with the hon. Gentleman. Certainly, everyone seems to be saying that the improvement of landing facilities is of pre-eminent importance. It was bad to hear the hon. Member for North–West Hampshire say that five cruise ships visited the island and had to go away without landing one tourist. That must have represented a large loss of potential income.

On the Government's commitment and the constitution, the hon. Member for North–West Hampshire was talking about self-help and saying that the Government should do this and that, but it is difficult for Governments who are pledged, as an article of faith, to non-intervention where possible to be terribly good at self-starting all those things.

We are talking about regional development on an island in the south Atlantic. Everyone has been careful to say that they know that Overseas Development Administration officials are well intentioned and so forth.

There has been a "but" at the end of the sentence, however. I suppose it comes back to the fact that unless one motivates people to motivate themselves one will not succeed through some sort of paternalistic activity, as the hon. Member for North–West Hampshire said.

I want the Minister briefly to say something about medical services. I presume that any airstrip would have short lift-off capacity. I do not know what the hospital facilities are. If someone is in a severe medical condition on St. Helena, what does one do?

Courtesy of the questions asked by the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) in March, I have been thinking about education. The information in the answers to the questions is pretty awful. The hon. Gentleman asked:

"how many (a) female and (b) males normally resident in St. Helena had commenced higher education courses (i) on the island and (ii) overseas".—[Official Report, 25 March 1996; Vol. 274, c. 417.]

A list was provided in the answer. Last year, out of the population of just under 6,000—that would perhaps mean 1,500 to 2,000 young people—there were two males and five females. In 1994-95, the previous year, it was one male and nine females. If the community is not educated—through no fault of its own—it will not be a progressive community and that is the plain fact of the matter.

Most things have been said about development. Unemployment of 18 per cent. in a small community is obviously bad and there is a concentration on tourism and fishing. Obviously, St. Helena is a fascinating place and it attracts spasmodic attention because of it. Books on Napoleon are produced every so often, for instance. However, we have a debt to the place and we have a responsibility that we are not fulfilling as we should.

As I have said before—no one agrees, but I will say it again—I have long admired the French system of dealing with their remaining dependent territories. St. Pierre and Miquelon, the two islands off the Canadian coast, are not as isolated as St. Helena, but they have a smaller population—2,500 to 3,000, I think—and they are well treated and backed by the French, as are Martinique, Guadeloupe and all the other French territories. Through France, they also have access to European Union funding. That is a good solution for our remaining dependent territories and not one that should be dismissed simply by saying, "We do not do that—the French do."

I found the speech of the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) very concerning, not least because, as anyone who knows him realises, he is not given to sensation and exaggeration. He said,

"Something is not right on the island."

Sadly, that seems to be true. I hope that when the Minister replies, he will at least tell us that the Government are aware of those shortcomings and of the needs and will respond.

Again, I congratulate the hon. Member for Sevenoaks, who has been the means of our having an interesting morning's debate.

12.4 pm

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): On these occasions, it is customary to pay tribute to the initiator of the debate and I do so with more sincerity than usual this morning, as the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson) has done some service to the people of St. Helena and to the House by raising this matter.

To pick up on the remarks of the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston), there can be no doubt that our commitment—whether that of this Government or of a future Labour Government—to the island and its dependent territories is legal and historical, but it is also a moral commitment and we cannot avoid that. The question, therefore, is how we discharge that commitment, rather than whether it exists; I think that all hon. Members would take that view.

I must own up to my relative ignorance about St. Helena. Possibly the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber, the Minister and I are the only ones present who have not had detailed exposure to the islands and their people. I must thank my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke), who attended the recent Commonwealth Parliamentary Association visit and took the trouble to tell me of his observations and to pass on those of the hon. Member for Sevenoaks, whose written comments and his speech this morning were interesting and important.

I do not want to make a partisan or party-political point, but some of the responses of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office when island issues have been raised have smacked of complacency. That might be an unfair charge, but I wanted to put it on the record and the Minister can deal with it in whatever way he chooses.

An article on St. Helena appeared in The Sunday Telegraph after the invasion of the governor's office and the assault, albeit a minor assault, upon his person. The issue is serious and the Minister's answer in Hansard tended to play it down considerably, playing down the underlying and clear unhappiness of the people on the island. In the article, the governor is quoted as saying that although "dumbstruck" by the events he also found them understandable. He said:

"The islanders are fearful of their future. They worry about what will happen to them—and their anger was taken out not at me personally but at the institution I represent."

The House and the Government have to accept that collectively we are the institution against which that anger was vented. That is important. We have to take seriously the uncertainties and fears of people on the islands.

To an extent I am repeating remarks that have already been made this morning, but if we recognise that two thirds of the jobs on the island depend directly on British Government subvention—the hon. Member for North–West Hampshire (Sir D. Mitchell) said that it was 75 per cent., I think—that the direct bilateral aid budget is more than £8 million but was £11.7 million at the beginning of the decade and that that decrease has paralleled an increase in unemployment from a little under 8 per cent. to the present 17.5 per cent., we must also accept that the worries and fears of the islanders are legitimate. While we are not talking of a third world economy, nevertheless it is not an economy in which people are individually or collectively well off.

While I took considerable comfort in the comments about the progress of the fishing industry, which is clearly to be welcomed, that industry is a relatively modest employer. Even if we envisage great change, it will probably still remain a modest employer for some time to come. The hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) asked a question about the number of businesses since 1984 that had taken advantage of the taxation breaks available on the island. The answer shows that in the two years for which figures are available, one cabinet maker and one coffee producer had done so. Business formation at that rate will not resolve the problems.

That brings us to the issue of what the islanders want, what the ODA wants, and what the Foreign Office wants. We recognise that economic development will depend on significant input from Britain—however we engage the private sector, the commitment of the public sector will be needed. Will the Minister comment on the strategic review and the country policy plan which either has arrived or is due arrive on his desk this month? We need to know what are the implications for bilateral aid. The need for consistency of aid has already been emphasised; people need an element of certainty in order to operate successfully. That is a legitimate demand, to which I add my voice.

Will the Minister comment on what is known about likely future flows of inward investment? It is clear that inward investment of some sort will be needed—whatever self-help can do, there is neither the level of capital nor the potential for formation of capital on the island to make the necessary investment without outside intervention. What estimates have been made of the potential for investment? In addition, will the Minister comment on what assessment has been made of the viability and growth of traditional industries such as fishing, which has already been mentioned, agriculture and forestry? They have some potential, but one would not want to overestimate their likely impact.

The industry that all hon. Members who have spoken today have mentioned is tourism. When I returned from the Falklands recently and passed through Ascension island, I was lobbied during my brief sojourn on the issue of tourism and on the need to examine both the viability of tourism on Ascension in the interests of Saints who have given many years of service to Britain and to the British Crown, and the possibility of having a two-centre approach. The hon. Member for Sevenoaks mentioned that his report to the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association referred to the opportunity to link the futures of Ascension and St. Helena in a little tourism matrix, as a unique niche form of tourism.

That would depend on transportation links and hon. Members have said that there is a trade-off to be made between the potential arising from air links being opened up and the impact—possibly damaging—on the existing sea route. There must be a strong case—indeed, the Minister may confirm that it is already being done—for carrying out a serious feasibility study into the linkage between the different transportation systems and the development of a tourism industry that could allow the islanders, in a guided way, to exploit the island's resources.

I want to pick up one of the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for North–West Hampshire. It seems ridiculous that, not only potential, but real demand for tourism is being turned away because of the lack of facilities that would probably require only a relatively modest investment. I urge the Minister to take that matter seriously as part of his consideration of developments that could be achieved in the short term.

In my remarks on the economy of the island, I hope that I have demonstrated that the commitment of any Government of this country to the island must be genuine.

I shall now return to the four Cs raised by the hon. Member for Sevenoaks. I have already touched on communication in my comments on transportation links, but there is another aspect to that. I am aware that the island currently receives Cable News Network, courtesy of Cable and Wireless. It might be out of the question, but in view of my personal enthusiasm for the service I want to ask the Minister about the role of the BBC World Service, both radio and television. St. Helena is not only an English-speaking community, but a British community. From my visits to South America, I know of the demand that Britain should have a presence there and that BBC television should be made available. I should have thought that the possibility of extending the BBC service to St. Helena at reasonable cost to the islanders should at least be considered.

All that I can say in respect of citizenship is that I recognise that from the bishops commission—now the citizenship commission—onward there have been demands for citizenship and that will continue. There is no easy answer that I can offer on behalf of a future Labour Government and I shall not pretend otherwise, because that would be dishonest. I shall listen with interest to the Minister's comments.

On the issue of constitutional arrangements, I was concerned by the comments of the hon. Member for Sevenoaks on the legal framework—whether it was adequate and whether it could change quickly enough to respond to the needs of the islanders. That might have an impact on constitutional matters, for example, whether the constitutional settlement is such that the pace of legal change can be rapid enough to respond to the need to welcome business investment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) has a detailed knowledge of these matters and I was interested in his remarks about the case of the school teacher. I accept and understand the Minister's explanation, but hon. Members must ask themselves whether issues should have to be raised with a Minister in Britain when they might be resolvable at local level. I am sure that the case raised by my hon. Friend would have been resolved in everybody's interests at local level had the local authorities had the necessary powers. That case calls into question whether the current constitutional settlement is one that we would want to promote in the modern world.

We are not talking about a colonial regime of times gone by, but about people who should be given the maximum encouragement to help themselves. That self-help should extend not only to economic matters, but to issues such as local control and self-government where that is appropriate. I ask the Minister to tell us about the various constitutional reviews that have taken place, including the CPA review, and where they fit into the framework. I urge him to consider carefully whether the time has now come for a proper examination of the island's legal capacity and of the potential for local control.

This has been an important debate, because it forces hon. Members—especially me in my capacity as a Labour party spokesmen and as an individual Member of Parliament—to recognise that issues of concern are outstanding and that they are the responsibility of the House of Commons. We cannot duck that responsibility. The relationship between St. Helena and Britain cannot and will not be dissolved—our commitment exists and we have to examine how we can honour that commitment as we move into the 21st century.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Sir Nicholas Bonsor): I add my thanks to those already expressed to my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson) for raising this issue. I welcome the opportunity to set out the Government's position, to explain some of the issues raised by hon. Members today and to state clearly the way in which we propose to deal with the problems in St. Helena.

I agree with my hon. Friend that the state of St. Helena's economy is precarious and that it requires our closest attention. I assure the House that it is getting that attention. The diplomatic and aid wings of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office are keenly focused on the need for positive and real change. I assure the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) that there is no question of complacency on the part of the Government—we are addressing these important issues vigorously.

Everyone who has the welfare of St. Helena at heart agrees that the status quo is not an option. The problem, as we have known for some time, is that economic and social pressures, when allied to aid dependency, can only lead to a downward spiral of economic stagnation. As with all the remaining dependent territories, we care very much about the welfare of St. Helenians and share wholeheartedly their desire for a better and more prosperous future. Our task, along with that of the St. Helena Government, is to shape that desire and turn it into reality.

Our continuing commitment to the island is evidenced by our aid support, which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks and others mentioned, is more than £8 million a year. That equates to some £1,500 per head of population and is the highest per capita package of UK aid in the world. It is testimony to the seriousness with which the Government take their responsibilities towards the island and shows the importance that we attach to it.

However, we and the "Saints" themselves want to see a reduced dependency on aid, not only because of the burden on the UK taxpayer under the present circumstances, but because we want a self-sufficient, confident and economically viable St. Helena. Neither we nor the Saints want the island held back by financial dependence on the United Kingdom. We want the island to develop. We are committed to a process of change. To paraphrase the St. Helena Government's stated vision for the future, we want economic development to lead to a prosperous future for the island.

Private sector development and public sector reform are the keys to the island's future. To begin that process, we are negotiating an important three-year country policy plan with the St. Helena Government. The basis for the agreement was the St. Helena Government's strategic review, which was completed last year. The document results from a great deal of hard work by the St. Helena Government and the governor, and we congratulate the team on its efforts. The strategic review provides a comprehensive approach to St. Helena's economic and social development.

The country policy plan will set out action plans for each sector. A specific plan will encourage inward investment and private sector development. We shall help with this in every way we can. The plan will also highlight how the Government can either transfer activity to the private sector or deliver services more efficiently through the public sector.

There has been a degree of concern on the island about the Government's public sector reform programme and its social consequences and that has led to some of the matters that have been mentioned, particularly by the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek). I appreciate that there have been difficulties between the governor and some of the inhabitants of St. Helena, and I have no doubt that the governor is trying hard to deal with the exceptionally difficult circumstances which the state of the economy in St. Helena has imposed on him. It is not easy for reform programmes to be put in place without a certain amount of short-term hardship and discontent, but I hope that those circumstances can be resolved and that, as the policy plan is put into effect, we shall improve St. Helena's economy and get over the problems that have been mentioned in the House today.

For our part, the plan would commit the ODA to a substantial aid package spread over the next three years, which would give the St. Helena Government more responsibility for their own affairs. They could divert savings from within the budgetary aid element of that framework to other priority areas of Government expenditure. Thus, they would maintain firm control on their own expenditure programme and be able to prioritise accordingly in a way which hitherto they have been unable to do. I hope that that will reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks, who raised the question of the inability of the St. Helena Government, particularly LegCo and ExCo, to play a full part in handling the economy. As we move forward with our plan, those difficulties will be resolved.

St. Helena's isolation proved useful in Napoleonic times and at other times in the past, but in today's world it is a major drawback. It is approximately 1,200 miles from the nearest continental land mass and it takes five days by ship to Cape Town. Physical isolation means that the cost of St. Helena's products when they are exported are high, which is obviously a substantial brake on the island's potential for economic development of the export market. Isolation also deters potential investors from spending their valuable time getting to and from the island to explore ideas for development. We need to find ways around this. I accept the points made today about the need to develop a wharf and to examine air services and I assure the House that the Government are looking closely at those issues.

The RMS St. Helena provides a vital link between the island and the outside world. It is a modern, well equipped ship funded by the ODA and it serves St. Helena and her people well, and long may she continue to do so. As the hon. Member for Stretford said, neither he nor I have had an opportunity of getting to St. Helena, unfortunately. I believe that those who have travelled on RMS St. Helena have found her comfortable and have been extremely well looked after. She should be an asset not only as a means of communication for Saints but to encourage tourism, and I hope that many more people will use the opportunity. As the House knows, we have altered the ship's schedule so that long-haul journeys have been reduced and short-haul local journeys increased. I hope that that will enhance both those opportunities. We shall continue to seek the best balance in the schedule between the island's transport needs and the need to make the ship commercially viable.

Several hon. Members touched on the possibility of providing an airport on the island. We continue to keep that under review, but I shall not hide from the House the fact that such a project would be extremely expensive and currently difficult to justify. One problem would be to find a commercial air service able to run a viable route to the island. Another problem is the enormous expense of building a modern airport that conforms with Civil Aviation Authority rules. The distance from Cape Town means that we would need fairly large long-haul aircraft to make the journey. Moreover, the difficulties of providing an airport on St. Helena are great but we are looking at that problem and I hope that we can find ways around it in due course.

Inward investment is absolutely vital if the island is to prosper. It will breathe new life into the economy. The current cash flow is tiny and the existing private sector is saturated with small service industries. We need new productive investment, encouraged by the St. Helena Development Agency. We also plan a new business forum in London whereby we hope to encourage investment and focus the attention of people in this country on the opportunities that St. Helena offers.

As has already been said, the fishing company, Argos, is leading the way and I welcome the investment that it has put into the island. It is extremely good news as it will create some 40 jobs, which represents about 10 per cent. of the island's unemployment rate. It is worth noting that we do not need extensive investment to deal with the unemployment problem. About 450 people, representing 18 per cent. of the island's work force, are involved. That should not present insuperable problems so long as we and the St. Helena Government work together, as we shall.

Unfortunately, I have very little time with which to deal with the many points that have been raised, so I intend to take some of the more important ones. I mentioned the difficulties that the governor has had on the island. I assure the hon. Member for Wrexham that the ODA consults strongly with the island. Of course, the islanders are sometimes disappointed that the ODA does not accept their plans but the reason is that the ODA does not think that those plans are viable, and the islanders' well-being is the primary reason for any decision that has been made.

I take the opportunity, while touching on inward investment, to commend the work of Mrs. Essex, who is listening to this debate today. She will return to the island in May and has done a phenomenally good job as its representative in this country. I wish her well and hope that her labours will bear fruit.

Hon. Members mentioned constitutional change. There again, we now have the CPA plan at which the St. Helena Government are looking closely. Her Majesty's Government will look with great sympathy at any proposals put by the islanders for constitutional change. It is in our interests as well as those of the islanders that those matters should be satisfactorily sorted out so that the balance of responsibility reflects the reality of the day.

My hon. Friend the Member for North–West Hampshire (Sir D. Mitchell) raised a series of important points. He asked about the training and work experience scheme in this country. I assure him that the scheme is unlimited in terms of the numbers which we would take and it therefore offers great opportunities to St. Helenians to get the necessary work opportunity to stimulate investment so that their expertise can be used on the island.

Sir David Mitchell: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: No, I do not have time.

I accept my hon. Friend's point about the age limit of 35. My officials are looking into that and I hope that we shall find ways to raise it. I accept that it would be useful if slightly older people could be included in the scheme.

With regard to the wharf, detailed proposals are being put forward to build a breakwater and to improve the anchorage at St. Helena so that we can get the tourists in on the cruise ships and make sure that ships can be loaded and unloaded, whatever the weather.

Finally, on Swegame, we are not prepared to allow an Internet lottery. It takes place on Gibraltar without the consent of the Government or the Governor of Gibraltar. We are investigating how that happened. We cannot yet resolve the difficulty of regulating an Internet lottery, but we hope to do so in the future.

House Condition Survey (Energy Reports)

12.30 pm

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Last week the Birmingham Evening Mail published a letter from Mr. Thornton of Weoley Castle, who is a war veteran in his seventies. He stated:

"At the time of writing, the temperature in the kitchen is 42 deg F"—

that is about 5.5 deg C—

"and in the bedroom it is 34 deg F"—

about 1 deg C above freezing.

As the Minister knows, such conditions do not meet even the minimum Government standards for safeguarding health. Sadly, Mr. Thornton's conditions are not an isolated case, as is amply demonstrated by the house condition survey report. I commend the Government for commissioning the detailed work in that hefty document. It has been a long time coming—the survey took place in 1991-92. Although the report states that there has been little change in the situation since then, a new survey is to be undertaken.

It has taken several years for the report to be published. Its publication was originally planned for the summer. I do not know why it was not ready then; the Government were probably aiming for it to be published in the recess. In the event, it was published two days after the Budget and, unfortunately, received little publicity. No one seems to have seen the Department of the Environment press release on the subject. I am pleased that this Adjournment debate allows me to give the Government the opportunity to discuss such an important report.

In 1983, the Conservatives promised to make Britain the best housed nation in Europe. The contents of the survey show how badly they have failed in that aim. The report is an indictment of almost 20 years of Conservative government. It shows that one in five dwellings in the social housing sector, two in five in the private rented sector, and even one in 10 in the owner-occupied sector have energy ratings that show them to be grossly inefficient. On the Government's standard assessment procedure scale, which goes from one to 100—100 being the most energy efficient—those are the proportions of types of homes that are less than 20 per cent. energy efficient. Although I gave the proportion of only one in 10 homes in the owner-occupied sector, that represents 1.3 million dwellings, which is the largest number of dwellings in any sector that are grossly inefficient.

The report states that when the temperature is 4 deg C, which is above the temperature that triggers cold weather payments to people on low incomes, 50 per cent. of owner-occupied housing, 62 per cent. of council and social housing in the housing association sector and 95 per cent. of private rented housing fails to achieve even the minimum standards to safeguard health as laid down by the Government. More than one in three households would need to spend more than 10 per cent. of their income on fuel to achieve the more comfortable standard heating regime. By that standard, more than 60 per cent. of lone pensioners underspend on heating. No wonder in the first two weeks of this year the Government's Office for National Statistics reported 10,000 excess deaths. Mr. Thornton is, indeed, not an isolated case.

The report states that, despite the mild weather in 1991-92, only 25 per cent. of the homes surveyed fully met the standard regime for temperature, and only 70 per cent. conformed with the minimum regime. It is reckoned that, to achieve the 30 per cent. energy efficiency savings laid down in the Home Energy Conservation Act 1995, expenditure of £80 billion will be required. The Government have accepted that target.

The Department of the Environment circular on the 1995 Act issued in early 1996 states that the Secretary of State takes the view that improving the energy efficiency of residential accommodation is important because of the environmental impact of energy use in the domestic sector—estimated to be responsible for more than 25 per cent. of emissions of the main greenhouse gas, carbon dioxide—and because of the desirability of ensuring that every household has access to affordable warmth. I am sure that all hon. Members support that aim, but the report shows how far we are from achieving it.

The guidance notes go on to say that the Secretary of State takes the view that an overall improvement in energy efficiency of 30 per cent. in residential accommodation covered by the Act in England alone is to be regarded as significant, and gives advice accordingly.

The report states that £25 billion to £80 billion is needed to meet that target. It also states that one in five homes cannot be improved to current building regulation standards, and recommends that they should be replaced with new homes. That would mean a massive increase in the house-building programme, in line with the building programme that occurred after the war.

I am sure that the Minister will say that the report tells us that most households are satisfied with their heating systems—only 13 per cent. are not. It is difficult to square that with the objective findings that show the appalling state of our housing stock in terms of energy efficiency.

In case study 4, which deals with a family of owner-occupiers who bought their low-rise flat from the local authority, the family stated in the questionnaire that they were fairly satisfied with their heating system, which was a rather old central heating system. The report notes, however, that at the start of the interview the family voluntarily identified heating as something that they were unhappy about. There seems to be a problem with the collection of the statistics. Nevertheless, I congratulate the Government on the report, which shows how much work needs to be done to bring our housing stock up to scratch.

What have the Government done to bring about such a sorry state of affairs? When I first became involved in politics as a councillor in Birmingham, we had a housing investment programme of £75 million a year. I have checked with Birmingham council, and the housing investment programme allocation for next year is £28 million. One must take into account the difference in prices between the 1979-80 figure of £75 million and the 1997 figure of £28 million, which demonstrates the enormous reduction in investment not just in the council housing sector but in housing associations.

In its 1992 election manifesto, the Conservative party claimed that it was spending £2 billion a year on the housing association sector. That expenditure was reduced to about £650 million in this year's Budget—a massive cut that exemplifies the Government's failure to honour their pledge to the country in 1992. It is just another in a series of broken Tory promises.

Reduced investment leads to all sorts of misery. I know from my surgeries the appalling conditions in which many of my constituents are living. Only 5 per cent. of council-owned stock in Birmingham has energy ratings that meet current building regulation standards of 70 per cent. energy efficiency. Some 15,000 homes are below the national average of 35 per cent. energy efficiency—which is itself too low and needs attention. It is reckoned that it will cost £1.3 billion to raise council housing in Birmingham to modern standards—and, as I have said, the council's housing investment allocation this year is only £28 million. That illustrates the Government's sorry record in this area, particularly their failure to honour their manifesto commitments.

The Government's energy efficiency programme also comprises the home energy efficiency scheme. The Chancellor increased spending on the scheme to £100 million in his 1994 Budget Statement—a mere drop in the ocean in view of the scale of the problem. However, the Government could not maintain even that level of spending and, despite promises from the Chancellor and two other Ministers to maintain it for three years, in November 1995 it was cut to £75 million. That caused many redundancies in firms operating home energy efficiency programmes. Expenditure has not increased this year, and remains at £75 million. We should contrast that figure with the £60 million in assistance provided to those on low incomes through the cold weather payments scheme.

We must invest in our housing stock. There are many ways to do it, but the Government are failing in that task. Although £80 billion sounds like a lot of money, the same sort of sum was spent on Trident. We cannot bring that money back, but it would be good if, as we approach the 21st century, the Government—hopefully, there will be a new Government after the election—would give a commitment to tackle the problem and make Britain the best housed nation in Europe. It is not an insuperable problem: it could be done. The Government recently announced their intention to spend £15 billion on the Eurofighter aircraft. Those aircraft were conceived during the cold war and are now unnecessary. That money could be used to improve the energy efficiency of our housing stock, which would have a favourable impact on global warming and do more to ensure global stability than military spending of that nature. Perhaps that funding could be targeted.

I am pleased that my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor has committed the next Labour Government—who I am sure will soon be in office—to a programme of energy efficiency funded by the windfall levy on public utilities. It is most appropriate to spend the excess profits of the gas and electricity industries on a programme to improve energy efficiency, reduce fuel consumption and make people more comfortable.

The debate gives the Government an opportunity to announce their plans for the future. They have failed to tackle the housing problem in their 18 years in office—I wonder what commitments they will make in their next manifesto. The Government must pull their socks up if they are to perform at a level anything like that needed to make Britain the best housed country in Europe—an aim that we must all share as we approach the millennium.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. James Clappison): I welcome this opportunity to debate the important subject of home energy efficiency. It will probably be no surprise to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) to learn that I do not agree with the conclusions that she has drawn from our report. I do not believe that any objective interpretation of that report supports her conclusions. Nevertheless, I welcome the opportunity to debate its important findings.

In the words of the hon. Lady, this is a very hefty report. It is the most comprehensive and detailed review of the energy efficiency of the housing stock yet published, and it represents a very careful analysis by the Building Research Establishment of a formidable body of survey data. As the hon. Lady said, we published the report in November last year. I assure her that there was no delay in releasing the information, and results were published as they became available. Early findings were published in the main report of the English house condition survey 1993 and further results were published in 1995 in the Department of the Environment's guide on energy efficiency in council housing.

The hon. Lady selected some figures from the report and placed her own interpretation on them. I do not deny that some households have faced difficulties, especially during the extremely cold weather that we have experienced in the past few weeks, but her selective use of the report's evidence fails to do justice to the subject and does not put the figures into proper perspective.

The starting point for the debate should be the fact that this country's housing stock is relatively old. That brings some advantages: many people value the style, space and arrangement of older houses, but they were constructed when fuel was cheap and when the technology of energy conservation was not well developed. The price we pay is a housing stock that is energy inefficient but which can be—and, crucially, is being—improved. Although the houses are technically inefficient, the survey shows clearly that the great majority of households—some 87 per cent.—are satisfied with their heating. Although we know that elderly householders face particular difficulties, the survey shows that more than 90 per cent. of householders over 60 years of age are satisfied with their heating.

I am especially encouraged by the fact that the figures have improved continually. A similar survey carried out in 1986 found that only 80 per cent. of householders were satisfied with their heating. That is some measure of the improvements that have been made since then. Successive reports of the English house condition survey have shown that great strides have been made in home heating standards in recent years. In 1971, only one in three homes had central heating. By 1991, the proportion of homes with central heating had risen to more than four in five and ownership of homes with central heating continues to grow.

Moreover, in 1971, nearly one in four households still heated their homes with coal fires. By 1991, that proportion had dropped to fewer than one in 15. Nearly 80 per cent. of households now enjoy the convenience and increased efficiency of gas-fired heating. Similarly, the standard of insulation has improved dramatically in the past 20 years. The number of homes with insulated lofts has more than doubled from 42 per cent. to 90 per cent. The percentage with insulated cavity walls has increased tenfold in the same period and the proportion of homes with double-glazed windows has increased sevenfold.

Most households have derived the benefits of those improvements in increased comfort and, as a result of those improvements and the increasing use of domestic appliances, energy consumption has remained at broadly the same level. Without those improvements in insulation and in the efficiency of heating and other appliances, it is estimated that fuel consumption could have risen by 50 per cent. The switch from coal to gas has produced a significant reduction in carbon dioxide emissions and made a contribution to the substantial progress that we have achieved in meeting our climate change commitments under the climate change convention.

Our homes are generally much warmer than they were 20 years ago. That has direct benefits in comfort and health. Although housing conditions are not the sole cause of excess winter deaths, the fact remains that the number of such deaths has halved since the early 1970s. It is not unreasonable to assume that that is in part a reflection of improvements in the way in which homes are heated. Nevertheless, we recognise that while homes remain energy inefficient, some households will continue to face particular difficulties. That is why cold weather payments are made available to those who are most vulnerable in periods of cold weather. So far this winter, more than 5 million payments have been made, totalling £43 million.

We fully accept, as the report shows, that there remains a good deal to be done. The Government are pledged further to improve energy efficiency as part of our commitment to sustainable developments and to containing United Kingdom carbon dioxide emissions, taking into account resource and economic considerations.

The domestic sector is responsible for nearly 30 per cent. of carbon dioxide emissions. We have taken many initiatives to improve the energy efficiency of domestic dwellings. With the aim of increasing the energy efficiency of new housing and reducing carbon dioxide emissions, the Government amended part L of the building regulations dealing with the conservation of fuel and power in 1990, and again in 1994. The 1994 amendment extended the provision for energy conservation to the conversion of existing buildings. New homes are now highly energy efficient.

As the energy report shows, however, there are many vulnerable households living in older property that find it difficult to heat their homes adequately. The largest single programme in the Government's energy efficiency programme is targeted on those households. The home energy efficiency scheme provides grants for basic home insulation and advice for householders who receive an income-related benefit, a disability allowance or who are aged 60 or over. The budget is about £73 million in 1996-97, equivalent to about 400,000 grants.

Dr. Lynne Jones: Will the Minister explain why the Government did not honour their commitment to spend £100 million for three years after 1994-95?

Mr. Clappison: As the hon. Lady may know, that is linked to changes in the application of value added tax on domestic fuel. We have maintained our commitment to a substantial programme to help the households that I have described with home energy efficiency. The hon. Lady will be pleased to know that we have recently announced a 3 per cent. increase in the budget for 1997-98, to take spending up to £75 million.

The scheme is popular and well regarded, and has already helped more than 2 million households—10 per cent. of the stock—since it was set up in its present form in 1991. That represents 2 million low-income and disabled households which have been able significantly to increase their comfort levels and keep themselves warm. The environmental benefits of the scheme are, rightly, secondary to its social benefits. Even so, they are not negligible, as the measures are long lasting and will, over time, contribute significantly to reduced carbon dioxide emissions.

My hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for energy efficiency recently announced significant changes to the home energy efficiency scheme to make it even better. From later this year we shall be introducing new measures, such as cavity wall insulation and heating control upgrades, in addition to the basic measures of loft insulation, draught proofing and pipe and tank lagging.

Home energy efficiency schemes will continue to provide a high-quality programme of improvements to the housing stock. In recent years, the scheme has been supported by other programmes of improvements, especially those promoted by the Energy Saving Trust in partnership with the electricity regulator and the regional electricity companies under the general title of standards of performance. We have recently announced further Government support for the Energy Saving Trust. About £71.5 million will be available to the trust from 1996 to the year 2000 to promote the efficient use of energy, an increase of £21.5 million on previous public expenditure plans for the years 1996 to 1999.

The Government have fully recognised the role that local authorities can play. Under the Home Energy Conservation Act 1995, which came into force in England in April 1996, local authorities are required to prepare and publish reports on the energy efficiency of all the residential accommodation in their areas. The reports must identify practical and cost-effective measures that will significantly improve the energy efficiency of those dwellings.

The Government have played a full part in ensuring that the aims represented by the Act can be achieved. We have issued guidance, prepared with the full co-operation of local authority associations and other bodies with an interest in energy efficiency, which has stipulated that a "significant improvement" will not be less than 30 per cent. Detailed assistance with the preparation of the report has been provided, including free software to help authorities to assess the housing stock in their areas.

As a further part of the framework supporting implementation of the Act, revised guidance to local authorities on developing and implementing effective energy efficiency strategies for all housing in their areas is in preparation. This will update and supersede the well received guidance that the Department first issued in 1993 on energy efficiency in council housing.

The result of the Home Energy Conservation Act will be a 10 to 15-year programme to bring about a comprehensive improvement to the housing stock. For the first time, statutory authorities have been given a duty to take energy efficiency seriously, and we have made it clear that we expect to see results.

The Act extends local authorities' sphere of influence into the private sector. It recognises the unique position of local authorities to bring a strategic oversight to energy issues. The great majority of homes are in private ownership, and that means that the responsibility for taking necessary action must rest with owner-occupiers and landlords. Local authorities, however, are well placed to encourage that action through information, advice, education and publicity, and the Act lays great emphasis on that. It also provides an opportunity for partnerships with a wide range of other agencies.

In addition to the activities to which I have referred, through the Home Energy Conservation Act, energy efficiency has also been achieved through the new estates renewal challenge fund competition. A total of £174 million was allocated in June 1996 under the first round of the scheme to 11 authorities to facilitate transfers of poor quality local authority housing to registered social landlords. Estates renewal challenge fund money is going towards essential improvements to the stock, which are necessary in many instances to bring homes up to modern standards and to make a transfer viable.

A number of round 1 schemes include measures such as new double glazing, roof insulation and insulation through the cladding of tower blocks. These and other such improvements will greatly improve the energy efficiency of the homes concerned. That will in turn improve the living standards of tenants, save them money in meeting heating bills and assist in making the estates attractive investments for the private sector. These are part of the wide range of activities that we are undertaking. There is also the work that we are doing through private sector renewals and the home improvements agencies, all of which is bearing fruit.

I hope that I have set out the positive measures that we are taking to improve existing stock. As I said at the outset, the starting point for the debate is the fact that much of our housing is relatively elderly.

I listened carefully to the hon. Lady's arguments. By implication—I noted this in passing—there was a strong and pronounced plea from the hon. Lady for additional public spending, including public spending on house building. She referred to the targets that have been set by the shadow Chancellor, but she knows that the activities that are to be funded through moneys raised through the windfall tax do not extend to house building.

Dr. Jones: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Clappison: I shall not give way again.

The hon. Lady should know that we are meeting our target on social housing. It seems that she is making a plea for considerable increases in public spending in that area, as well as a diversion of expenditure from defence. It is not clear whether she wants a diversion of public expenditure or additional expenditure. The hon. Lady is nodding, which leads me to think that she is in favour of additional public expenditure. These are matters of interest. She made the charge that we have not spent sufficiently on social housing. She will know that we have set a target of 60,000 social housing properties below market rent, and we are achieving that without the additional spending and building that she seems to favour, which was a very pronounced feature of her speech. I hope that that fact will not be lost.

We have already achieved a great deal through a range of programmes and public spending and are bringing about a pattern of improvement that is—

Dr. Jones: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): I hope that it is a matter for the Chair.

Dr. Jones: The Minister is attempting to prevent me from making a contribution and from responding—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady knows that that has absolutely nothing to do with the Chair.

Mr. Clappison: I have given way to the hon. Lady once already.

I conclude by saying that we have done a great deal, and the objective interpretation of the report is one of improvements—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must now move to the next debate.

US-UK Air Service Agreement

1 pm

Sir Peter Fry (Wellingborough): I am honoured that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will reply to my humble debate. It shows the significance and importance of the subject that I am raising.

The talks between Her Majesty's Government and the United States Government on changes to the bilateral air agreement between our two countries are of the greatest significance for civil aviation in this country. The move towards an open skies policy between us means not only that a new era has begun but probably that our Government will have to play the highest card left in their hands—control of access to Heathrow airport. Therefore it is surprising that this appears to be the first time that the negotiation has been debated on the Floor of the House, and then, alas, for only half an hour. I know that other hon. Members are anxious to take part.

The inevitable background to the talks and the proposed alliance between British Airways and American Airlines is the proposal that 168 slots at Heathrow will be transferred. This transfer is presumed to quieten concerns over the possible dangers to competition arising from the alliance.

Let me make it clear that I do not in any way endorse the view of the European Commission that the issue is its responsibility. A Commission that has allowed and condoned massive handouts to national airlines in France, Spain, Italy and Greece, to mention just a few, has no right to expect confidence in its ability to enforce fair competition.

In addition, I do not raise the issue to attack British Airways. I am well aware of its great success since privatisation. However, some considerations lead me to ask whether all the facets of the issue are being properly examined.

First, if confirmed by the bilateral talks, is the British Airways-American Airlines deal really in the best interests of the consumer? At the moment, the two airlines have a 100 per cent. monopoly of 13 transatlantic routes, and 80 per cent. of other routes, particularly the important ones—London-New York, London-Boston and London-Chicago.

Many of the slots that are supposed to be released will be only on a temporary lease and will not, in the eyes of many other airlines, really provide powerful enough competition, especially as they would have to be divided between seven competing airlines wanting to run new services from Heathrow, at least two of which are British. Such a monopoly on so many routes is not healthy. As we have seen over the years in Europe, we know to our cost that many fares are still too high. It is clear that at least three carriers are needed on each route to ensure adequate competition.

There is a further concern that British Airways, having given up some slots, could switch the use of other slots that it currently holds. There is a worry in some regions of the country that that could affect regional services, so they will require some guarantee or reassurance on that point.

If the intention is to strengthen competition, how can British Airways suggest that it sells its slots at about £3 million a time? That would amount to approximately £500 million for British Airways. I have never understood how any airline can claim to own something for which it has not paid, and which is of value solely because of Government action, for example licensing services into Heathrow.

As a member of the Select Committee on Transport, I asked the former Secretary of State for Transport, my right hon. and learned Friend who is now Foreign Secretary, what his views were. His response was similar to the remarks that he made to the American Chamber of Commerce on 24 July 1991. He said:

> "No airline has a legal right to a landing or take-off slot. Rather, airlines have permission, and this must be subject to the public interest . . . People, rather than airlines, come first. The government will decide aviation policy on the basis of what is best for the travelling public, and if this conflicts with the interests of any individual airline, the former will take priority."

He concluded by saying:

> "British Airways has benefited over the years from the competition it has received from smaller British airlines. The government will continue to seek to extend the opportunities for all British airlines in Europe, in the United States and right around the world."

Will my right hon. Friend tell the House whether Her Majesty's Government's policy on this point has altered? If so, when and why? If an airline sells only some of its slots and continues to use others, keeping the payments that are made for them, it has extra resources available to fight competitors.

My third question is whether Her Majesty's Government should make an agreement with the United States soley on the basis of the British Airways-American Airlines alliance. Many will argue that there are other considerations, such as the need not just to consider the consumer but to benefit other British airlines that also wish to use Heathrow more—British Midland would like to develop new European routes and says that it needs more slots to do so, and Virgin Atlantic also wishes to increase its intercontinental services—let alone meeting the need to make room for new services from new competitors.

Is there not a danger that if US negotiators feel that our overriding concern is to cement the British Airways-American Airlines deal they will not offer us much else in the negotiations? There are those who fear that a one-sided open skies policy would allow the United States to enjoy extra freedom rights beyond the United Kingdom to Europe and further afield, while British airlines, including British Airways, would gain no greater access to the US domestic market, which is by far the largest in the world with nearly half of all aircraft movements.

The possibility of giving away entry control at Heathrow has led others to ask for more meaningful access in the United States for all UK carriers that want it. The question of cabotage should surely be on the agenda for the intergovernmental talks.

I say to my right hon. Friend that I fully understand why the Government want to help British Airways in its competition with the biggest of the world's airlines, all of which are based in the United States. I suggest to my right hon. Friend that we should never forget that other United Kingdom airlines exist, and they deserve encouragement. I refer to his predecessor's speech from which I quoted.

At this moment we should recall the treatment of Laker Airways, which competitors froze out of the market, and where compensation was paid only long after the airline ceased to fly. I hope that my right hon. Friend will agree that that episode was not the happiest memory in the history of British civil aviation.

My fourth question relates to the ownership of airlines. We know that current United States law forbids foreign ownership or control of a United States airline. That means that, unless the law is changed, British Airways—or any other British airline—can never take over any American airline. Certainly, BA cannot take over American Airlines. Can my right hon. Friend tell the House of any similar legal device that would prevent American Airlines, or any other foreign airline, from taking over BA? In view of what has happened in the public utilities, I suspect not. Moreover, I understand that between 20 and 25 per cent. of BA shares are already in the hands of American investors.

My fifth question relates to the Government's intention regarding the treaty negotiations, and the apparent advantages and disadvantages to be gained or lost from any change. In an attempt to obtain information, I tabled a question to the Secretary of State—Question 5657—in November. I asked "what information he has asked the CAA to provide concerning benefits to the United Kingdom that would arise from the proposed British Airways-American Airlines alliance; and what factors underlie changes from the previous practice in respect of consultation with the CAA."

A junior Minister replied:

"It is for the competition authorities to analyse the proposed British Airways-American Airlines alliance. I understand that the CAA has contributed to the analysis carried out by the Office of Fair Trading."—[Official Report, 29 November 1996; Vol. 286, c. 420-21.]

Not surprisingly, that reply did not entirely satisfy me, and shortly before the Christmas recess I tabled another question. I asked the Secretary of State whether his officials had discussed with the CAA

"the issue of commissioning a balance of benefits study in relation to the renegotiation of the US-UK Air Service Agreement (Bermuda II); and what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the analysis in relation to the bilateral talks."

The same junior Minister replied:

"Officials regularly discuss UK-US aviation matters with the Civil Aviation Authority, and such discussions have included the feasibility of an overarching 'balance of benefits' study of liberalising UK-US air services. We decided not to instruct the CAA to undertake such an analysis; the number of variables which would need to be taken into account, and assumptions which would have to be made, would make it impossible to model results which could be treated with any confidence. I am however satisfied that UK negotiators are fully briefed for the current series of bilateral talks."—[Official Report, 13 January 1997; Vol. 288, c. 111-12.]

I find that reply remarkable. I have been given to understand that, in the past year or so, the Department itself has requested the CAA to undertake an analysis of the benefits or disbenefits of a European-US open skies agreement. That is clearly much more complicated than the UK-US bilateral. I have also been informed that the CAA has been prepared to produce such an analysis for the present situation. I feel that I must ask my right hon. Friend to explain why the Department abandoned the chance to obtain a balance-of-payments study.

Furthermore, if no such study or analysis can be conducted, will it not be more difficult for the House and all interested parties to judge how successful or otherwise the negotiations turn out to be? Even our own negotiators would surely have been assisted by an analysis. It could even be asked how my right hon. Friend himself can be sure that any agreement is in the best interests of the United Kingdom's airlines and consumers.

I realise that I have asked my right hon. Friend a number of questions that he may not have time to answer fully today, but I believe that they need to be answered, and I hope that he will assure me that answers will be forthcoming.

Let me repeat that I have great admiration for British Airways and its achievements. Some critics, however, feel that it has somehow managed to "sew up" the Department of Transport on the question of the bilateral, and I think that such suspicions will only be confirmed by cagey departmental replies to the questions being raised. According to some newspapers, the chief executive of British Airways has also "sewn up" the Labour party in exchange for his advice to the Leader of the Opposition. I sincerely hope that neither statement is true, but, if either were true, it would not reflect well on the civil aviation policies of either of the main political parties, both of which are now supposed to believe in competition and value for the consumer.

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Cunninghame, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Peter Fry: I am sorry; I have only a short time left.

I believe that the guiding principles of our civil aviation industry should be fairer competition, less monopoly, greater opportunities for British airlines in foreign markets—including the United States—enabling new services and airlines to come into being, and the long-term consideration of the interests of the consumer. No one will be more delighted than me if my right hon. Friend can assure me that he agrees, and that those are the very principles that will be kept in mind during the current negotiations with the United States. I await his reply with interest, but, as I have said, I accept that he may have to expand on it at a later date.

1.15 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Sir George Young): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Sir P. Fry) for raising what he rightly described as a very important subject, and bringing his insight and experience of civil aviation matters to our debate. If I do not manage to deal with all his questions, I will indeed write to him and be as helpful as I can.

Let me make two points clear at the outset. The first relates to the position being taken by the United Kingdom in its current negotiations with the United States, which will resume in Washington on 4 February. I hope that the House will understand that it would not be appropriate for me to go into details of the UK's negotiating position here: it would make life much harder for the Department of Transport negotiators if their US counterparts were able to formulate a position based on their reading of Hansard.

We have adopted a robust negotiating posture in the negotiations—so robust, indeed, that the Americans withdrew from them last August. We are beholden to no particular sectional interest in the United Kingdom. Let me respond to the point raised by my hon. Friend at the end of his speech by expressing the hope that the UK Government will be able to reach a liberalising deal with the US, to the benefit of consumers, UK business and airlines generally; but I have no quarrel with his broad description of our overall objectives.

Mr. Donohoe: Will not the whole process of the bilateral discussions be improved and strengthened, given that the Governments of both countries have perhaps been dragging their feet in terms of the proposed alliance between British Airways and American Airlines? Will not attention be focused on the process in a way that it may not have been so far? That is why we have been negotiating, or attempting to negotiate, for so long.

Sir George Young: I think that I agree with the hon. Gentleman. My own view is that it is in everyone's interest for a liberalising agreement to be reached between the UK and the US, involving more competition, more services, more innovation and more competitive tariffs, but there are difficulties that need to be resolved before we can arrive at that point.

The second qualification that I need to make clear at the outset relates to the proposed alliance between British Airways and American Airlines. The Director General of Fair Trading is currently considering responses to his examination of the proposed alliance under the merger provisions of the Fair Trading Act 1973 and article 85 of the treaty of Rome. My hon. Friend will understand that, because of the formal position of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, it would not be appropriate for me to comment on specific competition or consumer aspects of the proposed alliance. My hon. Friend dwelt on those aspects in some detail. I will, however, draw what he said to my right hon. Friend's attention, and see whether he can respond on issues for which he has ministerial responsibility.

It may help if I set out the current position on UK-US air services. Aviation relations between the UK and the US are governed by the Bermuda II agreement, signed in 1977, which has subsequently been amended on many occasions. As it stands now, the arrangement allows full access by US airlines to all airports in the United Kingdom except for Gatwick and Heathrow, which means that there are no restrictions on carriers mounting transatlantic services to airports such as Birmingham, Glasgow, Manchester and Stansted.

Capacity and designation restrictions apply at Heathrow and Gatwick airports. On the routes operated, rules specify the number of airlines which may operate and the capacity that each side may operate in relation to the other. Only a limited number of routes can be operated from Heathrow—to 12 specified destinations—which are restricted to two carriers from each side: British Airways and Virgin Atlantic Airways, for the UK; and American Airlines and United Airlines, for the US.

Bermuda II is a balanced agreement, providing UK and US airlines with broadly equivalent opportunities. Over the years, market share has typically been split 50:50, although recently the split has been 60:40 in the UK's favour—which is due partly to the capacity UK carriers provide the market by using larger aircraft and to the high quality of service provided by British Airways and Virgin. Anyone who has travelled across the Atlantic on either of those carriers does not need me to point out that they lead the world in the product they offer.

Since Bermuda II was signed, the market has grown threefold, and the consumer has been well served in choice of destination and competitive fares. It is a UK success story. One in every four passengers travelling between Europe and the US travels with BA or Virgin, and many passengers from continental Europe choose to fly over London with a UK carrier rather than with a carrier based in their own country.

I shall now deal with the point made by the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Donohoe) in his intervention. The Government are committed to liberalising the air service relationship between the UK and the US. We believe that the consumer is best served in an open and fair market, in which carriers can choose which services to operate. By allowing competition from both established and new entrant carriers, such a liberalised arrangement leads to increased choice, better service and lower fares.

The UK has long been in the forefront of pushing for liberalisation. Our experience of liberal markets has shown that more carriers come on to routes, fares become more competitive, service standards rise and everyone benefits—such as other businesses, the travelling public and, not least, the airlines themselves.

In 1993, the then Secretary of State for Transport, my right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor), and his US counterpart, the then Transportation Secretary, Federico Pena, made a public commitment to liberalisation of the UK-US market. The Government believe that liberalisation of that market must be based on a balance of opportunity for carriers of both sides. Crucial to that goal is the ability of UK airlines to obtain fair access to international travellers originating in or travelling to the large US domestic market, without which UK carriers would suffer a competitive handicap.

Nearly one third of all passengers start or end their journey in the US behind a gateway point. The Government believe that access to US "beyond gateway" traffic is important, and that one of the best ways of achieving such access is through alliances between UK and US carriers. That view has been taken by other Governments and airlines in Europe, where in recent years there have been a number of transatlantic alliances.

Recent attempts to liberalise the UK-US aviation agreement have not been entirely successful. After the 1993 commitment by the UK and the US to liberalise arrangements within a year, the UK proposed a phased liberalisation approach, built around British Airways's plans for further investment in USAir. The US broke off those negotiations in December 1993.

In 1995, both sides resumed a phased approach to negotiations, and, in June 1995, a limited deal was reached. The deal allowed a second US airline on the Chicago-Heathrow route and increased services by BA to Philadelphia; agreed expanded code-sharing opportunities for both sides; agreed some limited access to US Government traffic—known as "Fly America"—through BA's arrangement with USAir; and, perhaps most significantly, agreed regional liberalisation, enabling any number of US and UK airlines to operate from any point in the US to anywhere in the UK, apart from Heathrow and Gatwick.

The 1995 deal was followed by an immediate resumption of negotiations on further limited and balanced access to Heathrow and Gatwick, cargo services, charters and pricing, and some additional limited access to "Fly America" traffic was allowed. In October 1995, however, the US again broke off negotiations.

Since the 1995 breakdown in negotiations, the US-Europe market has developed. Several large alliances have been created, such as those between United Airlines, Lufthansa and SAS, covering the German and Scandinavian markets; Delta, Swissair, Austrian and Sabena, covering the Austrian, Belgian and Swiss markets; and KLM and NorthWest, covering the Dutch market. The US authorities have given anti-trust immunity to each of those alliances, enabling them to co-operate in such areas as routes and pricing, and to build large multinational networks.

We believe that the UK-US aviation market should not be viewed in isolation, but in the context of the overall European-US aviation market. The UK is strong in that market, as 40 per cent. of the US-Europe market travels to or from the UK. The next biggest share is held by Germany, which has 18 per cent. Heathrow is the pre-eminent international gateway for travelling to the US, and many passengers choose to do so via other points in Europe and beyond. Gatwick is increasingly important in that market, and regional airports, including Manchester, have benefited from recent liberalisation.

We are doing well, but strong competition is developing from the other European alliances and airports—such as Frankfurt, Charles de Gaulle and Schipol—which are challenging our pre-eminence. It would not be in the UK's interest to lose our strong position in that market. The alliances developed between other European and US airlines—some of which are very large—represent a competitive challenge to the UK's strong position, and undoubtedly they were formed, in part, to challenge our position. UK airlines can be expected to wish to make similar arrangements so that they can continue to compete strongly.

The Government believe that the proposed BA-AA alliance could provide the basis for liberalising arrangements with the US, provided that the competition authorities are satisfied with the alliance. In its report of 30 July 1996, the Transport Select Committee supported our position. It stated:

"We would not wish the UK to 'miss the boat' in these developments and believe the alliance between British Airways and American Airlines could be a means of ensuring that the United Kingdom continues to be a major player in the world air transport industry to the great benefit of the UK economy."

Formal negotiations with the US are under way—they will reconvene on 4 February 1997—and will be without prejudice to investigations by the relevant competition authorities. As I said, I cannot comment on specific competition or consumer aspects of the proposed alliance, but I should like to make one point clear. The Government firmly believe that the UK competition authorities possess the necessary powers to investigate and, if appropriate, to approve the proposed alliance. The UK's credentials on general airline competition speak for themselves. No member state in the Community has more consistently and actively been in favour of open competition on equal terms within the single European aviation market than the UK.

Control of aviation state aid is one sphere in which the Commission undeniably has responsibility to ensure free and fair competition. Over the years, however, the equivalent of many billions of pounds have been poured with the Commission's full approval into state-owned national carriers by some of our European partners. My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough mentioned that matter in his speech, and I should like to give the House some examples of aid packages authorised by the Commission. In 1993, the Commission authorised about £165 million to be paid, over three years, to Aer Lingus. In 1994, it authorised about £700 million to be paid, over three years, to the Portuguese airline TAP. In 1994, it authorised about £1 billion to be paid, over three years, to Olympic Airways. Again in 1994, it authorised about £2.4 billion to be paid, over three years, to Air France.

More recently, in 1996, the Commission authorised Iberia Airlines to receive about £460 million, with the possibility this year of receiving another £100 million. In addition to that distressing catalogue of single market distortions, the Italian Government have recently asked permission to inject about £1.2 billion into Alitalia. The Commission is investigating the matter.

In contrast, UK carriers have received not a penny of assistance from the UK Government. They have had to compete by funding their investment out of their own resources, knowing that they would go to the wall if they failed to keep pace with their subsidised competitors. I am proud that BA, Virgin, British Midland and so many other UK carriers have risen so successfully to that challenge. They are still disadvantaged, however, by the failure to get to grips with state aid elsewhere in Europe.

My hon. Friend asked one or two specific questions that I shall now answer. The Department has not asked the Civil Aviation Authority to undertake a balance and benefits study for the precise reason that he gave. I shall make inquiries about earlier studies into matters European and write to him.

There are restrictions that would prevent AA from taking over British Airways. European Union law requires effective ownership and control of an airline to be in the hands of EU nationals, so at least 51 per cent. of BA has to be in EU ownership.

Towards the end of his remarks, my hon. Friend mentioned the negotiations. I can confirm that the following issues are part of the current discussions: liberalised market access for transatlantic traffic, including the lifting of designation, access and capacity restrictions at Heathrow and Gatwick; a liberal pricing regime; a dispute resolution framework involving an independent panel to ensure swift action against any abuse of market power; rights beyond services between the UK and United States; access to the United States internal market—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. We must now move on.

Unemployment and Poverty (Cornwall)

1.30 pm

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): Cornwall is a poor county and has several of the country's worst unemployment blackspots. In fact, Cornwall is as poor as any region in Europe, our unemployment rate is as high as that of rural Portugal, and incomes and wealth per head are as low as those of the Aegean islands. This poverty is made worse by high costs: housing is expensive, public transport is scarce and, to top it all, we pay the highest electricity and water bills in the country.

Since 1 January, we have been hit by a series of blows: the loss of more than 300 jobs at the St. Ivel factory at St. Erth; the fact that 300 or more jobs are to go in St. Austell's china clay industry; the loss of the air link to Heathrow, which is vital for local businesses; and the news that the A30 improvements at Goss Moor have hit another Government delay.

Officially, however, the south-west region stretches westwards from Cornwall to include the far more affluent counties of Gloucestershire and Wiltshire. As a result, according to the Government's official statistics, Cornwall is simply a small part of the country's third richest region. This merging of Cornwall with a group of far more affluent counties has served to disguise its high levels of poverty and unemployment. Even taking Cornwall and Devon together as a mini south-west region leaves the impression that Cornwall is better off than it really is. It is therefore worth spending a few minutes on hard facts.

Let us start with unemployment. Seasonally adjusted figures for the entire south-west region released earlier this month showed an unemployment rate of only 5.5 per cent., the second lowest in the country after East Anglia and lower than the national average. However, the level of unemployment in our county is more than 25 per cent. higher than the national average. Unemployment in Cornwall actually rose last month, and the county continues to have several of the country's top 10 worst unemployment areas. Already this year, more than 700 jobs have gone or are to go. They have been lost as a result of long-term changes in the local economy and they are unlikely to come back.

For me, however, the key figures relate to the long-term trends for Cornwall compared with the rest of the United Kingdom. Suffice to say that economic reports for the county in the early 1970s, which I have read, talk of the problems of over-employment, with a shortage of workers to fill available jobs. Now, on current figures, our unemployment rate is 25 per cent. higher than the national average, and the gap has widened under this Government.

In December 1981, on the narrow based definition of unemployment—the only definition of unemployment at the time—the national unemployment rate was 12 per cent. In Cornwall it was 16.6 per cent., just over 38 per cent. higher than the national average. As economies fluctuate, those figures will vary, but the differential should not change for the worse—indeed, we would hope to improve it. But, in December 1996, the gap had widened from 38 to 54 per cent. higher than the national average on the equivalent figures. The current figure of 25 per cent. is based on a different calculation of unemployment.

The problems are not confined to people out of work. Those in work in Cornwall can expect to take home far less than the national average wage. Average male weekly full-time earnings in Cornwall are now under 80 per cent. of the national average, and the gap has been widening. In other words, wages in Cornwall are falling ever further behind the national average, despite bills in Cornwall going up more quickly than the national average. Female workers do not fare much better—they are earning just over 80 per cent. of the woman's national average wage. The gap between average female full-time weekly earnings in Cornwall and the national average is wider now than at any time in the past 15 years—indeed, it is twice what is was in 1981.

High unemployment and low wages combine to give Cornwall an average disposable income as low as anywhere in the UK. In 1993, the latest year for which figures are available, the national average gross domestic product per head was £9,263—taking into account everyone in the country, working or not. In Cornwall, it averaged £6,596, only a fraction more than 70 per cent. of the national average.

Costs, however, are high in Cornwall—that applies to housing, getting around and bills. The best-known example is water. Since privatisation, water prices for domestic customers in England and Wales have risen by an average of 39 per cent. in real terms. In the region served by South West Water, however, the rise has been much higher. Since privatisation, average water bills have risen by more than 100 per cent. and are easily the highest in the UK. Local incomes do not reflect that fact, and neither pensions nor benefits are adjusted to allow for it.

The problem is the same in housing. The difference between average incomes and average house prices is, I am told, the highest in the country. This makes the actual poverty far worse in practice because people cannot afford the bills in the way they might be able to elsewhere in the country on the same income.

I hope that there is therefore no doubt of the high level of need in the county. That level of need implies an equally high level of help from the Government, but, time and again, Cornwall does not get the fair deal that I believe it deserves.

Cornwall's councils are still funded by an average of £100 less per person compared with the rest of England. The gap is even greater if we look further afield—the two Coopers and Lybrand reports commissioned by the West Country Development Corporation make it clear that the county does not get the help that similar areas, often facing fewer problems, get—for example, Scotland and Wales. The west country tourist board received only around £400,000 from the Government last year for the whole of the south-west, whereas Scotland received £16.9 million and Wales £14.78 million.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): My hon. Friend may have seen the figures that Ministers produced for me this morning on the level of Government investment in the promotion and development of tourism in England generally. It now stands, in real terms, at one third of the commitment that existed even in 1979 whereas in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland it has increased by 50 per cent. in real terms. It has increased to the ridiculously low level of 10p per head in England—and, of course, in this context, that includes Cornwall.

[Mr. Paul Tyler]

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend reinforces what I am saying.

Statistically, as Cornwall is lumped together with its wealthier neighbour Devon or with the wider, even more prosperous south-west region, the county does not get the help it could and should get from Brussels. The county's poverty entitles it to the highest level of European grant funding but it gets only a lower level because it is linked statistically with wealthier Devon. Equally, British Government funds have been axed this week as the Rural Development Commission announced that cuts have forced it to close its business support programme.

Today's announcement by the Cornish company St. Merryn Meat that its next major development of 700 jobs will be in Wales not Cornwall illustrates the problem. The company emphasises the good road links to Wales, yet we still struggle to get the A30 completed. The Welsh Development Agency gave it 20 acres of land—we do not even have a development agency.

What does Cornwall need to build jobs, increase wages and create prosperity? How do we overcome the problems of high and rising unemployment, and of increasing poverty against a background of rising incomes in the rest of the UK? Let me set out what might be seen as a manifesto for Cornwall, containing eight key policies to put our problems right. Perhaps I should say at the start that most of them are already supported by most people in Cornwall, irrespective of political party. They are mainly issues on which all Members of Parliament and councillors have fought together, but we need national Government support. So far, the Government have not been persuaded. I hope that whichever party is in government after the general election, we can persuade it to act.

First, we must have a commitment to maintain the air link to Heathrow. It is a vital lifeline for business people in Cornwall, providing frequent global links that allow easy access to worldwide markets, as the Secretary of State for Transport said in the previous debate. The loss of that air route would be catastrophic for many businesses in Cornwall and would make the area even less attractive to inward investors, who often regard access to Heathrow as essential. English China Clay International, for example, has told me in the past that a number of its operations based in Cornwall for its international work could not be operated without the air link to Heathrow. That is not the only business that could consider relocating some operations out of the area if the air link were axed. I have received many letters on the issue, as have other Cornish Members of Parliament.

Gatwick is not a viable alternative. A connection to Gatwick has been tried in the past and proved unviable. Gatwick does not have the same range, let alone frequency, of international flight connections as Heathrow. The Secretary of State has already admitted that he has the power to ring-fence the landing slots at Heathrow for us. So far he has refused to use it. It is time that he did so.

Secondly, a date must be set for starting improvements to the A30 at Goss Moor. After halting the design work more than a year ago, late last year the Government announced that it was to restart—a widely welcomed announcement. The county council had a contract to do this, which it was half way through when the Government previously stopped it. The county council could start again immediately, but the Government are now insisting that the work is re-tendered, so nothing will happen until well after the general election, probably not until 1998. The lack of an efficient road link to the rest of the country is hurting local business and hurting the surrounding villages, into which all the tall, heavy lorries from west Cornwall have to be diverted, because they cannot drive down the main road through the county.

Thirdly, the Millennium Commission has an important proposal for a university for Cornwall before it. The plan has widespread, cross-party support and should be actively supported by the Government. Expanding higher education opportunities in Cornwall would be good for business and good for jobs, stopping the considerable brain drain of the best of Cornwall's young talent out of the county, to which they rarely return.

A similar proposal was a Liberal Democrat manifesto commitment at the last election. This time, I hope that all parties will be able to unite around that promise, on the back of Millennium Commission support. A university for Cornwall would give a much-needed economic, as well as intellectual, boost to the county. The campus would generate hundreds of new jobs and would bring an estimated £20 million a year into the local economy.

Fourthly, we need a commitment to the Eden project, which is also before the Millennium Commission. It is a hugely exciting project that would be a vital boost to visitors to Cornwall, creating much-needed jobs in the St. Austell area, which has been hard hit by the loss of another 300 jobs in the clay industry—losses that can only worsen, as they have over the past 20 years. Once access problems are overcome to protect local residents—I am sure that they can be—the project will become a symbol of optimism for the county and could be a genuine boost to jobs, cutting unemployment and giving the kind of investment in the county that will bring other economic gains.

The fifth vital commitment for Cornwall is that the Government—any Government—should back Cornwall county council's bid to be classified separately from Devon for European funding. Treating the two counties as one area has masked the true extent of Cornwall's relative economic disadvantage. The Government are reviewing the situation. I hope that they will agree that Cornwall deserves a separate NUTS 2 classification, as it is called—I do not think that the name represents a particular view on Europe, it is just the name that it has been saddled with. That classification would give Cornwall the highest rate of European economic support—the so-called objective 1 status, granted in this country only to Merseyside and the Scottish Highlands. That would also reduce the problem of finding matching funding in such a poor area, lack of which is currently holding up many projects that could otherwise go forward.

Sixthly, any new Government must review the funding that Cornwall receives. With fewer police, less for schools, less for development and less for local services, Cornwall has failed to get a fair deal over many years. The two Coopers and Lybrand reports proved that, but still no real action is being taken.

The seventh vital issue is a review of the system of water and electricity charging. The current system leaves us with the highest bills in the United Kingdom, hitting businesses and people alike. Liberal Democrats have already outlined how we believe that that could be tackled. Ours is not the only possible solution, but a solution is needed.

The final, and most important, commitment must be the creation of a Cornwall development agency. The advantages that such an agency, if properly funded, can bring to an area are clear. The successful records of similar agencies in Scotland and south Wales confirm their potential, but they must be backed by adequate Government funding. A Cornwall development agency could draw on local expertise to back local small businesses, as well as the larger employers in the area. It could be a one-stop shop, providing advice and financial support for businesses in the county. Drawing together funds already held by the training and enterprise council, the Department of Trade and Industry, central Government and Europe, it would have real financial clout. It is important to remember that it would not be an extra, but would replace many of the existing agencies.

Decisions could be made locally and fast by people based locally, fully in touch with the problems and needs of the community. Their jobs would depend on bringing investment that far west. Anyone in such a job based further east can justify their job by developments further east, which are easier to bring in. Few developments come to our side of the Tamar.

We are not suggesting breaking links across the border. Cornwall has shown, through the joint office in Europe, that we can build links, working with others, but the agency must concentrate on success in Cornwall. Its work must be based on local knowledge and activity, backed by existing funding. That funding is currently so widely spread between so many organisations that many of them can do little more than print letter heads and fund their bureaucracy before they run out of money, which means that much of it is wasted.

The issue is too important to Cornwall for simple party politics. As I have said, most of the ideas have cross-party support in the county, but not, sadly, at national level, which is what counts for getting the go-ahead. That is why the Liberal Democrats commissioned an independent group of leading Cornish businesses and development experts to draw up a report on how an agency could be set up and how it would work. That report is to be published next Monday and I hope that every party will take it seriously. Whoever wins the general election, the new Ministers will find the report on their desks, with Cornwall demanding action.

People in the county want the chance to show what we can do. We know that we can make a real success of our economy—the talent is there—but this manifesto for Cornwall can be achieved only by Government action, because the power for each decision lies in London, not Truro. If the answer is yes, poverty and high unemployment can become things of the past in Cornwall.

The Minister of State, Department for Education and Employment (Mr. Eric Forth): I congratulate the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) on obtaining this Adjournment debate. The issues that he has raised are obviously important for his constituency and the surrounding area.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, last week we announced another large fall in United Kingdom unemployment and a strong rise in the number of people in jobs. That good news applies to all regions, including the south-west, which has the second lowest seasonally adjusted unemployment rate in the country, at 5.5 per cent. As the hon. Gentleman acknowledged, unemployment in the south-west has been falling over the past six months by an average of around 3,500 people a month. The national and regional picture is positive.

However, I accept that unemployment is still too high. I fully accept that more needs to be done in Cornwall in particular, where unemployment regrettably rose last month, against the trend. However, the current unadjusted unemployment rate for Cornwall of 8.8 per cent. compares favourably with the figures of 10.2 per cent. in December 1995, 14.5 per cent. in December 1992 and a peak of 15.5 per cent. in January 1986.

The hon. Gentleman referred to recent redundancies in Cornwall and in his constituency. Of course, the recent announcements from English China Clay International at St. Austell, and St. Ivel at St. Erth, did not make for the best of starts to the new year for those affected by them. We always regret job losses and want to do everything possible to help. Programmes such as training for work, work trials, jobfinder's grants, and so on, are in place to come to the rescue of people who unfortunately find themselves out of work—particularly if it is for a long period. The English China Clay International and St. Ivel rationalisations will be treated as major redundancies, which means that the normal eligibility conditions for the Employment Service and training and enterprise council programmes will be waived. That is a very important consideration for the individuals involved.

With help from the Employment Service and Devon and Cornwall training and enterprise council, there is good reason to believe that people affected can expect—directly or after retraining or other support—to find other work in the foreseeable future. I understand that, with regard to the proposed closure of the St. Erth factory, new jobs will be generated at other St. Ivel and Unigate processing plants in the region and redundant workers from St. Erth will be given priority for those jobs.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will acknowledge that the recent news on jobs in Cornwall has certainly not been all bad. As a result of the Inland Revenue at St. Austell winning its bid to house the self-assessment inquiries and stores section, 300 to 400 telephonist jobs are being created over the next couple of months. He will be aware that a number of new retail jobs can be expected as the new Treliske retail park nears completion. He must also be aware of the £4.8 million six-year CHEERS project, led by Restormel borough council and funded under the single regeneration budget, which is aimed at building and providing housing refurbishment and redevelopment to strengthen community involvement, improve employment and raise skill levels.

I make such comments not of course unaware of the pain and problems caused by unemployment to those affected, their families, and, indeed, across a much wider area, but I do not think that the prospects are quite as gloomy as the hon. Gentleman appeared to suggest. We know that not all people who are made redundant become unemployed and that most spells of unemployment tend—mercifully—to be short. Of those people who do become unemployed, a quarter leave unemployment in one month, half in three months and two thirds in six months. Those are well-established trends.

However, we need to face the fact that the sort of job rationalisations to which the hon. Gentleman has referred are part of the process of a dynamic and changing economy—indeed a changing region, as he pointed out. It is not for the Government to interfere with or second-guess commercial decisions made by companies. If we were to try in some way to force companies to keep unprofitable sites open, we would inevitably add intolerable burdens to those already on business and risk destroying jobs in the long term, as our partners on the continental mainland have discovered very much to their cost.

We have to recognise that some jobs will be lost and others created, and that the pace of it will vary from time to time in different regions of the country. I should point out that it is to our great credit as a nation that the traditionally large disparities in unemployment between regions have largely been evened out. The extent to which we have succeeded as a nation in ensuring that, by and large, people up and down the United Kingdom have broadly the same opportunity to work is quite remarkable—a startlingly different picture from that even 10 years ago and certainly 15 or 20 years ago. We should be happy and optimistic about that. We must face the fact that people cannot expect to have the same job throughout their working life, and in doing so we must try to ensure that, whether by education, training or different kinds of support, we can help people to make the adjustments that inevitably arise from such changes.

The hon. Gentleman said much about economic assistance to Cornwall and implied—indeed I think said—that Cornwall was not somehow getting its fair share of Government funding. The problems that Cornwall faces are widely recognised in a number of different ways. That is why so much of the county has assisted area status and is eligible for regional selective assistance. Indeed, I understand that nearly £5 million-worth of regional selective assistance grants have already been offered in 1996-97 to companies in Cornwall, generating more than £31.5 million of investment and creating or safeguarding more than 600 jobs.

A number of other sources of assistance include funding to help develop the local economy under objective 5b of the European Community's structural funds. The private-sector led £8 million Bodmin business park, currently under construction, is an excellent example of how that funding is providing opportunities for business and new jobs in Cornwall. Local partners can apply for challenge funds under the single regeneration budget, and there is the new local competitiveness challenge fund, which was announced in October, under which local partnerships can bid for support for programmes to improve the competitiveness of local businesses.

I gather that there has been some misunderstanding locally over the fact that the Rural Development Commission's rural business support fund for rural development areas has become part of the local competitiveness challenge fund, as was alleged in a local newspaper. RDC money has certainly not somehow been cut and therefore become no longer available to rural areas. On the contrary, money formerly available from the RDC is part of the local competitiveness challenge, ring-fenced for rural areas—although that certainly does not prevent rural areas from bidding for further money that is available from the total pot for local competitiveness challenge.

Mr. Matthew Taylor rose—

Mr. Forth: I cannot give way to the hon. Gentleman because I am going to try to answer all his points in the very little remaining time.

The hon. Gentleman will be aware that, in April, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister appointed my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration as Minister with special responsibility for the south-west, focusing particularly on Devon and Cornwall. He was given responsibility for co-ordinating Government policy towards the region and for taking forward a "new deal" for the area. That was in recognition of the distinct identity and needs of the region and is a clear demonstration of the Government's support for the south-west.

Since taking up his appointment, my right hon. Friend the Minister has been able to deliver on many of the key strategic issues identified by the West Country development corporation as crucial to the region's economic development. Such issues have included improving vital communications to the far south-west by, for example, securing the restart of work on the dualling of the A30 between Bodmin and Indian Queens and securing £650,000 of European Union money for a feasibility study to speed up train services between Bristol and Plymouth.

My right hon. Friend the Minister has taken a close interest in tourism—a key part of Cornwall's economy—and announced in November a pioneering project funded by South West Water to regenerate Newquay and other seaside towns. A Government-funded strategic study of tourism in the region is also under way, which will provide the region's tourist industry with the best possible analysis of where growth opportunities exist. I would therefore urge the hon. Gentleman to keep in touch with my right hon. Friend in the weeks and months ahead. I shall of course bring the hon. Gentleman's points to his attention.

I might add that I am aware of the perception that the west country generally gets a raw deal compared with, for example, Wales and Scotland, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, when it comes to big inward investment decisions backed by Government funding. Part of the problem is the lack of very large sites for major developments. None the less, my right hon. Friend the Minister has secured progress on the Broadmoor farm site near Saltash by removing the Highways Agency direction to refuse planning permission, thereby paving the way for serious negotiations between developers and the local council. He has also secured early progress on the disposal of Seaton barracks—a prime inward investment site which, although in Plymouth, offers the potential to provide many additional jobs to Plymouth and the surrounding area. In addition, he has announced English Partnership's £5 million factories first initiative, which will provide a stock of readily available units of more than 10,000 sq ft in Devon and Cornwall.

I know, too, that Devon and Cornwall Development International is working hard with the local authorities to attract inward investment. There have already been some notable successes—such as that regarding the United States company Harman International in Redruth—which have been backed by regional selective assistance funds.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the low pay earned by his constituents. Low pay is of course a relative term. There will inevitably always be some people whose pay is lower than others. The fact is that real earnings have increased at all levels since 1979 and real take-home pay for the bottom 10 per cent. of full-time workers is 14 per cent. higher for a single person than in 1979. More important, low pay does not necessarily mean low household income because household income comes from a number of sources. A family may have more than one wage earner or receive earnings plus state benefits. Even the European Community has recognised that, in the UK, unlike in most EC countries, low pay is a relatively minor cause of low living standards. Here in the UK, the single main cause of low income is not having a job. The best way of helping the lower paid is surely through the creation of the right conditions for a growing economy and the removing of barriers to employment.

The most effective way of raising the living standards and prospects of unemployed people of working age is to help them to get to work. We set up a comprehensive range of measures to help people to provide a better standard of living for themselves through work. The new jobseeker's allowance, for example, helps people to plan the most effective route back to work and creates a better framework of advice and support for the jobseeker.

We provide help through the benefits system to ease the transition from unemployment to work through such measures as family credit and the back-to-work bonus. The Government are currently piloting earnings top-up—an in-work benefit for single people and couples without dependent children—which makes working more worth while and widens the range of potential jobs for unemployed people. From April, the new child maintenance bonus will provide a bonus of up to £1,000 for people with care who leave benefit for work and who were receiving child maintenance while on income support or the jobseeker's allowance.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will therefore accept that the Government recognise the difficulties that Cornwall faces and are responding to them—perhaps not quite in the way in which he has suggested, but in a way that will be more effective in the short, medium and long term. I hope that he and the local community recognise and support the important work that my right hon. Friend the Minister is undertaking, and that all local agencies, like those in London, will do everything possible to respond to the problems that he has drawn to the House's attention.

It being Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Sitting suspended, pursuant to Standing Order No. 10 (Wednesday sittings), till half-past Two o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Mid Kent Water Company

1. Dame Peggy Fenner: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to make a decision on the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the bid for Mid Kent Water by General Utilities and Saur Water Services. [10587]

7. Sir Roger Moate: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to announce his decision on the takeover proposed for Mid Kent Water by General Utilities and Saur Water Services. [10595]

The Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs (Mr. John M. Taylor): My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade announced his decision to block the proposed bid for Mid Kent Holdings plc by General Utilities plc and Saur Water Services plc on 21 January. That decision was in line with the recommendation in the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report which he published on the same day, and the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading and the views of the Director General of Water Services.

Dame Peggy Fenner: I thank my hon. Friend for that prompt reply, and I welcome the decision. In view of the fact that, collectively, the two companies have a 38 per cent. holding in Mid Kent, may I ask my hon. Friend what reassurances he can give to the company that that situation will not happen all over again?

Mr. Taylor: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has made it clear that the proposed bid by General Utilities and Saur for Mid Kent will be blocked and that undertakings will be sought by the Director General of Fair Trading from both companies. Those undertakings will be intended to ensure that those aspects of the proposed merger that the MMC identified as operating against the public interest are effectively prevented now and in the future.

Sir Roger Moate: I, too, congratulate the Secretary of State on a decision that will be warmly welcomed in much of Kent, and is clearly in the best interests of Kent and competition policy generally. Does my hon. Friend accept that that situation has arisen because rival companies have pooled their shareholdings to undermine previous undertakings? In the absence of the compulsory divestment of shares—which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is not seeking—how can we be sure that the situation will not arise again? Can my hon. Friend ensure that the undertakings will prevent the bid from being repeated or, indeed, being repeatable?

Mr. Taylor: The honest and candid answer to my hon. Friend must be vigilance on his part, and on the part of my right hon. and hon. Friends who represent constituencies in Kent and of the Director General of Fair Trading. If he or his constituents suspect that something that they do not want is about to occur, they must tell the Director General of Fair Trading straight away.

Electricity Industry

2. Mr. Hanson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received regarding takeovers and mergers in the electricity industry. [10588]

The President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian Lang): In the past six months, I have received some 80 representations regarding takeovers and mergers in the electricity industry. In addition, the Director General of Fair Trading has noted some 100 representations when advising me.

Mr. Hanson: Given that 50 per cent. of UK electricity companies are owned by foreign-based companies, does the Secretary of State feel that the Government have helped to defend the interests of British consumers by allowing the companies to be purchased? Is he aware that it is illegal for non-US citizens to buy shares in such companies in the United States?

Mr. Lang: First, I have had assurances from the American Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Mickey Kantor, that British companies can invest in electricity companies in the United States; and, secondly, the question of ownership does not affect the interests of the consumers. What matters to consumers is that the company is efficiently and competitively run. When the Labour party was last in power, electricity prices rose repeatedly by substantial amounts, but since privatisation, prices for both domestic and industrial consumers have fallen.

Mr. Couchman: Are there lessons to be learnt about hostile and predatory bids as referred to by my hon. Friend and neighbour the Member for Medway (Dame P. Fenner)? Does my right hon. Friend feel that those lessons might suggest that such actions, which are so detrimental to both companies and their customers, should be examined as a matter of urgency?

Mr. Lang: Of course I will take careful note of what my hon. Friend says and consider it, but what delivers the best results to consumers is a free and open marketplace in which competition is the yardstick by which the Government decide whether it is necessary to intervene in a merger or takeover bid. I have measured my responsibilities against that criterion of competition, and it is notable that, in almost all the decisions that have been taken, the Director General of Fair Trading, the Director General of Electricity Supply and I have been of one mind.

Boeing-McDonnell Douglas Merger

3. Mr. Pike: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment his Department has made of the implications of the Boeing-MDD merger for the British aerospace industry. [10589]

The Minister for Industry (Mr. Greg Knight): The proposed merger would be of great significance to our aerospace industry, which competes with Boeing and McDonnell Douglas, mainly through participation in the airbus consortium, but also works with them, notably in supplying equipment. The proposal is being considered by the United States competition authorities, and may also be considered by the European Commission. My Department is currently examining the implications with United Kingdom industry.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister recognise that the merger will be a dominant feature in the aerospace industry for both civil and military aircraft and that the Government must ensure that the airbus consortium and our aerospace industry as a whole are able to compete, so that a monopoly is not created? Aerospace is crucial to Lancashire and to the country and we must ensure that it can survive.

Mr. Knight: The hon. Gentleman has had a long interest in the matter, and of course I take note of, and will bear in mind, what he says. The European Commission has not yet been notified by Boeing; when it is, we expect to play a part in the consultations and discussions, and we shall take account of what UK industry has to say. Indeed, if the Consortium of Lancashire Aerospace, with which I know that the hon. Gentleman is associated, wants to make any representations, I shall be delighted to hear from it.

Sir John Cope: This announcement, together with Boeing's cancellation of its work on its very large aircraft, makes it important that the Government should back our aerospace industry, and especially Airbus Industrie, with its plans for the stretch A340 and a large aircraft. Launch aid—or more properly launch loans—is extremely important to those two projects, and the recent announcements from America make it essential for the Government to back them.

Mr. Knight: I hear what my right hon. Friend says; he is right. I have every confidence in the British aerospace industry. To recap for the benefit of the House, since 1979 we have given about £1.25 billion in launch aid to help the industry and we shall certainly continue to consider projects that are brought to our attention, including projects involving research and development under CARAD—the civil aviation research and development programme.

Mr. Barry Jones: Does the Minister appreciate the fact that 2,300 of my constituents have a strong interest in the response of the Government and of Airbus Industrie to the merger to which he has referred? What chances do my constituents, who make the wings for airbus, have of making the wings of the new jumbo jet that Airbus Industrie has planned?

Mr. Knight: That must be a matter for Airbus Industrie. We have been in the forefront of trying to persuade the consortium to convert to a company—in effect, a limited company—so that it is better able to compete with Boeing. It has been doing well and it needs to continue improving; we shall give every encouragement to ensure that that happens.

Mr. Atkins: Has my right hon. Friend considered the implications of the proposals of the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) for the military and civil projects of the British aerospace industry, which the Government have supported through thick and thin? They would be prejudiced, if not terminated, if there were a Labour Government.

Mr. Knight: My right hon. Friend makes a valid point. If Britain had the misfortune to elect a Government whose spending proposals exceeded the taxation that they imposed, where would they get the money? Perhaps they would get it by cancelling projects such as Eurofighter.

Regional Policy

4. Dr. Moonie: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the significance of the European Commission's first cohesion report for the regional policy of the United Kingdom. [10590]

9. Ms Quin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the impact of the European Commission's first cohesion report on regional policy in the United Kingdom. [10597]

Mr. Greg Knight: As I informed the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner) on 4 December, Official Report, column 696, the European Commission's cohesion report shows that the UK is one of the few EU countries where regional unemployment differences have decreased. It also shows that, since 1989, there has been a narrowing of relative gross domestic product per capita between UK regions.

Dr. Moonie: How does the Minister explain the fact that, according to the report, the gap between the richest and poorest regions in the UK has widened over the past 10 years? Does that not betray the abject failure of his regional policy?

Mr. Knight: I suggest that the hon. Gentleman rereads the report because it deals not with wealth and poverty but with differences in wealth. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] There is a difference, which I shall explain. If the UK experienced growth in every region but some regions grew slightly faster than others, it would be a matter for comment in the report. That has happened in many UK regions. The report is an interesting discussion document, but it ends in 1993 and does not take account of the recovery since then.

Ms Quin: Contrary to what the Minister says, the report also shows that the gap between rich and poor has widened and that the number of people living below the poverty line has increased. Given that the report fits in well with reports from the Institute for Fiscal Studies, the Joseph Rowntree Foundation and others, will the Minister not dismiss the report but admit that there is an urgent problem that must be tackled?

Mr. Knight: I am not dismissing the report, which is a useful discussion document. I simply do not draw the same conclusions as do some Opposition Members. The report also shows that, in 1983, eight UK regions were among the 25 EU regions with the highest unemployment levels. By 1993, there was none, such has been our success in creating employment. The report also reveals that the long-term unemployed have shared in the UK recovery: the number is down by 500,000 since its peak in 1986.

Sir Michael Neubert: What effect would it have on regions in England, especially northern England, if employees in companies in the Scottish region were subject to additional personal taxation? Would not a tartan tax provide an unfortunate and unfair inducement to investment in England?

Mr. Knight: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The tartan tax would have an effect similar to that of a minimum wage. It would mean that the most vulnerable people in work would be sacked.

Mr. Wilkinson: When considering the long-term implications of the report, will my hon. Friend bear in mind that the United Kingdom has, in comparison with many continental countries, done exceedingly well? If the momentum to greater prosperity in Britain is to be maintained, there is no point in the UK continuing to provide more and more taxpayers' money for a fund that, if successful, will lead to jobs being transferred from Britain to other parts of the Union.

Mr. Knight: I hear what my hon. Friend says. It is important that, across Europe, the British idea of reducing state aid is applied. That policy must continue. Once temporary problems have been sorted out, it is our policy to ensure that state aid in EU member states is reduced, and eventually eliminated. That is the way to secure long-term jobs that are based on the productivity, success and competitiveness of private companies.

Mr. Wigley: Is the Minister aware that the gross domestic product per head in Wales has dropped from 92 per cent. of the European Union average 15 years ago to only 83 per cent. now? We were overtaken last year by the Irish Republic, which in the past 12 months has accelerated ahead to the extent that it now has a GDP per head 9.3 per cent. greater than Wales yet the Irish Republic is receiving all the benefits of the cohesion funds. Can the Minister ensure that the benefits from the European Union come to areas such as Wales which have a need in terms of GDP per head when the fund is renegotiated in 1999?

Mr. Knight: Wales has done well in the recent past, but one of the problems that the cohesion report identifies is what happens to aid to EU member states when circumstances change. The report mentions Ireland as an example of where perhaps in the present circumstances a country should not receive the aid that it has received in the past. That is something that we shall want to see clearly dealt with in future discussions.

Mr. Batiste: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that youth unemployment in Britain is about two thirds of the European average? Is that not the most powerful reason for rejecting the job-killing social chapter so beloved of the Labour party? With its inflexibilities, the social chapter does so much to damage the prospects of the least well-off and most vulnerable in society.

Mr. Knight: My hon. Friend is right. Youth unemployment in the United Kingdom is only two thirds of the EU average. We need to do more, but the figures show that the number of 16 to 18-year-olds in education and training in the United Kingdom continues to rise. That is good news.

Mr. Harvey: What steps do the Government take to monitor where regional selective assistance and other Government regional aid goes? How confident is the Minister that, since the redrawing of the assisted areas maps, the Government's effort in the regions is going where it is wanted, unlike the sort of measures to which he has referred in his answers?

Mr. Knight: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point. We have a network of monitoring committees which assess the value of schemes which can apply for structural funds. From time to time, the Department asks for reports back on how the schemes have been implemented. That dialogue must continue so that we can ensure that we are getting value for money, and that structural funds go to the areas of greatest need.

Mr. John Marshall: Does the report make the point that, while in the 1970s unemployment in Scotland was much higher than in other parts of the United Kingdom, that is no longer the case? Is that not the most effective form of regional policy, which the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie) should have had the grace to welcome?

Mr. Knight: That is indeed the case. The report reveals that the United Kingdom has more of its working-age population in work than any other large EU country. In the United Kingdom, the proportion is more than 68 per cent. In France, it is only 60 per cent. and in Germany, it is only 65 per cent.

Mr. Hoon: The EU Commission's cohesion report highlights Britain's relatively poor national and regional economic performance over the longer term in comparison with other EU member states. Does the Minister agree with the report of the Commission on Public Policy and British Business that that is the result of "a disproportionately high number of underperforming British companies—underinvestment—insufficient high quality training and education—unsteady government policy"?

If the Minister, like the Deputy Prime Minister, cannot bring himself to agree with the conclusions of that independent report produced by some of Britain's most distinguished business leaders, does he agree with his Government's third competitiveness White Paper, which concludes that "The same factors mean that Britain has a much larger proportion of poor company performance than France, Germany or Italy"?

Mr. Knight: I certainly do not agree with the conclusions of the socialist think tank report. Employment is the key issue which runs through every page of the cohesion report. What is clear from the report is that here in the United Kingdom we are winning on the employment front. We are winning on youth employment, employment for women and getting the long-term unemployed back to work. That is what matters.

Inward Investment

5. Mr. Hawkins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many jobs have been created and safeguarded as a result of inward investment since (a) 1979 and (b) 1992. [10592]

Mr. Lang: Since 1979, the Invest in Britain Bureau has recorded more than 853,000 jobs associated with inward investment decisions, of which over 352 relate to the period since 1992. The United Kingdom is still the number one location in the European Union for investment from Japan, the United States and Korea. That is an enviable record, which the Government are determined to maintain in the face of increased competition from our European partners.

Mr. Hawkins: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. Does he agree that, in the years leading up to 1979 under the last Labour Government, the received wisdom of every international commentator was that Britain was the sick man of Europe, and we were down at the bottom of the league tables with Turkey? Is it not the case that the Government's policies have transformed the position and attracted vastly more inward investment and that, in particular, manufacturing industry and the motor trade throughout the country, including Vauxhall in the north-west, have done tremendously well? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that he will continue to pursue those policies?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is right. Because we have helped the United Kingdom's economy to become more competitive and rejected the social chapter and the other burdens that the Labour party and the European Union would impose on us, we have, in the words of Mr. Jacques Delors, turned the United Kingdom into a "paradise for inward investment". My hon. Friend mentioned the motor industry and I am sure that he welcomes yesterday's announcement by Nissan, which will create some 3,500 jobs, and the recent announcements by Ford-Jaguar, Vauxhall, Rover-BMW and Toyota. Like so many other manufacturing industries in this country, the motor industry is now buoyant and successful because of the Government's policies.

Mr. Sheerman: The Secretary of State surely knows that we are all in favour of inward investment, but the Government use it as a fig leaf to cover the nakedness of their policy on indigenous investment. The Government's investment record is rotten and rates poorly against those of all our major competitors. The Government use inward investment as a cheap shot—almost as cheap as the antics of the Deputy Prime Minister yesterday.

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman is talking nonsense. He should reflect on the fact that, while unemployment has been rising throughout the European Union for the past few years, it has been falling in the United Kingdom, and that the UK is attracting more than 30 per cent. of all the inward investment into the European Union and more than 40 per cent. of all the American and Japanese investment into the EU. That is a judgment from the world on the competitiveness, efficiency and success of the British economy as a good place to manufacture and invest.

Mr. Dunn: Does the Minister agree that we will use every opportunity to attract inward investment, including the refusal to introduce a windfall tax? Will he take the opportunity to condemn the insider dealings of Robert Ayling, who appears to have struck a deal with the Labour party to his own benefit, at the same time earning himself £750,000 a year for bowing and scraping to the Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Lang: I agree with my hon. Friend that the windfall tax would penalise consumers of essential utilities, would be arbitrary in its impact and would be unfair on investors and consumers of essential utilities in this country. It is a policy to which the Labour party is committed as part of its high-spend, high-tax approach to the running of this country.

Mr. John D. Taylor: The Government's record in attracting inward investment to the United Kingdom has been remarkably successful in recent years and most people recognise that, but will the Secretary of State bear in mind that one negative factor could damage us in the years ahead—the imbalance between corporation tax levels in the United Kingdom and those of some of our competitor nations?

Mr. Lang: I am surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman say that, because our corporate taxes are among the lowest in Europe. When we came into office, the corporation tax rate was 52p in the pound, and 42p in the pound for small businesses. Those rates have been dramatically reduced. The corporate tax rate for small businesses is now 23p in the pound and that is one of the reasons why so many businesses have taken root—there are now over 1 million more than there were, including those in Northern Ireland.

Sir David Madel: Does my right hon. Friend agree that more jobs will be created and safeguarded as long as we keep interest rates low and stop the pound becoming overvalued? Will he ask the Governor of the Bank of England to pay exceptional attention to the views of industry on what our interest rates should be?

Mr. Lang: I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor will take note of my hon. Friend's point. However, I am sure that my hon. Friend will also reflect on the fact that the capacity of Governments to influence exchange rates is extremely limited. The present exchange rate is a reflection of the strength and growth of the British economy and it helps us to fight inflation. The improved productivity and competitiveness of our economy enables us to continue to manufacture and export at present levels.

Dr. Howells: Do the figures on inward investment include the purchase of privatised utilities by American and French companies? Do those purchases actually create jobs, given the massive hurdles that those British firms are forced to climb over before being allowed a share of the American and French utility markets? Why have the Government displayed such indolence and half-heartedness in fighting to win for British business fairness in competition and equality of access to the hugely protected markets of France and Germany?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman seems to be completely unaware of the dramatic successes that privatised industries are having in worldwide markets. When I was in India the week before last, representatives of British Telecom were with me and they secured a £60 million deal. The same is true in other industries: for example, the water industry has people on overseas missions all over the world, winning business for this country.

Investment involving the purchase of British companies is also inward investment that brings new assets and new money into the country, creates new jobs, invests in new machinery and new technology and helps to contribute to the remarkable growth in output, exports and employment that we have secured in the past few years.

Government Policy (North-West England)

6. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent representations he has received about the impact of Government policies on businesses in the north-west; and if he will make a statement. [10594]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Ministers at the Department of Trade and Industry regularly receive representations about the impact of Government policies on businesses, including those in the north-west. I look forward to hearing more views from north-west business people when I visit Bolton early next month.

Mr. Thurnham: When the Minister visits Bolton town hall in 12 days' time, I hope that he will enjoy a good helping of Bolton's excellent black pudding with his breakfast. Will he welcome the proposal to set up a national museum of food in Bolton, which is famous not only for its black puddings but for its excellent bakeries?

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman may like to know that, only this morning, I had the menu for that breakfast altered to ensure that it will include black pudding. To set up a museum of food in Bolton is a splendid idea and I wish it well.

Mr. Dover: Is the Minister aware that the effect of Government policies on the north-west and on Lancashire in particular has been to bring about an enormous increase in the number of small businesses there? In my own patch, there are 6,000 and that number is rising every month. Over the past 14 years, that has helped to bring down unemployment from 11 per cent. to only 4.5 per cent.

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend is right. The north-west has experienced a net increase of 35,000 jobs in two years and regional selective assistance of £31 million has, by itself, created 6,500 jobs. The north-west has excellent communications, high value-added, high investment and tremendous tourist potential.

Mr. O'Hara: The Minister will be aware that the Ford Motor Company has announced plans to shed 1,300 jobs at the factory at Halewood in my constituency in order to concentrate production of the new Ford Escort in Spain and Germany. Can he explain how it makes sense to export 1,300 jobs from my constituency to Germany and Spain in order to produce for import into this country the car that is the second-best seller in this country, that sells more here than in any other market and that costs £500 to £1,000 less to produce here than on the continent? Will he meet a deputation comprising my colleagues and me to talk about this serious matter?

Mr. Taylor: Those decisions are made by the Ford Motor Company and they are based on its commercial judgment. Ford is taking those measures to improve the plant's competitiveness with the aim of securing its long-term future. The Government are committed to assisting Halewood to meet Ford's competitiveness agenda.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Is my hon. Friend aware that Government policies have greatly increased prosperity in my constituency, not least in Garstang? Unfortunately, in contrast, Labour-controlled Wyre borough council's vicious policy of imposing parking charges in Garstang, where hitherto parking was free, will ruin the economy.

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend is probably best placed to put pressure on that local authority, but she may like to let me have more details on the matter. In the meantime, I know that she will give it a hard time.

Mrs. Roche: How can the Minister be so complacent, given that small businesses in the north-west will be faced with the catastrophic effects of the closure of Ford in Halewood? According to the Department's figures, there are one in 20 fewer VAT-registered small businesses in the Wirral than there were in 1992. Does not that show why businesses in the north-west and elsewhere are saying that enough is enough with this failing Government?

Mr. Taylor: That is as absurd a question as one is likely to hear. Small businesses thrive in the north-west because of its competitiveness. The hon. Lady mentions Halewood, about which my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry said he would receive a delegation. Ford is not closing the plant, but is making adjustments in the light of its judgment. We shall assist in securing Halewood's long-term future.

Mr. Nigel Evans: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Labour party ignores all the good news in the north-west? He mentioned the 35,000 jobs that have been created over the past two years, but, as a result of inward investment since 1985, 17,334 jobs have been either created or safeguarded. One important industry is the aerospace industry—not just British Aerospace but the Consortium for Lancashire Aerospace, which comprises more than 130 smaller companies with a turnover of more than £4 billion. It would damage those industries and jobs in the north-west greatly if the Labour party were elected and slashed defence expenditure, bearing in mind the fact that it would have to get the money from somewhere.

Mr. Taylor: Like my hon. Friend, whose remarks I endorse, I do not understand why the Labour party always wants to sell the north-west down the river. I presume that Labour Members would take the same attitude if they were in government. I want them to know that the north-west has high morale. Lancashire, Cumbria, Cheshire and Merseyside are wonderful counties and they are all in good heart—much better heart than I see on the Opposition Benches.

Research and Development

8. Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the percentage change in total Government spending on research and development since 1985. [10596]

The Minister for Science and Technology (Mr. Ian Taylor): Estimated Government expenditure on research and development in 1996-97 is 36 per cent. higher than the cash expenditure in 1985-86.

Mrs. Clwyd: The Minister was unable to answer the question that I asked. The answer is that there has been a decrease of 16.5 per cent. since 1985. Is it any wonder that, because of cuts in Government-funded research and development, we have fallen from 13th to 18th place in the world prosperity league?

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Lady forgot to ask the question that she obviously wanted to ask because she did not put the words "in real terms" in her question. There has been a real-terms cut in total Government R and D mainly because of cuts in the defence industry, which I have not heard many Opposition voices oppose. She therefore should not try to be too clever on that account. The science base is at the heart of Britain's efforts to be competitive in the long term, and expenditure on it under this Government has risen by 15 per cent. in real terms during that period.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin: Would it not be more significant to ask what our gross R and D spending is as a proportion of gross domestic product? Is it not broadly in line with our European competitors? Is it not typical of the Opposition that they ask about Government R and D spending as though that will solve all our problems, whereas it is private sector investment that creates jobs?

Mr. Taylor: It is axiomatic that the Government aim to invest in research and development and thereby to stimulate industrial investment. Industrial investment in the United Kingdom still has further to go, although in recent years there has been a year-on-year increase. I have never denied that my message to industry is that it should invest more intensively in R and D. The Government's record is extremely good and compares favourably with Government expenditure in countries such as Japan and the United States. I intend to ensure that the UK research base is the finest, as we believe it to be. That will come about through the schemes that we are delivering to bring the science base and industry closer together.

Public Sector Research Establishments

10. Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the progress of the Government's prior options reviews of public sector research establishments. [10598]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The Government are considering the prior options review reports. We are determined to achieve the greatest possible benefit from the substantial resources devoted to public sector research establishments. We expect to make further announcements about outstanding decisions in the near future.

Mrs. Campbell: Has the Minister read the comments of the Select Committee on Science and Technology, which described the scale and conduct of the reviews as profoundly unsatisfactory? Is he aware of the disruption that has been caused? Does he plan to make a further announcement before the general election?

Mr. Taylor: I always treat with great respect the views of the Science and Technology Committee and always look forward to appearing before it. There have been misunderstandings about the objectives of the prior options reviews. As the Government consider that £690 million of expenditure on R and D through the research departments should be undertaken efficiently, prior options are clearly important. However, we are nearing the end of the process in the current round, and in the very near future—certainly before the general election—I expect to make an announcement concerning those institutes on which we have not yet made any public statement. I draw attention to the announcements that are already on record. Some of the research departments haye stayed in the public sector, some have undergone management adjustments and some have been moved into the private sector.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: Will my hon. Friend pay tribute to the people working in the public sector research laboratories in Norwich? Will he confirm that the Ministry of Agriculture's Central Science Laboratory will stay in Norwich? It would be very good news if it did. Bearing in mind what my hon. Friend has just said, how much longer will people in Norwich who are working in the other research laboratories have to wait for final decisions affecting their future?

Mr. Taylor: I am delighted to say that on 9 December my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food announced the future of the Central Science Laboratory as an agency with various management tasks ahead of it. The new facilities in York are of great importance—I shall be visiting the York region this weekend—but I am pleased to say that the excellent work on food science will remain in Norwich. I intend to make other announcements as soon as possible.

Mr. Ingram: One of the central questions that the Minister must answer is what cost-benefit analysis he is using to justify the Government's continued obsession with the privatisation of large swathes of the nation's public sector research establishments. Have not millions of pounds from a hard-pressed science budget been wasted, and thousands of scientists demoralised in pursuit of the Government's flawed policy? The Government should provide encouragement and support for the PSREs, not uncertainty and continuing confusion about their future.

Mr. Taylor: I do not recognise that situation. A review process is not always enjoyable, but some of the research establishments report that the review has given them a more tightly defined mission statement, and they welcome the opportunities that have emerged from the prior options process. I challenge the hon. Gentleman, who has forlorn hopes of his party one day occupying the Government Benches. His question shows that he is not prepared for that transition. If £690 million is to be spent on research establishments, it is the duty of any Minister for Science and Technology to ensure that the money is spent efficiently. We are doing that. We have found new ways of delivering quality in science. I am certain that, as a responsible Minister, I had to undertake that process.

Manufacturing Investment

11. Mr. Lewis: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the change in the level of manufacturing investment in the past 12 months. [10599]

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Anthony Nelson): The figures for the past 12 months will not be available until those for the last quarter of 1996 are published next month. However, the conditions for investment are extremely favourable and the Confederation of British Industry expects manufacturing investment to grow by 8 per cent. this year and next year.

Mr. Lewis: When will the Minister accept that the Government's record on manufacturing investment is abysmal? Even the Secretary of State admitted not long ago that the Thatcher Government had a poor industrial investment record. Why is that situation unchanged?

Mr. Nelson: Like other Opposition Members, the hon. Gentleman never knowingly misses an opportunity to talk Britain down. Business investment grew by 5 per cent. last year and whole economy investment is six times higher than under Labour. Instead of decrying our excellent performance on the manufacturing front, he would do better to celebrate some of the excellent investment in manufacturing industry in his constituency. For example, Omega Engineering recently established a 250,000 sq ft European manufacturing plant in his constituency. Is that not better news than his question suggests?

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Is not the CBI's forecast of an 8 per cent. increase in manufacturing investment this year and next year one of the best results to be found in the European Union? What does my hon. Friend think would happen if industry were hit by windfall and other corporate taxes, as proposed by the Opposition this year?

Mr. Nelson: Yes. The performance of industry—particularly of manufacturing industry—would be severely prejudiced by such factors. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the CBI's studies in that respect. In the past 24 hours, its quarterly survey has confirmed that confidence in manufacturing industry has risen and that output is up. The number of jobs in manufacturing industry has increased by 130,000 in the past three years. That is good news on the manufacturing front, and it reflects the success of Conservative policies in government.

Mr. Corbett: I welcome the increased investment in the manufacturing sector and the forecast that that will continue, but can the Minister predict when manufacturing investment will return to its 1979 level?

Mr. Nelson: The important statistic is the investment in business as a whole. Those who produce computer games or sell computer software services will find that the distinction between the two in terms of employment and investment is becoming increasingly artificial. Whole business economic investment is growing substantially. Our output and exports are at record levels. International confidence, as reflected in investment, is also at a record level. That speaks well of the performance of our industry and of Government policies in action.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Has my hon. Friend assessed the effect on jobs of taking £10 billion from the publicly owned utilities, which invest in manufactured goods from British industry? How many jobs would be lost if £10 billion were removed from their investment and devoted to £10 billion-worth of make-work schemes, such as those offered by the socialists opposite?

Mr. Nelson: The Opposition have not accounted for any significant losses in employment resulting from their plans, which would wreak havoc with investment, activity, profitability and the future of many utility companies. They have led the way with investment in recent years. Let us not forget that, during the difficult years of the recession, those utilities maintained high investment and employment. The price of their success is the prospect of a Labour Government introducing a swingeing tax thereon. That would be disastrous for their prospects, for consumer prices and, most of all, for the many people employed in those industries.

Mrs. Beckett: Is it not true that just over a year ago in the Budget the Government predicted a 10 per cent. increase in manufacturing investment this year, whereas the most recent figures show a decline of 16 per cent. for the same quarter? The Government claimed that an increase would be an indicator of success, but they have said nothing about the decline. Will the Minister confirm that the most recent figures for this quarter compared with the last show a decline not only in manufacturing investment, but in business investment and in whole economy investment? The Minister cited the CBI's prediction for manufacturing investment, but the Government have not predicted what will happen to manufacturing investment. Can the Minister make such a prediction today? Does it not appear that, according to the latest information—whether it be on investment, output, which is static or which is going down, or the forecast export levels in the CBI survey—we are reaping the rewards of this Government's utter neglect of manufacturing over many years?

Mr. Nelson: No. The right hon. Lady is wrong on just about every count. She should update her briefing before she reads it out. She did not refer—[Interruption.] Perhaps the right hon. Lady will give me a chance to reply to her question. The CBI quarterly survey became available yesterday. She may not always believe what the Government say, but she should not deride what the CBI says. It states:

"Manufacturers' optimism grew for the third consecutive quarter. Manufacturing output growth is expected to accelerate over the next four months."

The predictions are that it will rise by 8 per cent. this year and next year. Average unit costs and prices have fallen. For the past year, manufacturing output has risen significantly. That is one reflection of the huge improvements in productivity that have taken place within that sector, which have been fuelled by inward investment. It is a great success story for Britain and Conservative policies. The Labour party should not and must not deride it.

Scientific Research

12. Mr. Bayley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about the implications of the Budget for Government-funded scientific research. [10600]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The Government's commitment to research and the science and engineering base remains as strong as ever, with total Government funding of science and technology being sustained in 1997-98.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said in his Budget statement,

"our universities and colleges make an important contribution to the economy . . . We want to ensure that the British science research base remains the best in the world, which it certainly is at the moment."—[Official Report, 26 November 1996; Vol. 286, c. 159.]

Mr. Bayley: May I welcome the Minister's earlier expression of support for the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's Central Science Laboratory in York? Does he join me in recognising the importance to the economy of such public sector science and the additional 750 private sector bioscience jobs in the York area? Will he explain why the Government present an improvement in the science budget when the figures published after this year's Budget, compared with those published after last year's Budget, show that the Government will invest £25 million less in science over four years than they were planning previously?

Mr. Taylor: I am happy to endorse the hon. Gentleman's comments about the Central Science Laboratory and about the work that it undertakes. There was never any question about the excellence of that work. The prior options review was designed to ascertain how best to maintain that excellence in terms of basic research, and how the laboratory could connect with the private community that the hon. Gentleman mentioned in the biotechnology industries. That case-by-case analysis has been the hallmark of our prior options survey.

There is a cash increase in the science budget as a whole, year on year, compared with the lower inflation figures that were originally taken into account. The overall settlement of the public expenditure survey round shows the importance that science has within the total package of Government expenditure.

I draw attention to the extra £100 million that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has found, including an extra £20 million for equipment. Again, it is important to strike a balance, and the settlement meets some of the comments made by the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals.

Science in this country is doing extremely well. Researchers are doing a brilliant job in so many of the areas identified in the foresight programme. The year of engineering success was officially launched today; we should all take pride in talking up the work of the science community.

Manufacturing Industry

13. Sir David Knox: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he next expects to meet the President of the Confederation of British Industry to discuss the manufacturing sector. [1101]

Mr. Lang: My ministerial colleagues and I regularly met the Confederation of British Industry to discuss a range of issues. In 1997, the CBI expects manufacturing output to grow by 3.5 per cent. and manufacturing investment to grow by 8 per cent.

Sir David Knox: Does my right hon. Friend agree that reasonably stable exchange rates are particularly important for the manufacturing sector? Is he concerned about the effects of the recent rise in the value of the pound on manufacturing industry?

Mr. Lang: The rise in the pound is clearly a reflection of the world's perception of the strength of our economy and currency. A strong currency reduces input costs for manufacturing industry when importing from abroad. Manufacturing is now at an all-time high. It has increased by 9 per cent. since the recovery began. Given the high quality of productivity and the prospects for order books, I believe that the capacity exists to maintain that level.

Mr. Pearson: Is the Minister aware of the widespread concern and dismay among trade associations about the Governments's proposals to turn the trade fairs and missions budget into a competition, at the behest of the Deputy Prime Minister? Does the Minister realise that that will prevent necessary long-term planning and will jeopardise future success? Why does he not tell the Deputy Prime Minister to get the tanks off his lawn?

Mr. Lang: It is the policy of the Government, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, to which all Ministers subscribe. It is important to use Government funds as efficiently and cost-effectively as possible. The broad thrust of our policies—creating challenge schemes, getting the best value for the taxpayer—has been welcomed by industry, and that is reflected in its success in using the resources that we provide.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend recall that, in 1979, it took five men to produce a tonne of steel in this country compared with one man in Japan? Production output per man in the two countries is now equal, if not better in this country. Is that not a matter for great congratulation and a complete condemnation of a Labour Government and socialism?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to draw attention to the success of the steel industry, which is partly the result of privatisation and the release from the shackles of state ownership to which the Labour party subjected it. That success in productivity applies right across the manufacturing sector. Manufacturing productivity has risen by 80 per cent. since the Conservative Government came to power. We have largely closed the productivity gap with Germany and France, which widened under the last Labour Government. Whereas the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development table put the United Kingdom in 14th place in productivity growth under the last Labour Government, we are now top of the table.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the President of the Board of Trade join me in drawing the attention of the Confederation of British Industry and the international business community to the fact that west Cumbria has hundreds of thousands of square feet of modern industrial space waiting to be occupied by industries that we want to grow and make successful? We have a flexible, able and capable work force who want to work, and a development agency equipped to put together effective packages to help industries to come to our area. Will he help us now in this major effort to bring jobs to my under-employed community?

Mr. Lang: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's endorsement of the success of Conservative policies, which have delivered precisely the qualities to which he drew attention. I am sure that his reference to the available manufacturing space in Cumbria will have been noted, and as the manufacturing sector is expanding—it is up by 130,000 jobs in the past three years, which was never experienced under a Labour Government—the potential of Cumbria will no doubt come to the attention of expanding manufacturers before long.

Retail Sales

14. Mr. Amess: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on recent trends in retail sales. [10602]

Mr. John M. Taylor: There has generally been good growth in retail sales in recent months compared with the similar period in 1995. The latest official statistics show sales volumes 3.5 per cent. higher than a year ago.

Mr. Amess: Is my hon. Friend aware that many retailers in Basildon, Leigh-on-Sea and Southend are reporting an upturn in trade, in spite of it having been a very difficult time for them? Does he share their anxiety that the threatened imposition of the social chapter, the minimum wage and new taxation policies advocated by the Opposition might damage the recovery?

Mr. Taylor: I have a message for the voters of Basildon, Leigh-on-Sea and Southend: they are right to be anxious. I am anxious—my hon. Friend is right to be anxious—that nothing so dreadful should happen to these good people that they should be burdened with a Labour Government.

Mr. Sutcliffe: As we are talking about retail trends, is the Minister aware of the problem affecting mail order companies? Has he made representations to the Treasury on the problems that the industry faces and the huge effect that they could have on the jobs and services that it provides? Will he make representations to his colleagues in the Treasury to ensure that the VAT argument is sorted out?

Mr. Taylor: I am aware of the problems—as they are perceived to be—to which the hon. Gentleman refers, but he is right to identify them as matters for the Treasury. I would not be offended if he made his own direct representations.

Mrs. Peacock: How much of the increase in retail sales was funded with cash, and how much was funded on credit?

Mr. Taylor: I do not have the figures with me, but I believe that all the evidence suggests that increasing use is being made of credit facilities—not least, of course, of credit cards.

Trade (Thames Valley)

15. Mr. Rendel: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to improve trade between Thames Valley businesses and the rest of Europe. [10603]

Mr. Nelson: A dedicated export team has been set up at business link Thames Valley. An export development counsellor has been appointed and will take up his position in February, and there will be a Thames Valley export forum later this year.

Mr. Rendel: Is the Minister aware of research carried out recently by Bath university—not least on behalf of the Thames Valley economic partnership—which suggests that 60 per cent. of Thames Valley businesses are now trading with Europe, and that half those businesses find that their greatest problem is exchange rate fluctuation? What measures is the Minister taking to ensure that the number and extent of such fluctuations that his Government's economic incompetence has caused will be reduced in the future?

Mr. Nelson: I am aware of the report. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that there are numerous exporting companies—some 3,000, in fact—in the Thames Valley area. Half those companies are exporting to Europe, and are doing extremely well. Their success is reflected in the fact that a considerable number of American technology companies have set up in Newbury and Bracknell in particular, all as a result of Government policies. The hon. Gentleman laughs, but that is a fact. It is happening in his own constituency.

As for the future, the macro-economic stability of our economy is the surest guarantee that our export performance will continue, that the competitiveness of British goods and services abroad will continue to increase and that the substantial confidence in this country's capabilities—not least in the Thames Valley—that is demonstrated by investment from abroad will be maintained. All that is a good-news story.

Mr. Lidington: Does my hon. Friend agree that the trading competitiveness of small and medium enterprises throughout the Thames Valley would be gravely damaged if the minimum wage and social chapter were introduced, as advocated by the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) and his party? Is it not true that Liberal Democrat policies would mean longer dole queues in Newbury and throughout the Thames Valley region?

Mr. Nelson: My hon. Friend is right: the Liberal Democrats never knowingly undertax either. Whether through tax or through regulation, they would certainly propound policies that would damage the export prospects of numerous businesses, particularly small businesses. Many small businesses cannot afford to export at long distance, and tend to go to our doorstep markets in Europe. They would be the most severely affected by such policies. The hon. Member for Newbury nods in support; I hope that his constituents will understand the employment and investment implications that would be involved if those policies were ever pursued.

Power Supply Interruptions

16. Mr. Tipping: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the risk of interruptions to electricity and gas supplies in winter 1997. [10605]

Mr. Nelson: There is sufficient electricity generating capacity and gas supply to meet foreseeable demand, but my Department keeps the situation under review in consultation with the Office of Electricity Regulation, the Electricity Pool and the Office of Gas Supply.

Mr. Tipping: Will the Minister agree to look again at the issue of interruptible gas contracts? Can it be right that combined cycle gas turbine stations depend on such contracts, and will receive extra payments when they use alternative fuel?

Will the Minister also comment on the fact that hospitals have left themselves in an exposed position by depending on such contracts? That clearly gives cause for concern. What steps will the Minister take to try to resolve the difficulties?

Mr. Nelson: Although it is principally a matter for the parties, the Government properly take an interest in it. We were particularly interested in the report produced by Ofgas in December, which concluded that supply interruptions were most unlikely for customers on firm contracts. As the hon. Gentleman will know, the network code ensures continuity of supply in extreme weather. Every indication has shown that the code is working well, but the Government are not complacent about any of those matters—particularly the contracts to which he refers—and will keep them carefully under review.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: Does the Minister think that contracts for 250 hospitals should be interruptible? Hospital staff—such as those in Melrose this morning, at the Borders General hospital—have told me that they have only a 10-day supply of oil left to power their back-up generators, whereas British Gas has advised them that interruptible contracts allow hospitals to be cut off for 45 days. There are 250 other hospitals in the same position.

Mr. Nelson: The hon. Gentleman is most irresponsible if he is an alarmist on such matters.

Mr. Griffiths: How dare the Minister.

Mr. Nelson: I dare because the hon. Gentleman is irresponsible. He does not mention the fact that there have not been such interruptions, or that there are perfectly satisfactory and substantial back-up fuel supplies. He also does not state that such contracts offer distinct cost advantages to those who must be careful with how much they spend from the public purse. He peddles fears—which are not founded on reality—on matters of real concern to patients of the health care services.

Royal Yacht

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Michael Portillo): With permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the royal yacht.

Britannia has just left Portsmouth for her last voyage around the globe. Since the royal yacht was commissioned 43 years ago, she has travelled more than 1 million miles and undertaken almost 700 royal visits overseas—serving both as a royal residence and as a setting for official entertainment by Her Majesty. The royal yacht has also played an important part in national events, such as the silver jubilee and the anniversary of D-day and of VJ-day. She will be at the ceremonies marking the end of British sovereignty over Hong Kong.

Britannia has also lent her prestige to the promotion of British exports worldwide and the attraction of inward investment to Britain, and she has hosted numerous commercial events. The benefits that Britannia has brought to the British economy are invaluable.

It was therefore with great sadness that we announced, in 1994, that Britannia would be decommissioned this year. Although a beautifully maintained ship, she is old. She is increasingly difficult to maintain, and a major refit would be required to convert her to modern sea-going standards.

The decision stands to decommission Britannia. However, the Government have decided to commission a new purpose-built royal yacht, and have so informed Her Majesty the Queen. We have taken the decision because we believe that a royal yacht is an important national asset, which projects a prestigious image of Britain, adding powerfully to official occasions and assisting greatly in promoting British economic interests. Her Majesty the Queen has made it clear that she expects such a role to be the primary purpose of the new yacht. Moreover, the new yacht will at times provide Her Majesty with a suitable residence overseas, thus contributing to the impact of her visits and enabling her to represent our nation in an appropriate setting.

The vessel will be a symbol of the Crown, of the kingdom and of its maritime traditions. It will be designed to exhibit an enduring level of style, elegance and dignity appropriate to that role, and should act as a showcase for Britain's design and engineering skills. Her Majesty the Queen and the Duke of Edinburgh will be consulted on the design.

The Ministry of Defence will procure the new royal yacht. After a study to enable us to draw up a formal specification and a competition, a contract will be placed with a British shipyard. She will be crewed by the Royal Navy and fly the white ensign. The Queen will contribute to the furnishings and fittings of the state rooms and the royal apartments, drawing some items from Britannia.

We have considered carefully what would be appropriate for Britannia after decommissioning. The Government do not believe that it is appropriate to sell her to a new owner for private use. She will not put to sea again, but we are interested in proposals for a suitably prestigious use for Britannia in the public interest in the United Kingdom. Such a scheme would need to take account of the plan to transfer royal fittings to the new yacht. Any proposals for Britannia would need to guarantee that the yacht would be kept in excellent condition. If that cannot be assured, it would be better to see her scrapped than to see her deteriorate.

That leaves the matter of paying for the new yacht. The running costs should not be much more than half those of Britannia. They will be accounted for by the Ministry of Defence. For the capital cost of about £60 million, we have received many interesting proposals for private funding. The Government are grateful for them all, but we believe that a new royal yacht—a symbol of the nation's pride—should be funded not by sponsorship or subscription, but by the nation. The capital cost will be met from public funds in the reserve.

Britain can look forward to a new royal yacht in the new century. I trust that she will enter service in time for Her Majesty's golden jubilee in 2002.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I thank the Secretary of State for bringing the House this news, but we are disappointed that there has been no discussion whatever with the Opposition on the matter. As you know, Madam Speaker, it has been the convention that policy regarding Her Majesty is an all-party matter. Why was the Secretary of State not prepared to discuss the issue with the Opposition?

We, too, appreciate how valuable the Royal Yacht Britannia has been over the past 43 years. We recognise that she epitomises all the best traditions and the excellence of the British maritime industry from shipbuilding to ship repairing and, indeed, the manning and crewing of the vessel. She has epitomised the excellence of British craftsmanship and we wish her well in her final voyage.

The Secretary of State said that Britannia is to be decommissioned when she comes back from Hong Kong. Could he perhaps give us some information about what will fill the gap between the end of this year and the commissioning of the new royal yacht that he envisages in about three years' time? Will he also give us an idea of when he hopes to issue the tender and when he anticipates the contracts being signed?

Why has the Secretary of State rejected in such a cavalier manner the injection of private capital—[Laughter.] I have been told over the past few years that the partnership of private and public capital is the most efficient way of conducting public business. I recall being told by the Secretary of State that the best way of providing accommodation for our service families was by the injection of private capital. If it was good enough for the accommodation of our service families, why has he not considered it for the royal yacht?

As I understand it, the Secretary of State has announced that the royal yacht will be financed from existing public expenditure. He has admitted that the project has been under consideration for more than two and a half years, so why were the figures not included in the Budget? Will he also confirm that the £60 million to come out of the reserve will not be available for emergencies in the years ahead?

Mr. Portillo: The hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I miss a point or two. Part of his statement was drowned by laughter and I was not able to pick up every point, but I shall try to do my best.

After Britannia returns from Hong Kong, she will still have a programme running to the end of the year, probably within British territorial waters. After the end of 1997 and until the new ship enters service in 2001 or 2002, there will be a gap, with no royal yacht on the seas. That will not be as long a gap as the 14 or 15 years between the end of the Victoria and Albert and the commissioning of Britannia.

The hon. Gentleman asked why we had rejected out of hand the idea of using private capital. We did not reject it out of hand; we considered it carefully, but we did not believe it appropriate. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] If Labour Members had not learnt their capitalist lines like parrots, they would understand that some uses of private finance are appropriate and some are not. A royal yacht to support Her Majesty and this nation in our economic and export efforts is not an appropriate use of private money. I am very grateful to all those who stepped forward with suggestions for using private money, but it is not appropriate.

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): Why?

Mr. Portillo: If the hon. Gentleman does not realise why, he has simply learnt his lines and spouts them and no longer thinks—if he ever did. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I shall be calling hon. Members to put questions. Wait for it.

Mr. Portillo: The hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) asked how long it would take to build the yacht and when contracts would be let. I have told him that it should be in service in 2001 or 2002. It will take about two and a half years to build and the period up to the beginning of building will be taken up by deciding on the specification and by the competition.

The hon. Gentleman also asked why we did not discuss the matter with the Opposition. I do not regard today's statement as a constitutional one. I regard the yacht as an important aid to Her Majesty and to this country's economic interests, but not as a constitutional matter. I have come to the House and made a clear statement at the earliest opportunity. I should like to contrast that with the announcement of the previous royal yacht, when a Labour Government, during the 1951 general election campaign, issued a press notice from the Admiralty announcing that there would be a new royal yacht. In comparison, I have made a clean breast of my proposals to the House. The hon. Gentleman ought to study his history better before making such imputations against the Government.

Mr. Douglas Hurd (Witney): Is it not characteristic that new Labour should have announced its conversion to private finance on the wrong occasion? May I congratulate the Secretary of State on the Government's decision, including the decision on finance, which seems to me entirely right? I accept entirely what my right hon. Friend says about the usefulness to British finance and industry of Britannia and her successor, but at the heart of the issue, is there not the deeper point that a royal yacht is the best way of enabling the sovereign of our country to remind us—and, indeed, the world—of the links between these islands and the sea, which are fundamental to our past and our present?

Mr. Portillo: Indeed. My right hon. Friend is absolutely right. We are a maritime nation, a nation of traders, global thinkers and global doers. The royal yacht will help to emphasise all that and enable us to extend the hand of friendship and connection to our many allies and friends around the world. I am so pleased to have my right hon. Friend's support—not least for the funding, which is wholly appropriate to the dignity of the monarchy and the vessel that will support them in it.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North–East): I fear that the Secretary of State might be embarrassed by the amount of congratulation on his conversion to the virtues of public funding for such a matter. Does he share my disappointment that the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), for whom I have the greatest respect, did not seem able to match his commitment? Is not the virtue of what the Secretary of State has proposed the fact that the vessel can assist Britain's economic and trade interests and provide dignified and often secure accommodation for the royal family while they fulfil their duties abroad? In view of the fact that the yacht's running costs are to be met from the defence budget, is it envisaged that the vessel should have any role in time of war?

Mr. Portillo: On the last point, it is not envisaged that the vessel should have any role in time of war. I cannot of course predict the future, but it is not expected that she will double as a hospital ship, for example, as was the plan with Britannia. The hon. and learned Gentleman is absolutely right that the vessel is secure accommodation for Her Majesty. She will be escorted and protected by the Royal Navy. It is an admirable way in which to protect our economic interests and to underline our ties with the Commonwealth. The Commonwealth values the vessel as well as our own country.

Given all those advantages and the vessel's versatility, it is indeed disappointing that Her Majesty's loyal Opposition were not able to say today that they support it and would continue the project were they elected.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): May I thank my right hon. Friend for today's decision? It will mean much rejoicing in the Isle of Wight. Will he forgive me for mentioning pounds, shillings and pence? As the new royal yacht will play a bigger role in promoting Great Britain plc than Britannia, may I remind my right hon. Friend that the arrival of Britannia in Cowes week every year makes a substantial contribution to the Isle of Wight's economy? I would hope that I could hang on his words and that, perhaps, Britannia will sail on in UK waters beyond 1997. That would make a big difference to us on the island. Her arrival is very much treasured every year by my constituents.

Mr. Portillo: My hon. Friend has been a notable and strong advocate of the replacement of the royal yacht and I can understand its impact on the Isle of Wight, as on all of us. However, I want this statement to be entirely straightforward and without ambiguity. We do not intend that Britannia should run on beyond the end of 1997. I do not want to mislead my hon. Friend on that; I want to make it perfectly clear that there will be a new royal yacht in 2001 or 2002.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): It is hard to conceive of who has been more ill advised, the Government in offering the matter to the palace in an attempt to bring it into the political game, or the palace in making the mistake of accepting it.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Unworthy!

Mr. Williams: I am allowed to make my point. Is it not a fact that, over the next three years, there will be unprecedented cuts in social services? I cannot understand a sense of priority that diverts £60 million more away from such services. Halving the running costs will still cost £10,000 a day. If the royal yacht is a symbol, it is one of extravagance and irrelevance.

Mr. Portillo: I found the right hon. Gentleman's comments ungenerous, inaccurate and wrong. It is entirely the Government's decision as to whether there is a royal yacht, and although we have informed Her Majesty, Her Majesty did not request this. Her Majesty's assent is not required in that sense. Her Majesty is pleased with the decision, but it is not a matter for her. Any blame to be attached should be attached to the Government only. The right hon. Gentleman is not right to bring Her Majesty's name into the matter, as he sought to do.

This is public expenditure and we are entitled to talk the language of priorities and proportion. The social security budget is £90,000 million a year. We are talking about spending £60 million for a yacht that will last about 30 years—a capital cost of £2 million a year. I am sure that one after another, hon. Gentlemen and hon. Ladies will rise in the Chamber to pay tribute to the many ways in which this vessel will contribute to our nation economically, but also to the way in which it will contribute to our prestige, status and pride. I know that I have lost the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) now, because he does not understand those three words.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): Nowhere will my right hon. Friend's statement be more welcome than in Gosport, with its Navy connections and loyal traditions. May I ask further about the future of Britannia? Her home port has been Portsmouth and she has been berthed in Portsmouth harbour for many years. Nowhere would her future be more secure and more applauded than in Portsmouth harbour, as a centrepiece of the exciting millennium project there. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that that suggestion will be given full consideration?

Mr. Portillo: Certainly it would be given consideration. I was in Portsmouth recently on HMS Victory, and I am aware of the marvellous heritage of the city and of the ships berthed there, which represent some of the maritime history of this nation. However, I must repeat the conditions that I made clear during my statement. The proposal must take account of the fact that at least some of the fittings will have been stripped out from Britannia. The yacht must have a prestigious use; it must be in the public interest; it must be in the United Kingdom; and we need a sponsor who can guarantee the excellence of her condition. I stress again that it would be distressing for all of us to see Britannia deteriorate—we would rather see her scrapped than deteriorate.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): The present Britannia has made a valuable contribution to Britain's presence overseas, both diplomatically and commercially, and I have no doubt that the Government have made a good decision in ensuring that we have a worthy successor. May I particularly congratulate the Government on their conversion to the use of selective public sector purchase? May I ask the Secretary of State to give the assurance that the yacht will be built in a British shipyard? Will he make it absolutely clear that on no account will he allow the European Commission to insist upon open competition among European shipyards? Will he give a pledge that, even if Mr. van Miert refers him to the European Court of Justice, he will not allow the Commission to interfere and to get away with it?

Mr. Portillo: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for the generous way in which he welcomed the statement. The yacht will be built in a British shipyard—for security reasons, the yacht should be built here. In any case, this will be a royal yacht and it is appropriate that it should be built in a British shipyard. If there were any challenge to that decision, I would defend it every inch of the way.

Mr. David Martin (Portsmouth, South): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement about the existing royal yacht and its replacement, and I particularly welcome the fact that the yacht will continue to be crewed by the Royal Navy. Will he confirm that I will have his personal support for the proposal that the new royal yacht should be home based at Portsmouth, as the existing yacht has been for so many years?

Mr. Portillo: My hon. Friend has been generous in his welcome for the statement, and he has been a great advocate for today's decision—as many others who have spoken today have been. I ask him by all means to open his campaign today, but not to press me for a final decision on that—although I understand perfectly the strength of his claim.

Ms Rachel Squire (Dunfermline, West): I certainly welcome a statement that will bring work to Britain's hard-pressed shipyards, which have suffered so severely from the cuts in the Government's defence expenditure. I should welcome the return of the Royal Yacht Britannia to the Clyde, where she was constructed so skilfully and ably many years ago. However, the Secretary of State should give the House more details on why it was decided to use public money for the capital costs of Britannia.

Mr. Portillo: On the last point, I repeat that it was because we thought that it was appropriate to the dignity of the monarchy. On the earlier points, if the hon. Lady is concerned about our hard-pressed shipyards, I would remind her that those at Barrow would not be building a fourth Trident boat if it were not for the fact that there was a Conservative victory at the previous general election.

I remind the hon. Lady that it is the pledge of her Government—[HON. MEMBERS: "Aha."]—of her party if it were in government, to have a defence review. The hon. Member for South Shields has said clearly that it would be a review with painful consequences. If her party were to win the general election, she would discover soon enough what those painful consequences were, because they would be visited on her constituents by the cuts that would be made by a Labour party in power.

When the shadow Chancellor was asked directly by Jim Naughtie on the "Today" programme yesterday whether he would have to cut defence in order to fund everything else within unchanged public spending ceilings, he simply refused to answer. He dare not answer the question, because it is clear that defence is the place from which any other spending increases would be funded. Defence under Labour would be a soft touch for any Chancellor.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): May I thank and congratulate my right hon. Friend most warmly? Does he, however, accept that Britannia is part of this country's maritime heritage and that it would be as appropriate to maintain it at public expense, either as part of the complex at Portsmouth or at Greenwich, as to pay for the new yacht? Will he think carefully about that and about keeping Britannia in service until the new yacht is ready?

Mr. Portillo: I am glad that the statement pleased my hon. Friend, but it is a statement with firm edges. We do not intend to keep Britannia in service beyond the end of 1997, and we do not believe that it would be a suitable use of public funds overall to keep it as some kind of museum. Others may wish to make proposals for a public interest use of the yacht, and I dare say that those people could apply for funding in the usual way—to the national lottery, for example—but we do not intend to launch a Government initiative to keep Britannia in any particular form. The challenge to those who would come forward is clear: suggest a use that is prestigious and suitable and by all means apply for the funding that is available; but any proposal must keep Britannia in excellent condition.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Why did the Secretary of State, in responding to my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams), have to turn to insolence, pomposity and arrogance, knowing that out there in Britain, probably 30 or 40 per cent. of the people—it may be more—do not agree with the monarchy? Those views should be expressed in the House. The Prime Minister, on being elected, talked about a classless society.

Is it not right that some of us should say that £60 million should not be spent on a yacht for the royal family when it could be spent on kids who are being lined up in hospital and kicked out; on people who are waiting in corridors on trolleys; on schoolchildren who do not have pencils or even classrooms, in some cases; on pensioners, who are being robbed blind; or on the 4 million people who do not have a job? Surely there is a case to be made that the yacht should not be built. There is a language of priorities that says that we should not spend any more money on this aristocracy, which has been pushing its own self-destruct button for the past decade.

Mr. Portillo: There is a language of priorities and there is a language of proportion. The hon. Gentleman has no sense of proportion. He equates the billions of pounds that we put into the health service and social security with a few million pounds that will be spent on this project over several years and which is, in any case, economically justified. There is more to it than economics. There is national esteem and pride, which he does not share or even understand. Some might think that he was arrogant in pontificating with such self-satisfaction and certainty about the views of 30 or 40 per cent. of the population. I criticised the right hon. Member for Swansea, West not for his views but because he blamed Her Majesty for a decision that was not hers.

Sir Keith Speed (Ashford): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the all-party maritime group, which I chair, welcomes this decision, for which we have campaigned for more than two years? The new yacht should not only be built in Britain, but contain the finest British marine technology, to show the rest of the world that we still lead in maritime affairs.

Mr. Portillo: Speaking from his position and with his background, my hon. Friend's approval is especially welcome. I emphasised in my statement that the ship will provide a showcase for British skills, engineering and design. That, too, will be of great benefit to our nation.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): May I assure the right hon. Gentleman that most people throughout the country will warmly welcome this statement? Does he accept from me that most people throughout this country very much appreciate the services rendered by Her Majesty the Queen and Prince Charles to Britain? Does he not agree with me that the Carlton TV programme was a load of unutterable rubbish and totally unrepresentative of British public feeling? [Interruption.] I will be heard. Does he not finally agree that very few people in this country want to see a series of political presidents?

Mr. Portillo: If I may add to that, very few people in this country want to see a brave Labour Member who speaks up for the monarchy being barracked by his colleagues in the way that the hon. Gentleman was. I appreciate his remarks. Apart from their feelings about the monarchy, many people will look forward to the 400 or 500 jobs that I estimate will be created by the contract. As was said by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Ms Squire), who has left the Chamber, the shipyards will welcome the work.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): Does my right hon. Friend accept that, with the exception of a few Opposition Members, the nation will warmly applaud the Government's decision? Her Majesty the Queen and other members of the royal family will be able to visit the Commonwealth and other nations in a royal yacht that is fit to show the fine maritime heritage of this country. Could he say a little more about the design of the yacht? May I hazard the thought that, after free competition, and bearing it in mind that Britannia was built on the Clyde, the new royal yacht might also be built there?

Mr. Portillo: Certainly, the Clyde would be a candidate, but there must be a competition and a specification. In welcoming my right hon. Friend's remarks, I must make it clear that the new yacht's specification will be different from that of Britannia. In those days, the designers envisaged that the royal family would travel long distances on board. Today, they travel by air and use the yacht as a residence. Modern technology will allow lower running costs and a smaller crew. There will be substantial differences, but some important things will stay the same. The yacht must be prestigious. It must carry status. It must have royal apartments and state rooms that are suitable. It must create a great impression when people visit it, as something special, something remarkable, and something uniquely British.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): May I, on behalf of not only my party but well over 1 million people in Northern Ireland, warmly welcome the statement? Even 77 years after the Republic separated from the kingdom, there are those in the Republic who still have royal yacht clubs and other titles because they, too, are royalists. May I express the hope that when the time comes for the competition, Harland will be one of the bidders, maintaining a tremendous tradition? As a Belfast Member, I hope that there will be those with the vision to bring Britannia to the new Lagan waterfront, which is making Belfast boom. Amidst all the cringing, it is encouraging to realise, when people think that we are bankrupt, that the £90 million is coming from the reserve.

Mr. Portillo: It is £60 million. I welcome what the hon. Gentleman says. I know that the decision will be welcome to his constituents and to, I think, the vast majority in the Province. He rightly points out that it will be welcome north and south of the border in the island of Ireland. I am pleased that he reminded us of that. I thank him for the two bids, one in respect of Britannia and the other in respect of the new yacht. They have been carefully noted. Again, I recognise that those claims could be very strong.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): Does my right hon. Friend agree that many of our people, including some living in the constituencies of Opposition Members who poured scorn on the decision, owe their jobs in part to the £2 billion of trade that the royal yacht has won overseas during the time that she has been operating as our national flagship? Does he further agree that in future the Britannia replacement should be called our national flagship, because that is what she is, rather than a yacht, which conjures up visions of junketing around the Mediterranean? If my right hon. Friend is thinking in terms of berthing her, she should be berthed in London as our national flagship, where most people can see her, rather than being tucked away in Portsmouth.

As my right hon. Friend is canvassing opinion on laying up the old Britannia, rather than confining his market to the United Kingdom, will he bear in mind the dependent territories? The rundown of his Department's expenditure in Gibraltar has led to that dependent territory having to switch its emphasis to creating an offshore finance centre, which is precisely the sort of economy that the royal yacht has hitherto been used to promote. Perhaps if he is looking for a fitting final resting place for Britannia, Gibraltar should be the place for her to berth. That would be welcome and it would give just the right message to Spain.

Mr. Portillo: I am tempted to call, "Any more bids?" I heard very well what my hon. Friend said, but I reiterate what I said in the statement—that we shall be looking for a use of public interest in the United Kingdom, and that stands. I cannot accept that anything that was in Portsmouth would be tucked away. I understand the promotion of the case for London. It is not within my authority by any means to propose that the royal yacht should be called anything other than the royal yacht. That is a contentious suggestion.

My hon. Friend is right to recall how much the royal yacht does for the promotion of trade and how much good it can do for the dependent territories. However, I do not want the yacht to be seen simply as a commercial transaction, simply in pounds and pence. It also involves questions of our feeling about ourselves as a nation, and that matters, too.

Miss Kate Hoey (Vauxhall): I warmly welcome the announcement to replace Britannia. Anyone who has seen the thousands of people who flock to see Britannia anywhere in the world—I particularly look back to the pictures from South Africa last year—must know the importance not only to the economy but to the whole image. Given the announcement last week of £500 million—a large amount—to be spent from the millennium fund in Greenwich, which is a project that we can support, although there are certainly some queries about the amount, why has the Secretary of State not considered taking £60 million from that fund, so that the money comes from public money, but money that has been paid for by people through the national lottery?

Mr. Portillo: The answer is simple. The legislation governing the national lottery does not allow us to use it as a substitute for proper public spending, and that is an important rule. This is a burden that properly falls on the nation and the taxpayer. While it would have been possible to think about private finance, it is not possible to use the national lottery for that purpose.

I very much welcome what the hon. Lady said and I am hoping that, given the pressure this afternoon from at least some Labour Members, by the end of the statement we might hear from the Labour Front-Bench team that it has decided that it wants to back the Government's action and to confirm that, in the unlikely event that Labour was elected, it would maintain the pledge that we have made today. Although it is clear that the Labour party is badly split on the issue and that the old republican guard is here in strength, none the less many hon. Members such as the hon. Lady would welcome such a commitment.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip–Northwood): In congratulating my right hon. Friend on his admirable decision, which was announced in the most felicitous language, may I be practical and ask that the specification include a helicopter deck? Secondly, could the ship's company of the Royal Navy, who take a great pride in fulfilling that most important role for the duration of their tour, from time to time include distinguished members of the Royal Naval Reserve, who would enormously appreciate the honour of serving on board?

Mr. Portillo: I can accept my hon. Friend's first suggestion straight away. Of course, a helicopter deck should be part of a modern ship. The possibility of arriving and leaving by helicopter and, indeed, of evacuating by helicopter in an emergency, should be part of the design. My hon. Friend's second suggestion is extremely important, and I should like to consider it. I mentioned state rooms and, of course, there must be provision for a band to play on board, because that is an important part of the image, prestige and projection associated with the royal yacht.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): Given that the public are paying for the yacht, will they be able to visit it when the Queen is not in residence, which will be most of the time? Has the Secretary of State given any thought to a dual use—what about using it to take disadvantaged children from our inner cities to a foreign destination for a holiday?

Mr. Portillo: I must make it clear to the hon. Gentleman that we have never considered financing the yacht out of swaps, as I believe he used to do in his early days. The royal yacht attracts many people, all over the world. I would not propose making any great changes in the usage of recent years. No doubt the way in which the yacht is used will evolve over time, but it is important that it should be there principally for the promotion of Britain and of her economic interests abroad.

Mr. Bill Walker (North Tayside): Does my right hon. Friend understand that the Scottish people will be delighted at the proposal to replace the Royal Yacht Britannia? They will hope that it will be based on the Clyde after it ceases to be operational. Secondly, they will hope that the Clyde will have the opportunity to build the new ship, just as we built Britannia. We should also like my right hon. Friend to note that the Scottish national party has called for a bicycling monarchy, and there would be no prospect of a new Britannia being built on the Clyde with such a monarchy.

Mr. Portillo: Let me assure my hon. Friend that no part of the specification will include room for bicycles. During my hon. Friend's remarks, I heard my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland say, "Hear, hear." I am sure that he was doing that clearly within the bounds of collective responsibility, but none the less my hon. Friend was well heard on the Front Bench.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I welcome the statement, although I have some suspicions about the motivation that may lie behind its timing. Will the Secretary of State say a little more about what he regards as being appropriate or not appropriate in respect of total or partial private financing? Why is it not appropriate to have any private financing for the royal yacht, given that he recently decided that it was entirely appropriate to sell all the married quarters of all our soldiers, sailors and airmen in England and Wales to Nomura, a Japanese bank?

Mr. Portillo: I do not think that it is the duty of the state to own houses, but I do think that it is the duty of the state to support the monarchy.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his personal commitment to this project over the past two and a half years and on winning the arguments that must have occurred in the Cabinet? Given that the new royal yacht can be built in only one location, can he give an undertaking that there will be a proper symbolism in its construction and fitting out of the fact that it represents the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland? Can he remind the House of any conventions that might exist on what the royal yacht should be called? Have the Government given any consideration to that matter and has Her Majesty expressed an opinion?

Mr. Portillo: We do not yet know the name of the yacht. Undoubtedly, that question will be considered and many suggestions will be made; Her Majesty will certainly be consulted. My hon. Friend, who also fought hard for this decision, makes an excellent point that the yacht must be representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. Her Majesty the Queen is the Queen of the United Kingdom and her yacht should reflect that.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Was the Secretary of State in the House on Friday, when we witnessed another spending decision? A Bill on the wind chill factor, which was presented by one of my hon. Friends, sought to provide £60 million to give essential life-saving help to poor pensioners. The question that the country will ask about Government priorities is why the Government do not have £60 million to give to poor pensioners, but do have it to allow one family to travel in a billionaire life style.

Mr. Portillo: Yes, but the cold weather payments scheme was invented by the Conservative Government—it did not exist when the Labour party was last in office. Time and again, it has been improved in its generosity and extent. The Labour party did not make those payments. When the hon. Gentleman blathers on, as he has just done, let him admit all that the Government have done in providing a social security budget of £90,000 million. Let him then go away and talk the language of comparisons and proportion, about £60 million over 30 years for a royal yacht.

Sir Cyril Townsend (Bexleyheath): While regretting the lack of forward planning some years ago, despite prodding from Conservative Members, which means that inevitably there will be a delay, I warmly welcome this sensible decision. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the offers of financial support from commercial and City organisations that were put to the royal yacht parliamentary group and others are a signal of how much interest is felt in such sectors for the concept of a royal yacht? Does he further agree that having a royal yacht is a tried and tested formula and a goed way of presenting the latest in British technology and expertise?

Mr. Portillo: First, I congratulate my hon. Friend on his recent knighthood—this is my first opportunity to do so. He is right to say that tremendous interest was shown in the matter, and the interest expressed by the business community tells us a lot about what is happening in the general community and about the spirit in this nation. I entirely reject the remarks of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) in that respect. The yacht is tried and tested; the nation has benefited from it; it has helped our sovereign in her work; and I believe that almost the whole House will warmly welcome today's announcement.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): May I support the introduction of a vessel that will be unique to the United Kingdom as an aid for the royal family? It has been suggested in the past, however, that the royal vessel could be used as a training ship when Her Majesty was not using it. There is also the question of the royal family's future. We are told that the royal family will have to use passenger trains and that no extra provision will be made for special aircraft. The Secretary of State says that it is important that the royal family should have a vessel financed from public funds, but that it is not important for the royal family to have their own train. What is the difference?

[Mr. William O'Brien]

The nation will be confused about why we are taking this stand today when, in the recent past, the royal family have been told that they should use public transport. Why could not the royal yacht be financed by private sector money, given that the Government say that the royal family want to be involved with the private sector and move away from dependency on the state? Why have the Government changed their stance on that issue?

Mr. Portillo: First, I remind the hon. Gentleman of what I have already said several times: this decision was for the Government, not the royal family. The Government believe that it is for the nation to finance something that so closely touches the monarchy's dignity. I can continue to repeat that all afternoon if the hon. Gentleman likes, but it remains our firm position.

The hon. Gentleman asked why we did not choose the training ship design, which was an imaginative idea. We took the view that the vessel's primary purpose is to combine use by the monarchy with promotion of Britain abroad and of our economic interests. To confuse that primary purpose with something quite different, which would be difficult to make compatible, seemed to make the matter too complicated and likely to fail in its primary purpose.

As Secretary of State for Defence, I am responsible for announcing this decision, which has been taken by the Cabinet. We have taken that decision because of all the reasons that I have given about how the yacht helps to project Britain and the monarchy abroad. Those reasons stand on their own legs and are self-explanatory.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): May I assure my right hon. Friend that nowhere will the Government's decision to build another royal yacht be more happily received than in Lancaster, with its special relationship with Her Majesty in her style as Duke of Lancaster?

Mr. Portillo: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend. The connection between Lancaster and Her Majesty is clear and well known. I am relieved that, to the best of my knowledge, Lancaster has no shipyard, so I do not have to chalk up another bid.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Thank you very much.

BILL PRESENTED

Government Communications Headquarters (Restoration Of Trade Union Rights)

Mr. David Winnick presented a Bill to provide for persons employed at the Government Communications Headquarters to have the right to belong to an independent trade union of their choice; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Thursday 1 May, and to be printed [Bill 76].

Building Societies (Distributions)

4.22 pm

Mr. Douglas French (Gloucester): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the law in respect of distribution of assets on the take-over or conversion of a building society.

The Bill's aim is to remove a serious injustice being done to tens of thousands of building society customers by the way in which building societies choose to allocate shares as they abandon mutual status and convert to public companies. The House will be aware of recent announcements by the Halifax, the Alliance and Leicester and the Woolwich building societies, each setting out a slightly different methodology, and of the preparations being made for flotation by the Northern Rock.

Under section 100 of the Building Societies Act 1986, building societies have considerable discretion as to who may qualify for shares and to what extent. The Act is more prescriptive when it comes to cash bonuses arising from the takeover of a building society but the same injustice arises and the Bill covers both circumstances.

The broad principle adopted, with variations, by the societies is that the first-named person on the account is the member, and members may qualify once only as saver and as borrower, irrespective of the number of accounts held.

The problem arises with joint accounts and trustee accounts, where the trustee is the first name on the account and the underlying beneficiary is the second or subsequent name. In some cases the trust is a formal relationship, as between a solicitor and a client. In most cases, it is an informal relationship where, in order to help an elderly, disabled or handicapped person who cannot look after his or her own account, a relative or carer becomes the trustee with the responsibility to sign the account.

If the carer as trustee has only one account, he or she will have a fiduciary duty to ensure that the beneficiary receives the share allocation. If the carer as trustee is the first-named person and has more than one account, even though those accounts may be entirely unconnected, only one share allocation will be made.

The problem is most acute in cases of multiple trusteeship. The matron of a nursing home, for example, may have been asked to look after the accounts of, say, 20 elderly patients. She will find that there will be only one allocation of shares to be divided up between all the patients. The same applies to the warden of a hospice, the manager of an old people's home, or a solicitor or accountant who is a trustee for a number of clients. Charities, associations and youth clubs can all be placed at a disadvantage.

Under the terms of the Halifax conversion, some recognition is given to the aggregate balance of the accounts, but no such provision is made by the Alliance and Leicester.

Sometimes anomalous situations arise from a detail as elementary as the design of the form completed by the customers when opening their building society accounts. That applies particularly to accounts opened for children. Some of those accounts are adversely affected, but others are not.

Unfortunately, second-named account holders cannot risk taking the obvious step of changing the order of names on their account in anticipation of future flotations. If they do that, they may break the continuity of the account and render it ineligible anyway.

To tackle the problem, my Bill requires building societies to recognise the legitimate entitlement of underlying beneficiaries to receive the same allocation of shares as every other customer, where it can be shown that they would have been the first-named account holder and qualified in their own right, but for the presence of a trustee. The Bill requires converting and merging building societies to establish a reserve or suspense account charged against assets, from which to meet legitimate claims from underlying beneficiaries of trustee accounts.

No onus at all is placed upon the societies to track down those who may be eligible. That would be an impossible task and a daunting prospect, and may well explain why societies have been unwilling to face up to the problem, of which they have been only too well aware.

Instead, the Bill requires societies in the course of normal notification to their members to tell them that claims within the specific definition will be considered, and that claimants should submit details of their circumstances and allow time for the society to satisfy itself that the criteria have been met. The society can then make a payment of equivalent value out of the fund set aside for the purpose. It will not cost the society anything extra. The society will, after all, only be returning to its mutual members the fruits of mutuality.

The most significant although not the only category of people to benefit from the Bill will be the disabled, the handicapped, the sick, the elderly and those who, through misfortune, are unable to look after themselves. That is why leading charities, such as Mencap, SENSE, and the Royal National Institute for the Blind, are strong supporters of the Bill.

One must ask how the building societies could have felt comfortable producing a share distribution formula that they knew was likely to exclude those most needing to benefit. We might also ask why at least one society, with expensive advice at its disposal, should have told its members that they were constrained by legislation from addressing the problem. In fact, nothing in current legislation prevents converting building societies from including in their share distributions the second-named account holder or beneficiary in circumstances where they would have qualified if they had been named first.

For share distributions, my Bill requires building societies to do what the law already permits them to do. For bonus distributions, my Bill amends the 1986 Act to make it possible and then requires building societies to act. Such a procedure will prevent building societies from attracting a great deal of unwelcome and unnecessary criticism of the type that so marred the Lloyds bank takeover of the Cheltenham and Gloucester. It will help to preserve the high esteem in which the building society movement has been held for so long but which has been severely tested in recent times.

The procedure outlined in my Bill could have been adopted voluntarily by the Woolwich, the Halifax and the Alliance and Leicester. With the benefit of hindsight, I am sure they would now acknowledge that they underestimated the public's strong belief in fair play. Fortunately, the Alliance and Leicester is showing clear signs of a change of heart, but the Halifax still perceives technical obstacles. Even though those societies have already sent out their conversion documents, I hope that—within the constraints of company law—they will make every effort to find a formula that enables them to follow the requirements of my Bill.

There is an opportunity for a go-ahead society to blaze a trail and set an example of best practice. I hope very much that that will happen. However, once the Bill is passed, societies that convert or merge in future will have no choice: they will have to recognise the rights of underlying beneficiaries, and a massive injustice will have been corrected. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Douglas French, Sir Andrew Bowden, Mr. John Butterfill, Mr. David Evennett, Mr. John Greenway, Sir John Hannam, Mr. Hartley Booth, Mr. David Hunt, Mr. Peter Luff, Sir Geoffrey Pattie, Mr. James Pawsey and Mr. Michael Stephen.

BUILDING SOCIETIES (DISTRIBUTIONS)

Mr. Douglas French accordingly presented a Bill to amend the law in respect of distribution of assets on the take-over or conversion of a building society: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 14 February, and to be printed [Bill 77].

Orders of the Day

Finance Bill

(Clauses Nos. 40, 62, 68, 82 and 92 and Schedules Nos. 7 and 13.)

Considered in Committee.

[MR. MICHAEL MORRIS in the Chair]

Ordered,

That the Order in which proceedings in Committee of the Whole House on the Finance Bill are to be taken shall be Clause 82, Schedule 13, Clause 62, Clause 92, Clause 40, Clause 68, Schedule 7.—[Mr. Wells.]

4.35 pm

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I understand that it would be convenient and appropriate to discuss schedule 13 while debating whether clause 82 should stand part of the Bill. The clause is short and the meat of the argument is to be found within the schedule. The amendment refers to the schedule. I would not anticipate two separate debates.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): The Chair is happy to accede to that request, as long as all parties are agreed that that course should be followed. It seems that there is no disagreement. That being so, we shall take schedule 13 with clause 82.

Clause 82

WRITING-DOWN ALLOWANCES ON LONG-LIFE ASSETS

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

The Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take the following: Schedule 13—Capital Allowances on Long-Life Assets.

Amendment No. 3, in schedule 13, page 188, line 18, at end add—

11. The Treasury shall produce a report each year which—

(a) describes the response of companies to the withdrawal of fiscal support for investment in long-life assets made effective by this Schedule, and

(b) assesses the costs of operating the provisions of this Schedule and whether they are generating test cases before the Commissioners and the Courts.'.

Mr. Darling: The clause and the attached schedule, according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget speech, are designed to ensure that the writing-down allowances that various Finance Acts provide for should be brought into line with normal accountancy practice. I think that, as a matter of principle, no one would argue with that. We have no objection in principle to the clause, but we would like to take the opportunity to raise a number of matters that arise from the operation of the clause and the attached schedule, and at the same time try to elicit from the Minister further clarification of what the Government intend.

The Committee will see, when examining the amendment, that it is intended, if agreed to, to allow the Government to bring forward, in effect, a report on the effect of the workings of the clause and the schedule. Whenever Parliament provides for allowances, or restricts or curtails allowances, it is important to be sure about the effect of what is proposed. There are many occasions when proposals are brought before the House of Commons and passed into law which turn out a year or two later not to have the intended consequence.

Perhaps it would be convenient to dispose of the principle of allowances, a principle on which I think there is broad agreement on both sides of the Chamber. The principle is that allowances should be designed to assist and encourage investment. They should be carefully worded so that they achieve the specific aim that lies behind them. They should not be allowed to distort investment decisions. Equally, the cost of the allowance should not be disproportionate to the gain. That has happened in the past. The Government's objective is to stop the cost of the allowance becoming disproportionate to the benefit gained. That is something that would generally be supported. Allowances should be in place to assist and encourage the investment process. At the same time, they should be fair. That is a point to which I shall return shortly.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): It is my recollection that not so long ago the Opposition argued for enhanced capital allowances—indeed, a possible return to 100 per cent. first-year allowances. I certainly remember that in 1984, when we moved to a lower rate of income tax and lower capital allowances, there was opposition from the Labour party. Is it now the Opposition's policy to pursue what I would consider to be a more sensible approach, which is to follow accounting depreciation?

Mr. Darling: I suppose it was predictable that the hon. Gentleman would not be able to resist departing from a serious matter to make rather a silly point. If he cares to write, I shall look into what happened in 1984. I was not a Member of this place at the time and I do not remember what happened that year.

Successive Governments have accepted that capital allowances can be justified provided that there is a relationship between the cost of the allowance and the gain. That is the intention, which we want to support. It has always been the position that the Government of the day must review the working of allowances to ensure that they are cost effective and are achieving what was intended initially. Successive Governments have supported that principle.

It is clear that the level and rate of allowances will vary from time to time. I repeat, however, what I said at the outset of my remarks. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) was listening at the time. I said that there is much to be said for ensuring that allowances do not distort investment decisions, and that there should in general be an alignment between what is normal accounting practice, normal business practice and the provisions of the appropriate Finance Act. There is no difference between us on that. Having established that principle—we do not need to waste time arguing the point—I shall deal with a number of points, some of which may interest the hon. Member for Beaconsfield, who tabled amendment No. 11, because he is on to the same point.

What immediately strikes anyone reading this provision is that although the intention is that the law will follow established accounting practice, that does not, I understand, happen. Let me give an example. The aeroplane manufacturing industry has drawn the Government's attention, and certainly our attention, to the fact that although aircraft are an asset and are capable of lasting more than 25 years, and therefore are caught by the provisions of the Bill, many operators in the United Kingdom do not use their aircraft for anything like 25 years; they sell them after 15 years. Therefore, they believe that they are discriminated against. Perhaps they have a point.

I can understand the Government's view that lines have to be drawn somewhere, but considering that railway rolling stock is exempt, I just wonder what the Government's rationale is. Although aeroplanes are caught by the provisions of the Bill, it is arguable that a great deal of an aeroplane that is still flying 25 years after its original manufacture may not be 25 years old, because parts will have been replaced during its working life. The same cannot be said of a railway carriage, a large part of which is the same railway carriage as left the workshop many years earlier.

Perhaps there is something of which we are not aware that has led the Government to exempt railways but to include aeroplanes. It will be interesting to hear from the Financial Secretary the Government's thinking on that point. If there is a rational explanation, I am sure that we will all accept it. Aeroplane manufacturers are concerned that they will be discriminated against. Perhaps I should return to one or two of those points later. It would be helpful to know why railways have been exempted.

I understand why ships have been exempted, because every year in Committee and in the proceedings relating to the Finance Bill we debate shipbuilding, and hon. Members on both sides of the House have been sympathetic to the plight of British shipbuilders. It will be interesting, however, to know why the Government want to exempt railways. Some people have unkindly suggested that it is a favour to those who have acquired the privatised railways, that they need these incentives to make ends meet, or perhaps they were promised this during the privatisation process. We are not all cynical, however, and it may be wrong to suggest such things, but it is difficult to see why so many other people have been included whereas railways have been exempted.

I notice in the explanatory memorandum that the Government issue to all members of the Committee that the rules will apply, in the words of the memorandum,

"only to companies that invest heavily in long life assets."

The memorandum does not, obviously, have the force of law, but what Ministers say can be of help in interpreting what Parliament means, which brings me to my second point.

In regard to what is said in the memorandum, the terms and language of schedule 13 are vague. I understand that of necessity it may not be possible to have the precise language that one might like, but bearing in mind the fact that investment decisions may well turn on the allowances that are available, it would be helpful if the Minister could say what he believes the words "invest heavily" actually mean. Presumably an aircraft manufacturer, for example, will almost exclusively invest in assets that have a long life. What do we say to someone who makes the components of an aircraft that might or might not last 25 years? I do not know. Some parts may well last that long; others will not. That is clearly of some importance.

[Mr. Darling]

The same is true of the oil industry. It has been put to me by people involved in the oil industry that many of the decisions as to whether to invest in a new field are highly marginal. There are many considerations, of which capital allowances are only one, but it could be the critical factor. Some of the plant that is required will last more than 25 years; some will not. It will be helpful—I cannot find this in the schedule—to know in precise terms what the Government have in mind, and the definition of the assets that are to be caught.

Apparently, there is a further problem. Under the Bill, the test of the lifetime of an asset is whether it is capable of lasting for more than 25 years. I understand that it is normal business practice to write down plant according to the lifetime anticipated by the user or owner of the asset. Let us take the example of an aeroplane again. An aeroplane may be intended to operate for 15 or 20 years; the asset is then sold to someone else, who may use it for five or six years, and subsequently sold again and again, being used for progressively shorter periods. As the Bill stands, it is possible that people in possession of assets that are capable of being used for more than 25 years will find that, through no fault of their own, they will not receive the full allowances.

4.45 pm

In view of what I said at the beginning of my speech, I should point out that I am not arguing that allowances should be granted indiscriminately when they may not always be justified; but there seems to be an anomaly in both the scope and the definition of the clause and schedule. Although the stated intention is to align accounting practice with the practice of the law, many individuals will find that their practice still bears no relation to the new law. We should not enact a measure that would distort decisions.

Aeroplanes are, by definition, very mobile. Unlike power stations or water pipelines, they do not have to be in this country. It has been said—although such threats should always be taken with a pinch of salt—that some operators might decamp and set up abroad in order to avoid these provisions and, in a global economy, we must of course be very aware of the tax competition issues that may arise.

I dare say that the Minister will have an answer to all those points, but it would help the Committee—and, perhaps more important, those who will have to put the measures into practice—to know what the Government intend, and how they propose to deal with the anomalies to which I have referred.

Some operators and owners, such as the utilities, have assets which, on any view, are likely to last for more than 25 years. In the case of others, such as the telecommunications industry, it is a moot point: there could be considerable argument about how long modern telecommunications equipment is supposed to last. Those who listened to the "Today" programme this morning will have heard an argument about the erection of telecommunications beacons in a park in Yorkshire. It was argued that they would last only another five years, but they are clearly capable of lasting for 25 or 30 years.

A theme that has recurred during debates on Finance Bills over the past few years is the desire not just to simplify the body of tax law, but to pass legislation that has some degree of clarity; but clarity is sadly lacking in clause 82. It is possible that the Government introduced the clause and schedule simply on cost grounds, but, if that is the case, let us hear it: let us not pretend that there was some other motive. If, on the other hand, the intention was to align accountancy practice with the practice of the law on allowances, will the Minister explain the apparent anomalies—as between railways and aeroplanes, for example—and will he explain what the taxpayer is supposed to do when he has an asset which he has no intention of operating, for any purpose, for anything like 25 years, although the law assumes that it will last for longer than that? That leads to a question that specifically concerns aeroplanes. What are people supposed to do when an asset that may be in the sky 25 years after its frame took to the airways is not the same asset as was originally built? I am sure that other Committee members wish to speak to clause 82 and to amendment No. 3. It would be helpful, however, if the Financial Secretary would explain what the Government have in mind with their provisions.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Clackmannan): I listened very carefully to the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling). Unsurprisingly, he dwelt on the example of aircraft, which is a good example for the reasons that he gave—its mobility and the possibilities of life extension and, although it will still be an aeroplane, of changing almost all its features. The latter feature of aeroplanes may be an argument against applying these provisions to them; I am unsure on that point. It is clear, however, that what is good for trains should be good for aeroplanes. Anyone who has travelled on the west coast main line will know that the life of those assets is considerably longer than 25 years. The railways provide some obvious examples for this debate.

It is always strange when Ministers suggest that legislation will be clarified by a comparatively modest amendment which, upon examination, only adds to the confusion. That is why we should like to have an annual report. If the Government's notional majority were to prevail and clause 82 were retained, it should be incumbent on the Government and on successive Governments to report on changes in the law. It is therefore desirable that we should receive an annual report on developments. Such a report would be to the advantage of the House, to potential investors and, not least, to the accounting profession.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central mentioned the utilities and the oil industry; he also mentioned this morning's very interesting radio report about beacons for mobile telephones. We should also like to know the status of assets in the cable industry—which is busy digging up our country's roads and destroying trees. Asset life in that part of the telecommunications industry might be of considerable length, and I hope that it is. I do not want my street dug up again, and—given cable operators' tendency to drill holes through any wall they encounter—my wife does not want them anywhere near our house again.

In the utilities and telecommunications sectors, the burgeoning cable industry is entitled to receive some indication of how assets will be treated so that it can determine whether the provisions might frustrate development of exciting new technology. Interaction between home, office and shop, for example, could revolutionise the way in which we live and work.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central also mentioned the oil industry. I am sure that he will recall that, some years ago, in Scotland, we attended a seminar hosted by a major oil company at which we heard a debate on investment intentions between senior executives of that company. It was clear that executives from the company's American headquarters were mesmerised by the "upstream" and "downstream" arguments on a proposed tax change. The headquarters executives were not interested in the somewhat refined debate on the relative importance of the Government's then proposed tax changes, and their patience was fairly short. If they had thought that tax advantages in the North sea were considerably less than those in south-east Asia or in Australia, they would have been quite happy to move their investment programme to a location that was more cost effective on tax. It is therefore important that the Minister gives an idea of the impact not only on the oil industry but on the petrochemical industry—the downstream industry in which the UK has assets.

I have a constituency interest in that many of my constituents work at the Grangemouth complex, which is on the edge of my constituency. It is one of the major facilities for harnessing and taking advantage of the products of the North sea oil industry. The investment programmes there are of considerable significance, and I do not think that the industry would wish to be disadvantaged by the changes that appear to be in train and which would be available to some industries and not others.

By the same token, we should consider the effect on power stations. Although this is not important at the moment, because the level of power station construction is not quite what it was in the early 1980s, it is clear that, come the end of this century and the beginning of the next—the date might coincide with 2010—a number of new plants will have to be constructed because the life of the existing ones will have been pretty well exhausted. New plants will have to be brought on line. If there is not to be a beneficial tax regime for companies that invest in this sphere, we might face a shortfall in generating capacity.

The construction of power stations involves petrochemicals and electricity generation. Even allowing for the new technologies involved in the generation of electricity, the construction of power stations is a major source of employment. The construction of the kit used in power stations is also a source of employment. It would be dangerous for the Government to highlight one industry—the railway industry—but discount the possible impact of those changes on others.

I am anxious for the Government to make their position clear. We are not happy with the vagueness of "investing heavily in long-life assets".

It could be open to all kinds of abuse and misinterpretation. It is therefore essential that the House has the opportunity to review at regular intervals the impact of the proposed changes. The best way to do that would be with an annual report.

The amendment is therefore sensible, easily operable and one from which the House, the accounting profession and industry would benefit. I see no reason why the Minister should not accept it. If he can tell us what means with a degree of clarity and concision uncharacteristic of Ministers on most issues, we shall be pleasantly surprised and perhaps reassured. If we do not get that reassurance, I hope that the amendment is accepted. It has considerable merit and would certainly go some way to reassure the people on whom this country depends for employment and wealth creation.

Mr. Tim Smith: I take the view that, as far as possible, the taxable profit of a business should, for the purpose of corporation tax, be as near as possible to the reported profit that appears in the accounts. Of course, it is not possible to achieve that in practice for very good reasons. In practice, one takes the reported profit in the accounts, adds the depreciation and then deducts the capital allowances to which the company is entitled. However, as far as possible the capital allowances should be roughly the amount of the depreciation that appears in the accounts. Clause 82 and schedule 13 take the capital allowances system a step further down that road.

For that reason, the proposed reform is sensible, but we should recognise that it is a reform that can be made only in an era of low inflation. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) took exception to my question about the history of this matter, but it is significant that, 20 years ago, we could not have had the system that we have today. In fact, 20 years ago, when the rate of corporation tax was 52 per cent. and inflation fluctuated between 15 per cent. and 25 per cent., not only did we have to have 100 per cent. first year allowances for all capital investment, we had to have something for stock relief, recognising the fact that replacing stock costs a lot of extra cash in a high inflation era.

At that time, it was not good enough just to look at the reported profits of a company; the cash flow also had to be examined. In the 1970s, plenty of profitable companies had negative cash flow because of the effects of inflation on the need to maintain fixed capital and working capital.

The 1984 reform was important because it reduced the standard rate of corporation tax significantly, and reduced capital allowances. That was a welcome change, because it removed distortions from the system. As has rightly been said, having capital allowances significantly higher than the accounting depreciation introduces distortions into the system, which result in commercial decisions being taken for tax reasons rather than for good business reasons. I am glad that we have reached a stage at which the total capital allowances available to a business will be roughly equivalent to the accounting depreciation that appears in the accounts.

I should like to mention one or two issues that arise from the schedule. The first relates to aircraft, which the hon. Members for Edinburgh, Central and for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) have mentioned. There are exceptions in the schedule for trains and ships. The best way to deal with aircraft seems to be to make an exception for them, too.

The determining factor in deciding how much depreciation will be charged in the accounts is not how long one owner expects to use an asset—so it is not open to an airline that expects to use an aircraft for 15 years to decide to depreciate it at 6 per cent. over 15 years—but the expected useful life of the asset, regardless of how long the current owner expects to use it. That is the problem for airlines. Although an airline may expect to use an asset for only 15 years, the life of an average aircraft these days may well be 25, 30 or even 35 years. United Kingdom airlines tend to buy new aircraft. A new 747, for example, might be owned by British Airways for 15 years and then be sold—probably abroad, although that is not particularly significant—to another operator, who operates it for another 10 or 15 years.

The problem needs to be tackled, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury will be able to do so. I do not understand why the Inland Revenue favours a reducing balance method. Why do we have 6 per cent. on a reducing balance? Would it not be more straightforward to allow 4 per cent. on a straight line basis over 25 years, and at the end of 25 years the asset could be written off? That is straightforward.

The Confederation of British Industry observes in its representations on the schedule that, at the end of 25 years, there is a substantial unrelieved cost. At the start, there is 6 per cent. relief, but that is 6 per cent. on the reducing balance. The CBI points out that, at the end of 25 years, a 6 per cent. reducing balance allowance leaves approximately 20 per cent. of the value unrelieved, whereas accounting depreciation over the same period would have written off the expenditure fully. I do not know how much longer it would take after 25 years at 6 per cent. on the balance for the expenditure to be written off completely. It could easily be another 15 years. It would be simpler to have a straight line basis of capital allowances. I wonder whether my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary could comment on that.

Another important detail relating to the transitional arrangements has been drawn to my attention. Proposed new paragraph 38H of schedule 13, at the top of page 187, provides:

"This Chapter does not apply—

(a) to any expenditure incurred before 26th November 1996"—

Budget day—

(b) to any expenditure incurred before 1st January 2001 in pursuance of a contract entered into before 26th November 1996."

That sounds straightforward, but it has been pointed out to me that some large capital projects—the provisions are directed principally towards such projects—such as the construction of a large power station might be organised as a series of contracts. There might be five or six. Although the project would be agreed, the contracts might not all be signed at the start. On 26 November 1996, it is possible that a company might have agreed a project with a construction company but contracted only for the first or second stages. Will my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary consider whether that is a genuine point of practical concern? I do not know. I have raised it with him because it has been raised with me.

Mr. O'Neill: I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's point. There is another aspect to that problem. A power station can be built with different generating sets added over time. To get the show running and to generate some income, as well as electricity, the first set is put in and then funded out of the next one, which may come several years later. A continuing programme of expansion can be carried out under the umbrella of the original contract.

Mr. Smith: If it was clear that there was one contract and everything was carried out under that umbrella, there would not be a problem, as I understand the schedule. However, if there was something less than a contract—a commitment that was not contractually binding under which the project would not be viable if the whole undertaking was not proceeded with—there may be a problem. I do not know, but I hope that my hon. Friend will consider that.

Cable has been mentioned. I wrote to my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary in December about a problem that is of particular concern to Cable and Wireless, although it may be a problem for all cable companies. I shall not go into the detail, but I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to respond to that.

Having said all that, I think that the changes proposed in the schedule are sensible. They can be made only in a low inflation environment, but it is sensible to try to have the profit for the purposes of corporation tax as near as possible to the reported profit in a company's accounts. For that reason, I welcome the proposals.

Mr. Ian Pearson (Dudley, West): The schedule adds a further eight and a half pages to the Capital Allowances Act 1990. No doubt it will also add substantially in due course to the voluminous case law on the issue.

It is clear from its size that the measure is not business-friendly. Capital allowances are complicated and present significant difficulties for small and medium-sized businesses in fathoming what allowances they can use for tax purposes.

The issue is of concern to many tax practitioners. In their book, "Practical Capital Allowances", Peter Newbold and Martin Wilson write about some of the practical difficulties. They say:

"It is common practice to speak of 'preparing' a capital allowances claim. This pre-supposes that particular types of assets qualify automatically for particular types of allowances, and that a claim consists of no more than assembling and presenting self-evident facts.

In the 1990s, the process is much more complicated. Both tax law and building design have moved on to a new plane of complexity, and the 'grey areas' have grown—the facts are often less evident than they once were. . . .

A claim for capital allowances must be 'developed' before it can be developed and it must be 'planned'. This clearly involves a good deal of work, and the question is often asked whether the cost (in both time and money) is justified."

That is a very real concern for a number of United Kingdom businesses, especially small and medium-sized ones in the west midlands.

Mr. Tim Smith: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the exemption in the schedule for any business that spends less than £100,000 in one year on capital investment means that it is unlikely to apply to all small businesses and many medium-sized businesses?

Mr. Pearson: No, I do not agree. The £100,000 limit will not exempt a significant number of medium-sized businesses—certainly companies that are still small but operate in a group structure. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the schedule, he will find that it places very severe restrictions on companies that operate group structures.

I would accept the principle behind the clause and the schedule if it really brought the tax treatment of long-life assets more closely in line with normal accountancy practice. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) welcomed it, and like him I want taxable profit more closely to approximate accounting profit. In the same speech, however, he rightly made the point when referring to the CBI's submission, that, at the end of a 25-year period, as a result of the reducing balance system proposed in the schedule, about 20 to 21 per cent. of the value of the assets will not be relieved from tax. That does not seem to be getting close to mirroring tax treatment with accounting profit. The Government must be honest and give the real reason for the schedule. If it is a clever tax wheeze to raise £1 billion in two financial years, they ought to come clean and say so.

Mr. Darling: Following the point made by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), I am prompted to ask my hon. Friend to look at section 38C of schedule 13, where he will see that there is a further problem concerning the £100,000 figure. Although it would catch a contract that spanned several accounting periods and treats them as being one accounting period, what would happen if concerns so arranged their affairs to have a series of separate contracts? In speaking in support of the amendment, my hon. Friend will know that we do not want to reach a point where we are creating a very healthy living for lawyers who argue such matters. Some certainty would be very helpful. Although I appreciate why the Government are trying to be helpful in exempting small firms, they could unwittingly be creating a gravy train for lawyers.

Mr. Pearson: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments, which are not only valid but have independent support. Andrew Dilnot of the Institute of Fiscal Studies said when questioned by the Treasury Committee on the issue of capital allowances and long-life assets that the provision would indeed create a gravy train for tax lawyers and accountants. He was far from convinced that the projected yields of £325 million in 1998-99 and £675 million in 1999-2000 would be achieved. We should listen to what he says. Tax lawyers and accountants are already gearing up to offer companies advice on how they should organise their tax affairs. Some of the utilities with which I have discussed the issue certainly feel that there are ways around the system and that it will not affect their businesses to any substantial degree.

5.15 pm

I turn to some of the detail of schedule 13, which raises fundamental issues that require scrutiny. It is unfortunate that, since this is the first clause and schedule to be discussed in Committee, it will not receive the level of detailed analysis that it deserves if we are to make good law in the area. I draw the Committee's attention to section 38A(2)(a) and (b), which revolve around who determines whether assets will have an economic life of at least 25 years and what we mean by a "useful economic life".

It seems clear that individuals and—probably—partnerships will decide themselves whether assets are caught by the legislation because, with the coming self-assessment regime, it will be up to them to determine such tax matters. Similarly, tax lawyers and accountants will advise companies, and undoubtedly some very interesting discussions will be held between companies and their firms of auditors as to how tax treatment of certain assets should be determined and accounted for.

The point is well made by the Institute of Directors in some of the concerns that it has been expressing about the Budget. It says that consultation with industry and tax advisers on how the rule can be implemented is desperately required. I very much endorse that. I will be interested to hear what plans the Financial Secretary to the Treasury has to consult those who will be affected by the legislation and whether further consideration should be given on Report to some of the problems that are likely to be associated with it.

Another key point to make about the section is that, although many major manufacturing companies will not keep assets for 25 years, they are nevertheless likely to be caught by the legislation because it may well be deemed that the asset has a "useful economic life" of 25 years. The most recent Government research that I have seen shows that the average age of plant and machinery in the United Kingdom is about 11 years.

Some of our leading manufacturers certainly have very clear investment programmes. I cite GKN plc as an example. It will clearly make significant capital investments in plant and machinery but will be upgrading and disposing of it well within a 25-year period. How will the section take account of obsolescence so that a machine that could last for 50 years can be replaced by a more advanced one within 15 or 20 years? What happens if everybody agrees in good faith that an asset will last for 30 years, but it lasts for only 20 years? Would the taxpayer be compensated for the loss of cash flow as a result of having only 6 per cent. allowances during this period?

Section 38A(4) and (5) deal with expenditure incurred on long-life assets in relation to composite assets, and state that apportionments should be "just and reasonable." This is peculiarly ill-defined, and it has some important knock-on consequences. Section 66 of the Capital Allowances Act refers to building alterations and states—in summary—that where a person carrying out trade incurs capital expenditure on alterations, it counts as plant and machinery. A company installing a major new manufacturing cell—which would be counted as plant and machinery, but may have a useful economic life of less than 25 years—may have to make substantial alterations to a building to install that cell. Those alterations would then be caught by the new regulations. At present, building alterations can qualify for the 25 per cent. writing-down allowances, but they will not in future. Companies that are likely to make alterations when investing in plant and machinery will be disadvantaged as a result of this part of the Bill.

Section 38B provides exemptions for dwelling houses, retail shops, showrooms, hotels and offices. I accept the point about dwelling houses, but it is not immediately obvious why it is right and fair to exempt retail shops, showrooms and hotels—or, indeed, offices. A number of large hotel groups and companies are making major investments in long-life assets, such as offices, and these will not be caught by the legislation. But a manufacturing company investing in plant and machinery to create wealth in the United Kingdom will be hit by the legislation. That does not seem to be a fair basis in law.

Section 38B(3) is welcome, as it provides exemptions to the shipbuilding industry. However, it is not immediately obvious why shipbuilding should be exempted, but dry docks—where ships go to be refurbished—are to be classified as long-life assets and caught by the Bill. If we intend to do something to help the shipbuilding industry—we have had discussions during debates on previous Finance Bills on the need to support shipbuilding—it is slightly anomalous that dry docks will not be relieved in the way that the shipbuilding industry is. In case law, I cite Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Barclay Curle and Co. as holding that dry docks are plant and machinery. Grain silos are also classed as plant and machinery and they will be similarly affected by the new legislation—even though they are used for the purposes of loading and unloading ships. We need clarification.

We also need details on the subject of investment in sports grounds. Section 70 of the Capital Allowances Act 1990 provides that investment in safety in sports grounds can be treated as plant, but there is no exemption in the legislation for such investment. In future, such investment is likely to get relief at the 6 per cent. rate rather than at the current 25 per cent. rate. Is that what the Government intend? Are they aware of the problem? Will they do something about it?

I also wish to highlight the potential problems in relation to the private finance initiative, and I will be very interested to hear the Minister's response. A number of PFI contracts for the hospital sector—which are being signed rather belatedly—are from major companies that will invest in long-life assets, and certainly in assets with an expected useful life of more than 25 years. Before this Budget there was an understanding that they would get capital allowances at the 25 per cent. rate. It seems to me—there is nothing in the schedule to suggest otherwise—that PFI projects in the health service could be damaged by the change in tax treatment proposed by the legislation. We need urgent clarification on this.

Perhaps the Minister will talk to his civil servants and respond in writing to the next few points that I wish to raise. Section 38C(3)(b) and (4)(b) of schedule 13 talk about expenditure incurred by an individual being subject to the relevant limit, which is set at £100,000. Section 38C(3)(b) says that this is subject to the individual devoting "substantially the whole of his time in that chargeable period to the carrying on of that trade and profession".

What happens if the individual—or partnership—does not devote

"substantially the whole of his time in that chargeable period to the carrying on of that trade and profession"?

Section 38C(5)(a) talks about excluding expenditure

"on the provision of a share in machinery or plant".

Why will expenditure on such shares be excluded? We could be talking about a 50 per cent. share of a £20 million capital investment. That does not seem to me to be obvious.

Finally, I wish to highlight the point that I made at the start of my speech in relation to groups of companies and associated companies. It seems to me that the legislation will affect company decisions about whether businesses should be part of groupings or not.

That could happen, because the legislation states that the £100,000 limit should be divided by the number of companies in the group, so for four businesses in a small group the maximum capital allowance in any one-year period would be £25,000. If that is so, it is fundamental, because small companies operating in group structures could be caught by the legislation. Will the Minister clarify whether my reading is correct and respond on whether that seems fair?

I am slightly concerned about the cliff edge of the de minimis limit, in that long-life expenditure of £100,000 will result in allowances of £25,000, but £100,001 will produce an allowance of only £6,000. Many companies will be concerned about contract values around the margin if they are considering investments of about £100,000, and that could have some serious tax consequences.

We need some clear answers about the real purpose of the clause and of the schedule to which the amendment refers. If it is to bring tax treatment more closely in line with normal accountancy practices, there are, as the hon. Member for Beaconsfield said, better ways of doing that than using a reducing balance method that leaves 20 to 21 per cent. of the asset value unrelieved after a 25-year period; if the real reason is that it is a nice little earner for the Treasury and a good tax wheeze, why does not the Minister say so?

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Michael Jack): Many probing points have been made, and I want to say at the outset how much I welcome the opening comments of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling). I was grateful for his remarks on the broad principles underlying the measure. He went to the heart of the matter when he rightly said that capital allowances should not be allowed to distort investment. I believe that he said that in the context of the previous reforms, and he certainly attached his remarks to the reform before us today.

One of the underlying themes of the debate has been, why we are doing this? The hon. Member for Dudley, West (Mr. Pearson) asked a moment ago whether it was a wizard wheeze to raise lots of money, and my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) suggested that it might be a timely reform to bring into line with accounting principles the way in which tax allowances treat long-life assets. It is very much that principle that has driven us in our considerations on the measure.

The current economic circumstances make it more propitious to advance that line of argument. It is important to refresh the Committee's memory about the rate of corporation tax. While we have been the Government, the mainstream rate has decreased from 52 per cent. to 35 per cent., and the small companies rate from 33 per cent. to 23 per cent.

For all those who express doubt or indeed dissent about aspects of the measure, however detailed, the acid test to which we return is whether enacting this reform in addition to our previous reforms to the tax allowance system allows us to sustain, and indeed—for small and medium-sized companies—to improve the corporation tax regime, to the extent that, by my assessment, we have the most generous small companies corporation tax regime and the most competitive mainstream corporation tax rate of the major economies.

When business people were asked where they prefer the balance to lie between allowances and a lower rate of corporation tax, by and large they preferred the lower tax. The measure allows us to sustain that position. There is no hiding from the fact that money will be raised, as that will clearly happen if we reduce an allowance—in this case to bring it, as far as the tax system is concerned, into conjunction with the accounting principles involved—and we make no apology for that result, because the corollary is a further improvement in the small companies corporation tax rate.

I hope that I have dealt with the points made by several hon. Members. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central said that whatever we did should be fair and should assist and encourage. I share that view: the tax regime on companies should be fair and it should assist and encourage investment. Everyone participating in the debate has expressed a genuine wish to remove distortion by virtue of tax allowances. As my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield said, that is what the reform has done. On those points, I believe that the probing questions of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central have been answered.

The juxtaposition of aircraft and railways was mentioned, and there was some comment on ships, the oil industry and the cable industry. I shall try to deal in detail with the points raised on those issues. I was grateful for the supportive comments of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central, who acknowledged that it was appropriate to exclude shipping in this context. He has long experience in that area, and clearly recalls the changes that were made in response to representations from the shipping industry: in the previous Finance Bill we made changes in the roll-over relief arrangements, and it would clearly not be appropriate to undo by the current measures the good that we did on behalf of the industry at that time.

On railways, there is no fiendish plot artificially to favour those involved in rail franchising. First and foremost, circumstances in the railways are rather different from those in the mainstream industries affected by the proposal. The Committee will reflect on the fact that the railway industry has historically been a loss maker. However much we may have debated the rights or wrongs of privatisation, we set out with a genuine intention to try to improve our railway system through privatisation and the franchising operation.

Mr. Darling: I may have misunderstood the Government over the past three or four years, but I thought that the privatisation process was intended to ensure that profits, not losses, were made. I wonder, therefore, about the justification for excluding the railways, because I understood that they were to be in exactly the same position as, for example, an aircraft manufacturer or operator, and that they were to make profits. The hon. Gentleman seems to be acknowledging that they will never make profits and that they will have to be subsidised. That is a concession, is it not?

Mr. Jack: The hon. Gentleman has spent a great deal of time considering particular points of detail in the Bill, and indeed in the schedule, but perhaps it escaped his attention that the provisions last until 2010, when they are to be reviewed, and that is precisely because we see the potential of increasingly improved finances in the railways. The Government are providing grants, which are now paid through the franchising director for the provision of loss-making services. If these measures increase the costs of the railway industry, those costs will simply come back to us through the subsidies that will be paid to the franchises that are to be negotiated. That is a sensible move. I emphasise that we expect the railway system to move into profit in due course. To judge by some of the excellent commercial ventures that have already been started by various franchise winners, the process is well under way.

Mr. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood): I listened carefully to the Financial Secretary. He seems to have made two fairly clear commitments. If I am wrong, perhaps he will clarify the matter. Is he saying that all the railway companies will be in profit by 2010? If he is, is he guaranteeing that when the matter is reviewed in 2010, they will be put on the same taxation basis as everyone else?

Mr. Jack: I refer the hon. Gentleman to paragraph 4 of the Inland Revenue press release of 26 November, which states:

> "Capital allowances will continue to be given at 25 per cent. a year on sea going ships and railway assets bought before the end of 2010, when this exclusion would fall to be reviewed by the Government of the day."

That was my point. I have expanded on the reasoning behind the shipping and railway exclusions.

If I understood him correctly, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central continued to probe the meaning of investing substantially in long-life assets. Those words are meant to make it clear that the sorts of enterprise concerned are exactly what the proposal says that they are: those that invest in long-life assets. In some trades, professions and activities, assets have a short life. We will discuss the question of life because many of his points revolved around the definition of long-life assets. That is why we recognised that there should be a cut-off—the de minimis exclusions—to try to take out the small and medium enterprises from the proposals.

Hon. Members have touched on how the proposals affect individual companies, and the hon. Member for Dudley, West mentioned groups of companies. Groups of companies that spend less than £100,000 a year on long-life assets, other than assets wholly excluded in the rules, are excluded. It would be to his advantage to examine the information in notes on clauses. The definition of the scope involved was "sizeable expenditure" on assets that are treated in accountancy terms as being long life. We are talking about industries that invest in substantial structures, such as heavy machinery and pipelines. The oil industry was mentioned, as were aircraft.

5.45 pm

I hope that the answer to the question of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central suggests itself. In the real world, certain assets are deemed to have a life of 25 years or more, and it tends to be the bigger end of the investing spectrum that is affected.

Mr. Darling: May I seek clarification of that point, because it may help those who have to implement it? Does investing heavily refer to the value of the investment or to the nature of the business or individual? If the Minister personally decided to build a power station, would that be investing heavily? If a railway company that never bought any carriages suddenly bought one, would that be a light investment, even though it was a long-life asset? Is it the value of the investment or the practice and nature of the business that decides whether an investor is heavy?

Mr. Jack: There are two parts to the definition. It is determined, first, by the life of the asset, and, secondly, by the value. The point of the de minimis exclusion was that many small investments need not be caught by the provision. Serious sums above £100,000 a year would be regarded as starting on the trail of heavy monetary investment. However, to be caught, the life of the asset must be considered. If, in terms of accounting practice, it has a life of 25 years, it will be deemed to be a long-life asset and will therefore be caught. To answer the hon. Gentleman's point, if companies do not invest, they will not be caught.

Sir James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): I apologise for my absence from the start of the debate; I was chairing a Committee.

On the life of assets, is there not a strong case for differentiating between turboprop and jet aircraft, as the former tend to have a much longer life?

Mr. Jack: I shall pre-empt some more detailed remarks that I was going to make on that. For light aircraft, matters such as the number of flying hours can be taken into consideration. It is for the company to decide all such matters when it starts in its accounting principles to deal with long-life assets. If there is a dispute about assets being long life or short life, the discussions with the inspector of taxes come into play. If no agreement is reached between the inspector and the taxable entity, the matter can be referred to the commissioners for further adjudication.

At the start of the debate, we discussed bringing tax allowances into line with accounting principles: accountants will identify the asset at company level and decide whether it is appropriate to write it down in the company's accounts as a long-life asset. It is at that point that the tax treatment is triggered. We have brought the principles together as detailed in schedule 13.

I want to pick up a point made by the hon. Members for Edinburgh, Central and for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill). Major components of aircraft such as engines can be treated separately. When such significant components are replaced, they can be treated as any other replacement part would be under a tax regime different from the long-life tax regime. An oil rig or exploration device may be made up of a series of separate modules, and the test would apply to each part. The principles are fair in their practical application.

Mr. Tim Smith: Is my hon. Friend saying that it would be open to airlines to break down an aircraft into its component modules? If the engines had a life of only 15 years, could they claim capital allowances at the current rate on the engines but claim for the fuselage under the new arrangements?

Mr. Jack: Engines are generally treated as separate entities for tax purposes. That would not apply to the rest of the aeroplane. I hope that that is clear.

Mr. Darling: The engines and fuselage are treated as different parts because they are made by different companies. My limited knowledge of aircraft manufacture is almost wholly gleaned from a recent visit to Rolls-Royce. I am no aircraft engineer, but I know that many other parts of the aeroplane can be separated. Is the Minister saying that many other parts of the aeroplane can be separated? For example, I understand that the most important part of an aeroplane is its wings. Those who make the wings tell me that the wings affect how the aeroplane flies and performs. The bit in the middle that we all sit in is of lesser interest.

How can the Minister take the separation of the component parts of an aeroplane or anything else so lightly? Surely lawyers will have a field day arguing that the components of an aeroplane, a power station or anything else are separate assets and that the value of not one of them exceeds £100,000. The Minister can see what arguments might be open to accountants and lawyers. Will he be a little more helpful on what line the Revenue will take? We need some certainty.

Mr. Jack: Those of us who use aeroplanes—I think that the hon. Gentleman occasionally travels home in one—would regard the placing of the pilot as rather more important than he implied. My remarks were predicated on the Inland Revenue's current tax treatment of significant and separate components. If the hon. Gentleman knows anything about aircraft, he will know that engines are taken out and new ones are put in as part of maintenance operations. A wing is an integral part of the structure of the aircraft: people would not normally take one out and put another one in. He and I can debate that, but I have British Aerospace's military aircraft division headquarters in my constituency, so I perhaps have a shade more knowledge of aircraft maintenance procedures than he has. I do not want to get into such a debate, Dame Janet, or you will rightly call me to order.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central spoke generally about the mobility of airline industry investment. My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) voiced a concern that has been expressed by the industry. The sum total of the effect of the proposal on the United Kingdom airline business on an annualised basis will be £25 million, against a total investment of some £2 billion. That represents an on-cost of £1 per passenger per year. Although the industry is bound to express concern, that figure puts it into perspective.

The financing of aircraft, which is also affected by the proposal, is an international activity. People go around the world with their various lease arrangements, almost collecting tax allowances as they go.

The hon. Member for Clackmannan drew the Committee's attention to the cable industry, and he expressed concern about how the proposal would affect it. It is important to put the matter into perspective.

The annual capital expenditure of the cable industry runs at some £2 billion, and £6 billion is to be spent over the next three to five years. Given the current annual turnover of about £1 billion—which is growing—the effect of this tax proposal on the cable industry will be containable. It is not a showstopper, given the size of the investment.

We return to the question of non-distortion. It is fair to say that we have not tried to make artificial distinctions between one type of industry and another, apart from those of which I gave the Committee details a few moments ago. Given the size of the commitment, there is not a problem.

The hon. Member for Clackmannan also drew the Committee's attention to the effect of the proposal on the oil industry and asked whether any calculation had been done to measure it. I hope that my comments will reassure him. The tax effect is the equivalent of less than one third of 1 per cent. of the industry's turnover. Any industry is bound to mount an argument for special pleading, but I genuinely do not believe that the oil industry can argue that the effect of the proposal is such a serious matter.

There is, however, an important point of principle. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central was right to draw the Committee's attention to the need for an allowance regime that does not distort. It is important that decisions on major investments are not made by virtue of the tax allowances; sometimes, far bigger costs have to be taken into account. One of the biggest single costs to the airline industry is the amount of fuel used on a journey. One of the most important factors affecting profitability is—to use the colloquial expression—the number of bums on seats, which has a far greater effect on determining investment decisions. Airlines seek aircraft of a more modern design to save fuel, or with more capacity so that more passengers can be carried. Such considerations are more important than the effect of the tax allowance. It is important that decisions on investment should not be distorted by the allowance.

Mr. O'Neill: I am grateful to the Minister for trying at least to give some figures. The sums that he gave were somewhat vague. One does not know what would be the significance for investment in, for example, the North sea. We have to take account of the globalised character of that industry. At the margin, a project might be disadvantaged by even a fairly modest change in the tax regime. Such a project may be in competition with another in Alaska or the Gulf of Mexico, and it might be to the company's advantage to move there. Oil companies care not where they get their oil but about the money that they get from the projects in which they invest. That is the point that I was trying to make.

The Minister has not quite fiddled the statistics, but he has given a meaningless figure that needs either to be clarified or to be discarded as irrelevant.

Mr. Jack: I am not prone to deliberately misleading the Committee, but I have been informed that the hon. Gentleman was right when he said that my figure was meaningless: it referred to the airline industry, not to the oil industry. I take this opportunity to apologise to right hon. and hon. Members for my error. It adds to my argument about the airline industry and acknowledges the point that the hon. Gentleman made.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): Resign.

Mr. Jack: For a third of 1 per cent., that is going a bit far.

I am advised that the change mentioned by the hon. Member for Clackmannan is unlikely to cause any project, certainly in the North sea, to be dropped. I shall consider whether I can make any further points, with perhaps greater accuracy, to quantify the effect of the measure.

I have dealt with the points made by the hon. Member for Clackmannan about the cable industry. I was pleased to have the support of my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield. He raised a number of issues on aircraft and I hope that I have dealt with them. I was also grateful for his assistance in answering the point made by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central about aircraft being sold on. He answered it with clarity and knowledge.

My hon. Friend also made some points about ships and railways, with which I hope I have dealt. He asked why we had chosen the figure of 6 per cent. Capital allowances on machinery and plant are calculated by pooling expenditure. That method is generally preferred by taxpayers as it is simple to operate, but it means that allowances are given on the reducing balance basis rather than on the straight line or any other basis that may be used in commercial accounts. It is misleading to look at the period over which the expenditure is written off on the reducing balance basis. In theory, it is infinite. In practice, it is not possible to determine because the identity of the expenditure is lost in the pool.

The better comparison is with the net present value of allowances. On that basis, 6 per cent. gives the best fit with commercial depreciation for an asset with a working life of 25 years or more. That is the technical explanation. I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the Inland Revenue press release, which explains the transitional rules. I suspect that he would also have liked to mention the effect of the proposals on theatres, but did not have the time. I acknowledge his interest. If he will be kind enough to inform me of his concerns, I will be delighted to write to him about them. To pick up on some of the other transitional points that he mentioned would add an undue complication to our proceedings. I know that he would like all the matters to be dealt with through a tax law rewrite, but that is complex.

Finally, the hon. Member for Dudley, West took us at some length through the central issue of how one determines the life of an asset. He read out a number of quotations. The straight question of who decides the useful economic life of an asset that needs to be determined when the accounts are drawn up. That is one for the accountants, who are used to it and understand it. As I said, if there is a disagreement, it is the role of the tax inspector and the commissioners to sort it out.

The hon. Member for Dudley, West asked whether inspectors would be bound by the expected economic life used in the accounts. That will be strong evidence of whether the 25-year test is made, but the inspector must be able to query the figure if he is not satisfied that it is reasonable. Those are fairly simple and straightforward statements.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I have been involved in industry, as has the hon. Member for Dudley, West (Mr. Pearson). How can my hon. Friend the Minister believe that in this modern age any asset lasts for 25 years? If we are to remain efficient in this competitive age, we need to replace machinery of almost any sort within 10 years. Writing off assets over 25 years is a total nonsense, and puts this country at a grave disadvantage with our competitors.

Mr. Jack: My hon. Friend is right. If he is drawing the Committee's attention to the fact that machinery may be built that has an obviously shorter operating life, to take account of technological advance, that clearly is a matter for the accountant. I remember this argument being used when I was involved with the glasshouse industry. It was made clear that some of the structures might not last all that long. The advice to that industry was clear—take it up with the tax inspector.

Mr. Winterton rose—

Mr. Jack: I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me if I do not give way again, as I want to draw my remarks to a conclusion.

The life of an asset was a central part of the remarks of the hon. Member for Dudley, West. I shall certainly study carefully some of the further technical points that he made and, if he will excuse me, I shall write to him about them. I commend the clause and the schedule to the Committee.

Mr. Pearson: I thank the Minister for his brief final comments and for explaining the meaning of life to the Committee. I appreciate that he will write to me about some of the technical issues, and so will not mention again building alterations, dry docks, grain silos and the treatment of groups of companies. Will he comment on how the Bill affects the private finance initiative, with particular reference to hospitals?

Has the Treasury taken into account in its estimates of cost savings the way in which contracts will be redesigned to take account of the new legislation? It seems clear that, when putting in a new production line or a manufacturing cell, whereas one might have awarded a £2 million contract for 10 different machines and all the links, one will now use 10 or 11 different contracts plus an assembly contract to get around the legislation and claim the allowances.

Mr. Winterton: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way when my hon. Friend the Minister would not. Is not one of the problems the fact that accountants make these decisions rather than production managers or engineers, who have more knowledge of the benefit of equipment than accountants, who merely look at the figures and the bottom line? Would the hon. Gentleman, whose interest and involvement in industry and in rugby football I have considerable respect for, comment on that matter before the Minister responds?

Mr. Pearson: The hon. Gentleman is right, if he is making the general point that too many accountants run businesses and that too few people with a knowledge of production and manufacturing industry are on the boards of companies.

I should appreciate a response from the Minister on the PFI and hospitals, on the extent to which the Department has taken account of the real world and on how contracts will be redesigned as a result of the legislation. It is easy to draw a coach and horses through some of the Bill because of the way in which it is drafted.

Mr. Jack: We do not hide the fact that the Bill will affect the PFI and contracts where long-life investment exceeds £100,000. As the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central said, the quality of the investment is what should see the thing through. The matter should not turn on the question of tax allowances, which is why we are removing this distortion. The underlying thesis is the fact that, in business terms, the highly competitive corporation tax regime is far more important to those who want to make quality investments than the tax allowance regime.

Mr. Darling: I know that the Committee anticipates a vote and I shall not speak for too long, but I must refer to a number of matters. The debate has shown the difficulties that we can get into when a straightforward proposition becomes complicated by exemptions, and where different reliefs apply, depending on different definitions. Indeed, it appears that, while the Government were trying to simplify the provision of allowances, the position has become rather more complicated and many of the gainers will be lawyers and accountants.

I will deal with one or two questions that the Minister did not completely answer. We should be grateful to him for clarifying the position on railways. We have a clear admission from the Government that the railways will be making losses for some years to come—certainly for 13 years. I understand the argument that there is not much point in giving a tax break to someone who has to be subsidised by the taxpayer. That admission undermines all the Government's claims about the railways. According to the Minister, they are loss making and therefore we cannot justify giving them a further tax break. I understand the logic of that, but it bears out what we have been saying—that the taxpayer will have to subsidise the privatised railways for many years to come. Thirteen years is a long time before any review.

I have never understood why aeroplanes are included in the measure and railways are not. The Minister did not deal with that central point.

It concerned me when the Minister, in effect, gave the industry tips on how to get around the provisions of the Bill, because it seems that the engines of an aeroplane can be removed and treated separately. Perhaps the example I gave, of wings, was not a good one, although the wings are a major part of an aeroplane. I should probably declare an interest, as I use aeroplanes at least twice a week. I have always—perhaps naively—thought of an aeroplane as being one body rather than the sum of a number of component parts, all of which can be treated differently for tax purposes and removed as appropriate.

That illustrates my point. If operators and manufacturers get round the problem by treating different parts of the aeroplane in different ways, it will lead to precisely the difficulty that was pointed out by the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton)—accountants will instruct manufacturers to ensure that a part cannot reasonably have a life of 25 years and, therefore, obsolescence will be built in. When an engine or the electronics of an aeroplane is designed, the accountants will say that it must not last for more than 20 years, in case it gets caught. They can then claim the 25 per cent.

That shows the problems that arise when the law becomes, not simpler, as we all profess to want, but more complicated. I am worried that we are, in fact, creating great opportunities for lawyers and accountants. When describing the new concept—the meaning of economic life—the Minister referred to accountants, saying that they understand these matters. I was once a practising lawyer, so I know that accountants and lawyers understand these matters. In particular, they understand that a good and long argument is a lucrative way of spending their time, and we should not put together a tax system that guarantees them work for 25 years. Nevertheless, that appears to be what we are doing.

I have come to believe that the next Government will have to spend a substantial amount of time trying to sort out these difficulties, some of which will be immediately apparent, while others will only appear when the law starts to operate. It would be unreasonable to burden the next Government with having to report to Parliament in addition to that, as I suggested in my amendment.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 82 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 13 agreed to.

Clause 62

PHASING OUT OF RELIEF FOR PROFIT-RELATED PAY

Ms Dawn Primarolo (Bristol, South): I beg to move amendment No. 4, in page 56, line 19, at end add—

'(4) The Treasury shall produce a report each year on the companies which had schemes registered under that Chapter.

(5) The report mentioned in (4) above shall analyse the actions taken by companies in relation to profit related pay after 1st January 1998.

(6) The report mentioned in (4) above shall also describe separately the impact of the removal of tax relief for profit related pay on employees paying income tax at both higher rate and basic rate.'.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Dame Janet Fookes): With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 5, in page 56, line 19, at end add—

'(4) That Chapter shall not have effect in relation to any payment made by reference to a profit period beginning on or after 1st April 1997 if the primary purpose of the scheme under which the payment is made is the avoidance of tax.'.

Ms Primarolo: The clause deals with the Government's proposals for the phasing out of the tax relief on profit-related pay. Over a period of 10 years, the Government have spent £4 billion on an experiment to find ways to encourage a closer relationship between the remuneration of employees and their company's profits. Given the proposals in the clause, it is fair to ask certain questions. Was that £4 billion wisely spent? What were the Government's objectives and have they been met? When the tax benefit is removed, will employees still be happy for 20 per cent. of their pay to remain in the schemes? What is likely to be the companies' reaction to the withdrawal of the relief?

6.15 pm

Only yesterday, the Deputy Prime Minister argued that the Government understood business very well—indeed, he claimed a monopoly for the Conservative Government in that respect. I am sure that hon. Members will agree that any business that invested £4 billion should monitor that investment and, at the end of the experiment, assess the effectiveness of the investment and whether the objectives had been achieved.

The original objectives of the profit-related pay scheme were set out by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, now Lord Lawson, in his 1986 Budget. It was floated as a potential cure for unemployment. He said that if "a significant proportion" of wages were more flexible and rose and fell according to the company's profitability:

"This would not only give the work force a more direct personal interest in their company's success . . . it would also mean that, when business is slack, companies would be under less pressure to lay men off; and by the same token they would, in general, be keener to take them on."—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 172.]

That does not appear to have been the result of this particular tax relief.

The initial take-up rate was slow, with most companies taking advantage of the tax concession to continue their existing schemes. The original hope was that profit-related pay would reduce pay demands and prevent redundancies, but that has not happened. The evidence is that companies registering schemes are motivated more by a desire to secure extra tax relief for their employees than by a desire for flexible pay. The amendments seek to address that problem.

In justifying the changes, the Government have identified the enormous cost to the Treasury and the abuses that now occur in the scheme. It is somewhat surprising that their discovery of abuse has come so late. In the 1993 Budget, the Chancellor asserted that £100 million would be saved in 1994-95 from closing down what was then identified as a loophole in the profit-related pay rules. The loophole was closed and employers were then unable to offer profit-related pay without some degree of risk that payments made under the regime might vary with profits.

However, the Chancellor did not prevent the problem to which the Government are now returning—that of employers constructing schemes that expose employees to only a negligible risk of loss of earnings. Therein lies the problem. Employers typically guarantee to pay out 80 per cent. to 90 per cent. of the profit-related element of the pay, leaving only the remainder to vary with profits. Ernst and Young has estimated that 75 per cent. of the current schemes are an abuse of the objectives and says that it can clearly identify that the primary reason for implementing profit-related pay has been to contain costs, rather than to motivate employees.

Effectively, 80 per cent. of employees must vote in favour of the scheme, so it is unlikely that a majority of employees will vote for a scheme in which there is a material risk to their pay—where they are likely to suffer a loss. The overwhelming majority of schemes have been converted into the guaranteed pay type where 20 per cent.

is the risk element of the payment. That reasoning has been supported by a survey of evidence from the income data studies report, which was produced in June 1996 and which suggested that the major part of the millions of pounds cost to the taxpayer of profit-related pay was funding schemes which provide tax-free pay rises rather than performance-related pay.

The Government published a research report on profit-related pay in May 1995, commissioned by the Inland Revenue, the Department of Employment and the Treasury. Its main conclusions were that the tax relief had stimulated a significant take-up of PRP because companies and employees were sharing the relief and that from an employer's point of view the main benefits of the relief were in tax efficiency. The report went on to say that employee involvement had been created, although it did not substantiate that claim. It did not provide conclusive evidence that the cost to the taxpayer of performance-related pay was justified by improved economic performance.

The arguments against the Government's case are clear and the Government now have an obligation to justify the expenditure. In 1986, when the then Chancellor—now Lord Lawson—introduced that tax relief, he said:

"There is considerable inertia to overcome, so it might make sense to offer some temporary measure of tax relief."

Ten years later, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer said:

"I can no longer justify the ever increasing cost of the tax relief to the 22 million taxpayers who are not in profit-related pay schemes. We cannot permanently divide the work force into groups of people who pay different levels of tax on the same earnings depending on whether the firm that they work for is in a scheme or not."—[Official Report, 26 November 1996; Vol. 286, c. 165.]

That is absolutely right: it is only surprising that it has taken so long for the Government to discover that. Some 3.7 million workers now in those schemes are threatened by the proposals to phase out the tax relief, possibly with dramatic drops in their take-home pay. What do the Government expect to happen once the tax break is removed? What consultation has taken place? Will pre-tax earnings rise as companies compensate employees, or will employees—particularly the low paid—suffer a loss of earnings?

Although the abolition of profit-related pay is partly due to the mounting cost to the Exchequer, another factor must be that the scheme is being abused. There are a growing number of so-called "salary sacrifice" schemes, under which employees exchange part of their salary for profit-related pay. The tax saving is shared between employees and the company, which means that the employer's wage bill is reduced. The employer and the employee share the relief. One of the water companies with a profit-related pay scheme has notified its employees that that was exactly the purpose of its scheme: when the relief is removed, the scheme will be cancelled.

The Government must explain why they did not prevent those abuses at an earlier stage. In many schemes there is little risk of employees' pay falling because employers gave an undertaking that if the Government changed the regulations the employees would be returned to their previous status. I will give examples of just a couple of schemes. Information circulated by the National Westminster bank, Lloyds, TSB, Barclays and the Midland was intended to explain profit-related pay to employees in advance of the ballot on whether the scheme should be established. The documentation, which was not secret, made it absolutely clear that the proposal was to share the tax relief—which cuts straight through the Government's argument that it should be about giving employees a stake in the company's profits.

A letter about the National Westminster bank scheme, which was started in January 1996, says:

"The Revenue regulations will not allow these payments to be guaranteed"— that is the 20 per cent., the part that is supposed to be at risk—

"but the Bank has stated that if, during the period the scheme is in operation, it believes it is falling dramatically short of its projected performance it will cancel the scheme, revert people back to their original salaries and ensure that individuals are in a no loss situation with regard to tax.

The Bank is proposing a one year scheme which it believes would be protected from any changes in revenue arrangements for its duration."

The Barclays bank document explains how employers and employees would share the tax profit. They did so on a 40:60 split. The number of employees in the PRP scheme meant that employees, who received 40 per cent., benefited to the tune of £20 million—that is loss of revenue to the Government—and the bank benefited by £30 million. They were sharing the tax relief in that case. Other banks had different schemes. Some operated a 50:50 split, for example, and the TSB scheme was intended to benefit the bank to the tune of £6 million in the first year.

Those documents are freely available and it is beyond belief that the Inland Revenue did not discover them and see that this important measure, which was supposed to establish stakeholding for employees—employees would be given a share of their company's profitability—was being widely abused. Depending on what happens during the period of phasing out the relief, there will have to be a great deal of negotiation between employees and employers to restore employees to their original position.

Even worse, having allowed the scheme to be abused, the Government have allowed good, genuine schemes also to be damaged in the process. The John Lewis partnership scheme is a prime example. A true sharing of profits is being undermined and disturbed by Government action in this area.

The Labour party believes that it is right to reward success. We want employees to be involved in their companies and to benefit from their profits. We also want the Government, first, to state clearly—the amendment advances this case—that they will monitor the schemes so that we can see how many continue to exist once the tax relief is removed. Secondly, it should be a clear objective that any future arrangements for sharing profitability, however they may be constructed, are not allowed to degenerate into abuse and loss of revenue to the Exchequer, as the current scheme has.

Through the amendments, we seek to press the Government for a post-investment audit. Employees who will now have to renegotiate their arrangements with their employers and who may lose out deserve an explanation, as does the Committee, of why an experiment was allowed to go on for 10 years and consume £4 billion of revenue when the Government could clearly see that abuse was occurring and that they would have to act against it.

6.30 pm

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): I note in passing that the Opposition seem to be allowed by their Treasury spokesmen to ask for reports, but not for anything else. No doubt that will change in time, whether they remain in opposition or not.

The hon. Member for Bristol, South (Ms Primarolo) properly set out the purpose of the temporary measure. She described how, during the past year, there has been a great rush to take advantage of it in ways that produce no worthwhile effect, except to the employer and employees concerned. She drew attention to the position of people who work in the John Lewis Partnership, which is one of the best examples of co-ownership in Britain. It was set up 70 years ago as a result of an apparently eccentric decision, and its history should be better known. People who work in the group's stores are not employees, but partners.

For people who are paid significantly more—perhaps those who are partners in firms of accountants or solicitors—the tax system provides all sorts of arrangements for income sheltering. If one took an average of the difference between the actual earnings of partners in top accountancy firms, established what proportion of those carry a direct burden of tax, and applied the same proportion to those working in the John Lewis Partnership, one might find that they could do better than under the existing scheme.

I shall go a stage further than the hon. Lady and ask my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary what representations have been received at the Treasury from the John Lewis Partnership, what response has been made and whether meetings have taken place with the partners or the senior people in the partnership. My hon. Friend could respond when he replies to the debate or by letter afterwards. Will the Government consider over the next two or three years what changes might appropriately be made to reward those in genuine co-ownership and profit sharing? Of course, that is not the reason why the Chancellor introduced the scheme in 1986; he introduced it for flexibility, which is a by-product of co-ownership.

I would advise my hon. Friend, and it would be in keeping with the mood on both sides of the Committee, to open up that prospect over the next year or so. In the case of the John Lewis Partnership, we are not dealing with megabucks—the tens of thousands of pounds that might be at stake for highly paid individuals. We are speaking mainly of people for whom £1,000—an extra month's pay—is roughly the reward for success and, for that matter, for expansion.

During the next year the limit comes down from £4,000 to £2,000, and the following year it comes down from £2,000 to £1,000, before being eliminated—a millennium prize. Will my hon. Friend consider the mechanics of a scheme allowing one month's extra pay as a bonus or profit-share for companies that cannot offer a share ownership incentive? The John Lewis Partnership has no shares that can be given out to employees because they already own all the shares. Such a scheme would be in keeping with what many of us want to encourage.

My hon. Friend may reply that the John Lewis Partnership is a deadweight issue. I should explain to those who have not had discussions with the Treasury that every reasonable suggestion must get over the hurdles of deadweight, substitution and displacement. In this case it is a matter of deadweight. The Treasury might argue that the John Lewis Partnership has had profit-sharing or surplus-sharing for 70 years and did not introduce the practice because of the tax break allowed in 1986. I accept that, but the tax break was supposed to encourage the attitudes exemplified in one possible way by the John Lewis Partnership.

I ask my hon. Friend gently whether he has had meetings with the John Lewis Partnership. Would he or his advisers be prepared to talk to the partnership and to others who may be interested in this subset of issues? Will he reflect on the possibility that in the Finance Bill next year or the year after it might be in the public interest to find a way of protecting those who benefit at low levels?

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): The hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) addressed a request to his hon. Friend the Financial Secretary. I shall pose the same question to my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South (Ms Primarolo), in the expectation that she will shortly be on the Government Benches and have to decide on matters arising from the Bill.

Unusually, I was away from the House on Budget day. I was in a mock-up television studio in Wirral, South, listening to the Chancellor's statement. Among the people on the panel were ordinary constituents from Wirral, South. After listening to the Chancellor, one lady said, "Bang goes my new car," and her husband said, "There goes my profit-related pay." He was worried that a scheme that was on the verge of being signed would disappear. Part of the argument that had been put to him and his fellow workers in an engineering company was the incentive, to be part of that commonhold and to have a stake in the operation.

Like the hon. Member for Eltham, I have carefully studied John Lewis and other enterprises, such as Scott Bader—an unusual company with an equally odd history. In his will, Ernest Bader left the stock of the company to his employees. The company has survived through several recessions in a difficult area of chemical manufacturing. It should be regarded as a model operation.

Unusually in the chemical sector, which I know well from my constituency, the company is situated in one of the most beautiful locations in the country, in Northamptonshire. It is difficult to see that the factory is there. The ethos has survived in an attractive environment and the company has quietly got on with its job, competing effectively in a complex market. Through most of the 50-odd years since Ernest Bader's death, the attitude of the employees has been a determination to succeed. I think that employee stakeholding is an important element in that company's success. My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South described the exercise as a £4 billion experiment. According to the 1986 Lawson Budget, it was a potential solution to some of our unemployment difficulties and, by that measure alone, the experiment has not proved terribly successful. If it were properly utilised and generated a feeling of ownership among employees of an enterprise, the scheme could be termed a qualified success. However, we do not know whether that has occurred.

We are about to phase out tax relief on the basis of some new-found Treasury interpretation of fairness. The Chancellor claims that we cannot divide the work force permanently into groups of people who pay different levels of tax on the same earnings, depending on whether the firms for which they work are members of the scheme. Fairness has been cited as part of the reason for the Treasury's withdrawal of tax relief, but the Treasury does not reflect upon the success or failure of other aspects of the scheme: first, has it had an impact on employment; and, secondly, has it improved relations between employers and employees in the sort of enterprises that the hon. Member for Eltham and I described? We referred to model situations, but there are many other lesser examples elsewhere. The experiment should be evaluated much more seriously.

The scheme is somewhat muddled, and it is undoubtedly widely abused up and down the country by companies that view it as a convenient way of paying less tax rather than as a genuine measure that would achieve the objectives that the Chancellor set out when he introduced it. It is unfortunate that no one has tried to deal with those abuses. My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South referred to several highly publicised schemes whose raison d'être appears questionable in the context of the issues raised in the debate. The scheme has been poorly monitored.

If we are to make any progress in this area, we must encourage a culture whereby employees have a greater sense of ownership in their companies. I have been party to a number of discussions about employee share option schemes over the years, and there is no doubt that such schemes have the potential to change attitudes in very difficult circumstances. It is a pity that we cannot evaluate whether that has occurred in this instance.

I support the amendments spoken to by my hon. Friend. Against that background, I hope that the Minister will reflect a little more on the subject rather than simply ending the scheme apparently for reasons of fairness, which may be perfectly justified but which do not necessarily take account of the issues that hon. Members have raised today.

Mr. MacShane: I hope that the Minister will accept the amendments spoken to by my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South (Ms Primarolo) as it would be no bad thing to build into the Finance Bill a commitment to survey and examine thoroughly the workings of profit-related pay before the proposed phase-out, which would be discharged by another Government—I hope and expect that it will be a different Government.

My hon. Friend pointed out that Lord Lawson proposed the original changes to the tax law. I am extremely interested in this subject, but I did not know the extent to which profit-related pay in the context of British tax legislation was Lord Lawson's baby. It is remarkable how much of our catastrophic economic inheritance this decade is the result of that noble Lord's innovative decisions—whether it is the business expansion scheme, which led to widespread abuse, or the various other problems that have been set right in the past three or four Finance Bills. Many of our problems can be traced to the chancellorship of Lord Lawson, who I think is sinking down the league table of Chancellors—if there is such a thing. With each Finance Bill, he descends further down the historical ladder. I do not know what he is losing faster: his weight or his reputation. Although he has spawned some wonderful children who write eloquently about many subjects in our national newspapers, Lord Lawson's historical reputation now lies in tatters.

The question of profit-related pay is very important. The Government cannot simply write out 3.7 million taxpayers who have a stake in it: it is a significant part of their pay arrangements. We must consider the matter carefully and examine my hon. Friend's amendments. The earnings question is becoming more and more crucial in our modern society, as I was reminded over Christmas. A 17-year-old relative had secured holiday work in a restaurant and I asked whether she would be working on new year's eve. She replied, "No. The owner won't pay us double time, so none of us are turning up." I do not know whether it was a strike, but it was interesting that that 17-year-old and her fellow student workers had an idea of pay equity. When it was denied, they chose to do something else with their time.

A disturbing aspect of the debate about profit-related pay is that the notion of fair pay rates has been thrown out the window as a result of various economic and fiscal policies that the Government have introduced in the past 18 years. It is no longer a case of a fair day's pay for a fair day's work—the Rotherham job centre now advertises pay rates of £1.50 an hour. As the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development never ceases to remind us, Britain has the widest—and most rapidly widening—gap between incomes and pay of any European or east Asian economy. People are desperately worried about how they are paid and about how their earnings reflect their efforts.

Lord Lawson introduced the scheme in 1987 at the height of fascination with the Japanese economy. Dame Janet, you will recall from your visits to that wonderful country that the salaries of Japanese workers consist, in addition to monthly pay, of two annual bonuses that are supposed to be related to profits. At least, that was the myth. Anyone who speaks Japanese or who studies the complicated structures of the Japanese pay system soon learns that those bonuses are pre-negotiated and are not dependent on company profits. But the Government bought the myth that Japanese pay was profit-related and introduced it as a scheme to be encouraged in the United Kingdom. As we have seen, there has been a large increase in the use of it and nearly 3.7 million employees are involved.

The irony in Japan is that many Japanese companies are moving away from the payment of bonuses, whether negotiated or based on profit. Japanese firms are finding that what really counted in the Japanese labour market was job security. As that has disappeared in Japan, firms are beginning to find that they must negotiate much harder with their employees on the basis of normal wages. It is in that area rather than linkages to profit that the real issue of pay has to be discussed.

We know that the maximum annual tax-free payment under profit-related pay is £4,000 or 20 per cent. of salary, whichever is the lower. That can provide for a higher-rate taxpayer a tax saving of £1,600 a year. This debate raises questions that Ministers in the Treasury and other Departments will have to answer in 12, 24 or 36 months' time. Will the abolition of PRP lead to an impetus to pay-driven inflation as unions and employees seek to negotiate pay rises to compensate for the loss of tax relief?

The figures are startling. Higher-rate taxpayers would need to obtain a pay rise of £2,666 a year merely to compensate for the loss of PRP if companies did not make fair adjustments. My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South was right to stress the Treasury's responsibility to examine the issue in some depth and to send out messages or signals to ensure that companies do not cheat on their employees' pay. As I said, an extra £2,666 would need to be paid each year to compensate for the loss of PRP. It is a sizeable sum. We have been told that abolition stems from the cost of relief, which is running at about £1.5 billion a year.

There seems, however, to be some intellectual dishonesty. If PRP had been introduced in all sincerity—in other words, had the Treasury wanted the scheme to work and wanted companies to move to paying partly on the basis of profits—it cannot be assumed that it would cover only 1, 2, 3 or 4 per cent. of the taxpaying population and the companies that employ taxpayers. It would have to cover the entire taxpaying population. Thus a level of tax relief ought to have been built into the planning of such a scheme, covering everyone.

The real reason for abolition—strong evidence has been put before the Committee this evening—is that PRP has been abused. My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South quoted figures from Ernst and Young. I have seen an unpublished study produced by two young academics working on their masters dissertation at City university, which was sent to me a couple of weeks ago. They have examined different forms of share save, PRP, employee share ownership plans and share option schemes.

The section on PRP in that report was extraordinary. It showed clearly that the vast majority of companies use PRP only as a tax fiddle and that if tax relief was removed, they would kill it stone dead. It was shown that PRP was not built in, as Lord Lawson had hoped, to encourage a relationship between the employee and the output of the company as expressed in terms of profit, but to avoid tax.

Thus there is a growing number of so-called salary sacrifice schemes, where employees exchange part of their salary for PRP. Often there is little risk to employees that their pay will fall. In a sense, the scheme was not related to cyclical profitability because it became a tax abuse scheme.

Service companies, and especially professional partnerships, will regularly use PRP vehicles, where it is relatively easy to engineer the required profit level. In an earlier debate, there were references to wings and fuselages of aeroplanes being separated for tax accountancy purposes. Similarly, accountants can separate out the earnings and profits of employees and companies, park them in different companies and ensure that a scheme that was started with good intent becomes a tax avoidance fiddle.

In certain schemes, it became clear during the year that if the profit target for PRP purposes would not be met, the scheme would be suspended, with employees keeping the PRP that they received up to that point. Again, we find abuse of the scheme, there being no relationship to profit. Employees at all levels, from managers down to apprentices, do not accept such variation in their pay. The concept is spreading to quasi public sector areas such as higher education, where we are almost drifting into abuse. Lecturers are paid on throughput rather than on quality and the raising of education standards.

Instead of abolishing PRP so brutally and coldly in the Budget, perhaps it would have been better to tighten the rules so that relief applied only to genuine schemes in which a part of employees' pay would fluctuate in line with employers' profitability.

The John Lewis scheme has been mentioned, under which 36,000 employees receive pay on the basis of the company's profitability. That is not the result of Lord Lawson's intervention 10 years ago. The John Lewis scheme has been in operation for more than 70 years. Many of us who shop at John Lewis and Peter Jones, or different partnership stores such as Waitrose, believe that, like the motto, "Never Knowingly Undersold", the Government should not so knowingly undervalue the contribution that is made by John Lewis employees. Those employees are now to see a very good system for them thrown out the window.

There will be a move to another tax relief benefits scheme, perhaps a miniature version of the fat-cat package, which has caused such scandal in recent years. The most obvious candidate is an approved profit-sharing scheme under which employees might be given shares. The employer will be exempt from tax on the distribution of shares, provided that they are held by employees for three years. That, however, will not be fair on firms such as John Lewis—because, as with many other firms, John Lewis does not have marketable shares. It will not be fair on partnerships, co-operatives, trusts and many small firms that cannot gain advantage under an approved profit-sharing scheme that is based on employee share distribution.

I support the amendments and I hope that the Minister will accept them. I hope also that he will understand that we want a serious examination to take place. One weakness of the current rules is the lack of an obligation imposed on employers to disclose to their employees the profit target for PRP purposes. In other words, employees do not know what they are meant to achieve by their extra work, diligence, innovation and imagination in making the company more successful, and, of course, there is the question of what profit is eventually achieved, be it within the firm as a whole or in its different component parts.

Employers should be required to disclose that information and put it in an historic and more general context. Opposition Members do not want to see profit-related pay thrown out the window with quite the casual indifference proposed by Conservative Members who are seeking to bury Lord Lawson. We believe that PRP could become more effective in motivating staff, involving them in the business.

In relation to quoted companies, it could be argued that the disclosure of profit targets to staff constitutes price-sensitive information, but that is no more significant than the profit estimates that are routinely issued and updated by brokers as a company's accounting period progresses, which anybody who deals in shares can get from the many consultants in the City, or even from the Internet, where they are widely available.

One of the fascinating aspects of profit-related pay—I, of course, would be the hon. Member to bring this up, Dame Janet—is that it is now becoming a European issue. The European Commission, inspired by the take-up of PRP in Britain, is now examining the idea of profit-related pay and, indeed, seeing whether a directive could be crafted to encourage it in other European countries. It seems a shame that the Government are throwing profit-related pay out the window just at the moment when Europeans are adopting what is, at its kernel and with reforms, a sound British idea.

Mr. Tipping: I shall speak briefly and compare and contrast two schemes that have been brought to my attention recently in the Nottingham area, one of which shows the positive values of profit-related schemes; the other can be described only as an abuse.

I shall start with the abuse. In the autumn, some people employed at Nottingham university came to see me to suggest that the university was to have a "salary sacrifice" scheme. They were somewhat bemused in that they wondered how an institute of higher education could produce profit in the true sense of the word. They were also keen to point out to me that profit-related schemes have traditionally come from the private sector, and that the university, although no longer clearly in the public sector, was not a private sector animal in the true sense of the word.

Those people were not just academics. The people most concerned were technicians who had worked at the university for many years. One of them, Graham Tomlinson, is a stalwart of the local community. He described the scheme as a scam. He said that it is about making money for the university and about tax avoidance. He said that they had been given assurances that they were not at risk. He pointed out that the whole point of the exercise was for the university to save money. He is a man of some integrity. He took the view that he did not want to avoid paying taxes, because he could see the irony of a situation in which his taxes allowed education to continue. In effect, taxes funded the university. I am pleased to say that the scheme at the university has not gone ahead.

I contrast that scheme with the one at Philip A. Minson, a manufacturer and distributor of net curtains in the Nottingham area. Again, the directors and employees contacted me to say that theirs is a profit-related scheme in the true sense of the word. Its employees take risks. Their salary is dependent upon how the company performs. They pointed out to me that now that the scheme has come into effect, they are all stakeholders in the company and that performance has improved.

I am concerned about what appears to be real abuse, and 3.6 million people are affected. There are about 13,000 schemes. In 2000, £1.7 billion will be saved. There is a real issue here.

I am keen to support the amendment because it looks to the future, to a situation that I am keen to see—people adding value to their company, the company valuing them, and people becoming stakeholders in companies. There is abuse, as at Nottingham university, but there are examples of excellent practice, as at Philip A. Minson. That is why I am very pleased that the amendment calls for reports to be made in future.

I do not think that this is the end of the line for the issue. I very much hope that, in future, we will introduce measures and policies that really will ensure that people who work for companies are part of that company, that they are valued by that company and that in effect they become stakeholders, who get a payback from the company.

Mr. Pearson: I begin by paying a warm tribute to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for taking the decision to phase out profit-related pay schemes. That was described in the magazine Taxation as being "politically courageous". That is right. Politics is about taking hard decisions. Undoubtedly there are a number of genuine profit-related pay schemes, but it is clear from all the survey evidence that has been published that there have been widespread abuses.

If you will excuse me, Sir Geoffrey, I shall be self-indulgent and quote myself. I have never done that before. In the Standing Committee that considered the Finance Bill last year, I said:

"all too often PRP schemes have been abused and used by companies as a tax dodge."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 15 February 1996; c. 351.]

I pointed to the significant level of programme dead weight and the lack of additionality of the vast majority of PRP schemes. I also highlighted the fact that it was very much a get rich scheme for consultants, who were visiting companies and telling them, "I know how I can save money on your wages bill," and making a very easy sale because the tax man was picking up the cost.

I feel sorry for those who have been operating genuine PRP schemes. I recognise that there might be some danger that the Chancellor has, as one of the directors of the CBI pointed out at the time of the Budget, but I do not see any practical alternative when legislating in this area.

"thrown the baby out with the bath water,"

I have particular sympathy for the John Lewis Partnership, which was mentioned earlier. Last year, it paid out more than a third of its £150 million profit in profit shares. The company chairman said:

"No doubt some clever accountants and lawyers have run rings around the PRP rules, but the John Lewis scheme was a genuine sharing of profit from top to bottom of the company."

I believe that to be correct. I have sympathy for any employees who will lose out as a result. I do not think that we can ignore the widespread abuses of the scheme. That is why the Chancellor was fundamentally right to take his decision.

I must disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) when he put the blame on Lord Lawson for the abuse of the PRP scheme. I think that any blame should be placed on another former Chancellor, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont). Until March 1991, fewer than 300,000 people were covered by PRP schemes; it was the March 1991 Budget, which doubled PRP relief, that led directly to the widespread abuse of the schemes that has occurred since then. In less than five years, membership of PRP schemes has grown from 300,000 to 3.7 million.

It is worth reiterating the statement made by the Chancellor in his Budget speech, when he spoke of the 3.7 million people who would be affected by abolition of the scheme. He said:

"I can no longer justify the ever increasing cost of the tax relief to the 22 million taxpayers who are not in profit-related pay schemes. We cannot permanently divide the work force into groups of people who pay different levels of tax on the same earnings depending on whether the firm that they work for is in a scheme or not. The aim . . . of widespread use of PRP—has been achieved, and I would rather make faster progress on lower taxes for everybody."—[Official Report, 26 November 1996; Vol. 286, c.165.]

I know that intellectual consistency is not normally the remit of politicians, but if what the Chancellor said, rightly in my view—I refer to the words

"We cannot permanently divide the work force into groups . . . who pay different levels of tax on the same earnings depending on whether the firm that they work for is in a scheme or not"— applies to the 3.7 million people who currently benefit from PRP schemes, it applies equally to the 700,000 or so people who are participating in profit-sharing schemes, the 500,000 participating in "save as you earn" share option schemes and the 100,000 or thereabouts participating in company share ownership plans, which used to be described as discretionary share option schemes.

If the Chancellor is intellectually consistent, he is clearly indicating that he wants to abolish tax relief on "save as you earn" share option schemes, company share ownership plans and profit-sharing schemes. If that is indeed the Government's intention, perhaps the Minister will tell us so in his reply.

Mr. Jack: The amendment invites us to spend up to £150,000 on a report. That is unnecessary public expenditure. The details will be recorded in the Inland Revenue statistics, and I see nothing in the arguments that we have heard that commends the amendment.

The second amendment confirms that profit-related schemes can save costs for companies. The job that Lord Lawson set out to do with the profit-related pay schemes—encouraging the establishment of such schemes—has now been done; my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor now believes that the relationship of profit to pay can be sustained, but without the need for further support from the tax system. I am therefore confirmed in that line of argument in the substantive part of the relevant clause.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) mentioned John Lewis. I have received a letter and a telephone call from my hon. Friend, and I will consider carefully what he has said; but I remind him that John Lewis has made it clear that it wishes to continue its scheme although, on this occasion, the profit-related pay scheme and the tax relief associated with it have been withdrawn.

I invite the House to reject the amendment.

Ms Primarolo: That was a rapid speech from the Financial Secretary. I think that he was spoken to about the length of the answers that he was giving. It is a shame that he could not be a little more forthcoming about the Government's assessment of the success of the profit-related pay scheme. It was breathtaking to hear him say that the Government balk at spending £150,000 on a report, when they have just spent £4 billion on a scheme that did not work. Let me add, just in case anyone thinks that that is a spending commitment, that we think that it could be done with the current resources.

There are genuine schemes. I am sorry that the Financial Secretary could not be more helpful to his hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley), who made some very fair points about how we could assist in the future and continue to pursue the Government's stated objective. We have supported that objective—enabling employees to share in the profitability of the companies that employ them, which would encourage greater participation and more understanding of those companies.

We entirely agree with the Government that they could not and should not continue to preside over a scheme that was being so widely abused, but we are entitled to a fuller explanation of the likely impact of the removal of the relief than "The Chancellor believes that it will be OK". I think that—to quote the Chancellor—hell will freeze over before we believe what the Chancellor has to tell us, if it is not substantiated.

The Financial Secretary has behaved in a cavalier fashion this evening. There is a substantial amount of expenditure that he is not prepared to justify. The Government were prepared to squander taxpayers' resources without explaining why. The scheme that we are discussing was a clear abuse—an abuse that they knew was going on—and they have now left 3.7 million people high and dry in schemes that are to be wound up.

We will pursue the matter on another occasion; but, as the Committee wants to make progress, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 62 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 92

AGRICULTURAL PROPERTY RELIEF

Mr. Tipping: I beg to move amendment No. 6, in clause 92, page 81, line 19, at end insert—

(c) the public are allowed reasonable access thereto.'.

This is a small amendment, but I consider it important. It could be described as a stile—a little hurdle that I want to put in the way of the Financial Secretary, making him pause for a moment and reflect before continuing on his path. I hope that we can find a signpost directing us to an agreed way forward: I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House believe that it is possible to improve the landscape and the environment, while at the same time allowing a greater opportunity for the public to enjoy the countryside.

At the time of the Budget, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food put out a press release which stated:

"The average full year cost of the proposal is estimated to be negligible."

It is clear to me, and to my colleagues on the Front Bench, that the time has come to review rigorously all aspects of public spending, and I think that some real and hard choices must be made about priority. I felt that there was a throwaway ring to those words in the press release: the cost was "estimated to be negligible".

It reminds me of the old story about expenditure bids. A bid of 0.1 per cent., or one tenth of 1 per cent., will not break the Treasury—but I know that my colleagues are mindful of the fact that just a thousand pledges like that would eat up the entire Budget.

[Mr. Tipping]

One very interesting policy development has been the growth in so-called agro-environmental schemes—of which the prime mover is the countryside stewardship scheme. The amount of money committed to the countryside stewardship scheme has grown considerably. I estimate that, as of 1 April 1996, £11 million was committed to it. This Budget provides it with another £5 million, which, in the 1997-98 financial year, will increase spending on it to £21 million.

I am not necessarily concerned about that expenditure, because a strong policy argument can be made that, if we want to make payments to farmers and landowners, we should switch the focus from payments for crop production to payments to improve the landscape and environment and to attract wildlife—to "green" the landscape, to benefit us all and to add value to the world. If one wished to discover where savings could be made, one should examine arable area payments. In 1995, £1 billion in such payments were made to farmers and landowners.

I have no doubt that the type of schemes we are discussing are the schemes of the future and that they represent a switch in emphasis to achieve a "green premium". I support many aspects of the proposals; I merely seek to improve them. The schemes' principles are right, but they have not worked in practice. My amendment would require that, in habitat schemes, before tax concessions are made. I draw the Committee's attention to the word "reasonable" in my amendment.

"the public are allowed reasonable access"

There has always been conflict between public access and the need to protect countryside and habitat, and those conflicts must be resolved. The proposals will lead to increased bird life, for example, which I welcome. There have also been some very useful attempts to use set-aside lands as areas in which birds can breed and be protected. However, people should also have a right to access, so that they can go to look at birds and to see what is happening in the countryside. Countryside protection benefits not only wildlife but people, and finding a reasonable balance is extremely important. The history of agro-environment schemes does not make pleasant reading because, as I said, although enhancing the environment and greening the environment is the right principle, in practice we are not achieving that goal.

I should draw the Minister's attention to schemes that accomplish the twin goals of creating wildlife habitat and of allowing greater public access. One current scheme—public access to environmentally sensitive areas—has all the hallmarks of the proposals that we are considering. I am holding a map that allegedly shows the public how they can locate a public access area in Dartmoor. The applicant is Mr. R. Jephson, who lives in Bedfordshire, and the address on the map is in Bedfordshire. As the map provides no other references to the site's location, it would be impossible for anyone to find the site, which is in Devon. The map was produced by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and circulated by it in September 1995, and represents land that has been committed as an environmentally sensitive area, to which the public should have access. However, it does not give anyone a clue or a chance to find the land, because people would be looking for it in Bedfordshire rather than in Devon.

The countryside access scheme is similar to the environmentally sensitive area scheme. I am holding two examples of the maps, documentation and information on that scheme published by MAFF. One of the examples concerns the operation of the scheme at Denham Hill farm. The problem is that "Denham Hill farm" is the only information provided on the location of the site. The map provides no other information, such as a nearby village, or any other way in which to find the site. We are paying a subsidy to that farmer so that people can enjoy a right to walk over his fields, but no one can find where his farm is located.

An even better example is provided in a letter, dated 13 February 1996, from MAFF to the Ramblers Association, in which the association is advised that there is a right of access to a site belonging to an applicant—the Guilde Morden Townlands charity. The map does not provide the name of a town, county, road or other reference, but shows only a track, a pit and a coloured open-field site. We are paying significant amounts of money under the countryside access scheme to farmers and landowners, but, as MAFF's documentation shows, the public cannot find the sites. I spent a great deal of time trying to find the land belonging to the Guilde Morden Townlands charity, but I have been unable to do so. The examples demonstrate the current waste and abuse of public money.

I have worked with the Ramblers Association in examining the countryside access scheme and public access to environmentally sensitive areas, and we have surveyed many sites. I think that we can draw two conclusions from those efforts. The first is that few people know of the so-called "new opportunities" because of poor publicity and misleading and unhelpful information. Secondly, once the sites have been located, local people have made it clear that, in half the cases, public access or a public footpath had already existed, and that, in a quarter of the cases, a de facto right to roam had already existed. The public are therefore losing out twice, because they either cannot find the sites, or, in 75 per cent. of the cases, they already had access to them. The situation is not scandalous, but I am deeply disturbed that significant amounts of money are being paid for the public to have rights of access which they cannot exercise or which already existed.

As I said, the largest scheme is the countryside stewardship scheme, which the Agriculture Minister recently described as the premier vehicle for protecting and enhancing countryside access. The countryside stewardship scheme has the hallmarks of failure of the two other schemes that I mentioned.

I draw the Minister's attention to a document entitled "Countryside Stewardship Scheme: Public Access Sites", which I helped the Ramblers Association to publish in March 1995. It was a survey of all the countryside stewardship schemes in the country at that time. It was a major undertaking in that 600 sites were examined.

The survey found that a third of the sites were difficult to find, as I described in relation to other schemes, and, significantly, that 21 per cent. of the grid or ordnance survey references were wrong. That is clearly bad practice. More than 30 per cent. of sites had no sign at the entrance to say that they were countryside stewardship sites although such a sign is a condition of receiving a grant. Perhaps most important, 48 per cent. or almost half of the sites had access problems.

Following the map provided by the Countryside Commission, I accessed a site at Pye Bridge—not far from the Economic Secretary's constituency in Derbyshire—and had to cross the Midland main line. There are eight tracks at that point and, as the Minister knows, trains travel the line in excess of 120 mph. Clearly, that site was wrongly identified and people's lives were being put at risk. I am pleased that the Countryside Commission has now taken the site off its list.

Of the sites surveyed, access was already available to 44 per cent. of them. One criticism of the scheme is that sites are difficult to find, but, when they are found, it appears that de facto access or access across a footpath is already available. Such schemes need to perform better. I estimate that the access element of the countryside stewardship scheme will cost £6 million over 10 years. To put it baldly, we are not getting value for money.

Another example of such a scheme is the conditional exemption from inheritance tax scheme under which the public are also allowed greater access to the countryside. The amendment is clear in seeking reasonable public access to land that is in a habitat scheme, but the conditionality of inheritance tax also has all the hallmarks of failure. I have raised this matter with the Financial Secretary before and I am very grateful for the interest that he has so far taken in it. I hope he will not find it churlish if I say that I have admired his interest but not what has been achieved.

Again, there is a loss of inheritance tax to the public purse in—allegedly—allowing the public greater access to the countryside. The problem with this specific scheme is that because of taxpayer confidentiality, sites cannot be identified. Therefore, the public are in theory being allowed greater access to the countryside, but taxpayer confidentiality means that no one is told where the sites are. That is absolutely crazy, and I do not believe that anyone can justify that situation.

The Countryside Commission administers the scheme on behalf of the Government. I know that the commission itself would like to see a change, and I hope that conditional exemption from IT and the habitat scheme will both be changed to allow greater public access so that people know where the sites are and can access them.

I said that the Financial Secretary had been extremely helpful, although some of the answers to my questions did not inspire me with confidence. On 29 March 1996, the Financial Secretary replied to a written question. I asked how many sites had been given

"conditional exemption from IT on the basis of public access having been granted."

He replied:

"The information requested about the number of locations which have been granted conditional exemption is not available."

That is not good practice.

In answer to another written question, the Financial Secretary confirmed that the cost of conditional exemption in such cases was between £5 million and £10 million each year. We are talking about significant sums of money—£5 million to £10 million a year in loss of inheritance tax, £10 million over 10 years on countryside stewardship schemes, and lesser amounts for the smaller schemes that I mentioned.

It is imperative that the spirit of the amendment is accepted. If payments are to be made, either in cash or by the avoidance of inheritance tax being allowed, the public should get something back—they should have greater access. The central problem is that Departments, backed by Ministers, are unwilling to advertise the sites.

Also on conditional exemption, I asked the Financial Secretary what consultation had taken place. Again on 29 March 1996, he replied that tourist offices and town halls had been consulted. Since receiving that reply, I have written to every county council in England. With three exceptions, none could find any evidence at all of being consulted. To be fair, three did say that they were consulted but were not prepared to give details of sites in their county because of the prescription of taxpayer confidentiality. Some did not know, and a smaller group would not say. It was the same when tourist information centres were contacted.

I asked the Financial Secretary how he knew that the relevant tourist centres were displaying information telling people about access to the countryside. Also on 29 March 1996, he replied:

"I am unable to provide the requested information about tourist information centres as it is not held centrally. And, in any event, providing such information may help identify individual cases of tax exemption, thus compromising the normal rules on taxpayer confidentiality."—[Official Report, 29 March 1996; Vol. 274, c. 777.]

There we have it—a promise is being made that tourist information centres are consulted and have the necessary information but, at the same time, the Financial Secretary is saying that they are not allowed to display that information for reasons of taxpayer confidentiality. To put it bluntly, it is a real mess—a quagmire. I have anxieties that the clause will lead to similar problems. Substantial amounts of money are being paid to farmers and landowners.

It is important that people who want access to the countryside—there is an ever-growing demand—should have the information to find the locations that they want and that there should be new public access. That is the purpose of the amendment. It is a long, hard road, but people will not give up easily. There is a tremendous desire across the United Kingdom for a better, greener landscape. We want to enjoy that landscape.

There should be a partnership between the Government and those who want to go to the countryside. The Government's policies have set up a series of misdirections, stiles and blocks on footpaths. That is not good enough. People will not tolerate it and there will have to be change. The amendment is a small step in pushing for that.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): I should like to comment on the amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping), whom I am delighted to follow, and his Front Bench colleagues. I oppose both amendments.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. I must point out to the hon. Gentleman that we are debating only amendment No. 6.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Indeed. Amendment No. 6 was moved by the hon. Member for Sherwood and deals with public access to habitat scheme sites. I apologise for being confused about which amendments we are discussing. I hope to be able to catch your eye on the following amendment as well, Sir Geoffrey, but I shall now confine my remarks to the right of public access to habitat schemes.

A description of what the habitat schemes in question are designed to achieve might be helpful. A pilot scheme was launched in May 1994, aimed at creating or enhancing certain valuable habitats by taking land out of agricultural production, or introducing extensive grazing, and managing it for the benefit of wildlife. The scheme targets three types of habitat: water fringes in six designated areas; farmland previously in the five-year set-aside scheme; and coastal salt marsh.

There is a philosophical divide between the two sides of the Committee. I believe that this country's extensive right of way system is not used to its fullest extent. If the system was already fully used, I could begin to understand the objections of the hon. Member for Sherwood, but it is not. There are a number of reasons for the lack of use, not least of which is the presence of one or two unco-operative landowners and farmers. I condemn those who block up proper rights of way. The Countryside Commission's target is that all rights of way should be open by 2000.

Introducing a public right of way over habitat scheme areas in a Finance Bill is not the right way to proceed. When a Government introduce an agri-environment scheme, they have to ask what that scheme is designed to achieve. I have already set out the nature of the scheme; it is designed to create better habitat. Many of the habitats that we are trying to create need peace and quiet. The Opposition's policy of a right to roam, with people wandering everywhere, would not work with this scheme. Permission to bring the scheme into effect will be granted only if the organisers believe that it will achieve the desired objectives. That will happen only with an out of the ordinary habitat, which would be impossible to achieve with people wandering everywhere. I strongly oppose the introduction in a Finance Bill of the right to roam over habitat scheme areas.

The Government have an excellent record on agri-environment schemes, including the habitat scheme. The public want that to continue. We spend approximately £100 million a year on agri-environment schemes. That is a creditable record. I am delighted that the countryside stewardship scheme budget for England alone is £46 million. I hope that Labour Members warmly welcome our agri-environment programme.

I do not want any action to be taken that would damage that progress. I have an interest to declare—I am a farmer. I am also a member of the Environment Select Committee. I believe in the duty of landowners and farmers to enhance the environment of our precious planet. I cannot support the amendment, because it would jeopardise the habitat scheme. There may well be other schemes in which a specific provision for a right of public access might be reasonable, but that should be implemented when the scheme is introduced, and by the same Ministry. When the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food introduced the scheme, it had no intention of making public access part of it.

Imagine a rare bird, such as the stone curlew, nesting in a habitat scheme area. Some well-meaning rambler might come along, not knowing what he was looking for or why the area had been designated as a habitat scheme, and put his foot on that rare nest.

Mr. Tipping: If the hon. Gentleman looks closely at the amendment he will see the words, "reasonable access". I would certainly not put my foot on the nest. I know that the hon. Gentleman agrees with the point that I made about the need to balance conflicting interests in the countryside. That is why the word, "reasonable" has been included in the amendment.

Mr. Clifton–Brown: I am grateful for that helpful intervention, which shows that we agree on the fundamental point that there should be proper access to the countryside. It is a pity when conflict occurs. However, we then part company. I do not believe that the scheme in question would benefit from increased public access, for the reasons that I have given. Many other schemes, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, have public access provisions built in.

In the spirit of open government that we Conservatives believe in, any public access provision built into a scheme should work properly, otherwise it should not be in the scheme. I deplore the fact that certain people have undertaken to give public access and then obfuscated that undertaking at every stage. They should not draw public money with the promise of access and then try to deny the public that right, but that is not the case with the habitat scheme. On that basis, I find it very hard to support the amendment.

I suspect that I would part company with the hon. Member for Sherwood over a general right to roam, which the amendment encompasses. All my remarks apply to a general right to roam, because exactly the same arguments can be applied both to the right to roam and to the right of public access to a habitat scheme area. Given his rambling interests, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman accepts that, just as there are irresponsible landowners and farmers who are causing difficulties with legitimate rights of way, there are some irresponsible ramblers. If the public are allowed to wander all over the place, some irresponsible ramblers will put their foot in it in the manner that I have described. If the hon. Gentleman accepts that there are some irresponsible ramblers, he must agree that we have to channel them into certain places.

The habitat scheme forms part of an agri-environment scheme that the Environment Committee has considered. There is no doubt that some habitat schemes are near areas to which there is much access, such as the Cotswolds national trail and other national trails. The Select Committee visited one such trail in the Peak district national park, where great boulders had to be lifted in by helicopter to accommodate the huge right of access.

I am not suggesting that habitat schemes and the terms of the amendment relate to such huge numbers of people, but one never knows. If such a scheme happened to be on the edge of a large conurbation, the very purpose for which the scheme was set up—to keep the area peaceful, tranquil and undisturbed—might be undermined.

It is very hard to divine why the hon. Member for Sherwood has chosen to table an amendment on habitat schemes. I could have understood his tabling an amendment on one or two of the other schemes, where public access is catered for; I would have had some sympathy for his argument. When providing access, people who approved the scheme and paid public money for it, with the landowner and the farmer, would have considered the problem of excess public access and concluded that they could easily cope. I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman has thought the matter through and considered all the implications.

I am keen to ensure that our environment is enhanced. We are considering not only some of our rare birds, about which we hear so much. The Environment Committee went to the natural history museum the other day to learn more about some of our endangered species. Habitat schemes were designed and introduced precisely to protect some of them. Although we hear much about some of our high-profile creatures, such as hawks, raptors and some of the small songbirds, habitat schemes are designed to protect many other extremely rare species.

The Environment Committee was given a great lecture on lepidoptera—butterflies—and learnt that at least six species are in serious danger in the British Isles. Habitat schemes were specifically designed to help such very rare species, and rely entirely on the progression down the species in the animal kingdom. The progression starts with the larger mammals, which the schemes might help to protect, and goes down to smaller mammals and birds. Birds depend on food such as smaller insects, molluscs and other items further down the food chain. Many small insects are preyed on by larger animals, and they too need to be protected. That is precisely why the habitat schemes were inaugurated.

On the visit to the natural history museum—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. This is all very pleasant, but it would be helpful to the House if the hon. Gentleman spoke about the amendment.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: That is precisely what I was trying to do.

The First Deputy Chairman: The hon. Gentleman should try to be more successful in doing so.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I shall try to confine my remarks more closely to the ramblers who put their foot in it, for whom the hon. Member for Sherwood is trying to prevent people receiving tax concessions.

The amendment concerns not only larger mammals, birds and butterflies, but smaller insects. Experts in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food tell me that the habitat schemes are very important for the smaller insects. A computer mapping scheme on a worldwide basis includes the huge amount of information held at the natural history museum. It is the largest database in the world concerning all sorts of species. It is absolutely vital to preserve valuable habitat schemes and vital smaller insects for future generations to study. A vital aspect of the food chain would otherwise be lost.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Sadly, I heard only part of the most interesting speech of the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping). Does my hon. Friend agree that the right to roam, which is very much part of the argument advanced by the hon. Gentleman, has costs? Does he accept that those who grant the right to roam and want to move across the countryside contribute a cost, whereas those who are part of the countryside and have to maintain it must meet that cost? I am sure that, as a practising farmer and one who represents an agricultural constituency, my hon. Friend knows a great deal about such matters. Will he comment on the cost of the right to roam, which is so much part of the hon. Gentleman's argument?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for introducing the subject of a right to roam, on which I have tangentially touched. I must, however, return to the smaller insects and the molluscs. [Laughter.] I do not know why hon. Members are laughing. I do not find the subject at all funny; it is very serious. The hon. Member for Sherwood wants the public to be able to walk all over—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman must relate his remarks to the amendment and the clause. He is failing to do so. I hope that I do not have to draw that to his attention any more.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am very grateful for your advice, Sir Geoffrey. I thought that I was trying to relate my remarks to the clause. We are talking about exemption from inheritance tax in relation to habitat schemes. The substantive Opposition amendment will be debated next, but the hon. Member for Sherwood is trying to give members of the public an automatic right to roam on sites exempt from inheritance tax.

Mr. Tipping: I wish to draw the attention of the hon. Gentleman, again, to the amendment, which refers to "reasonable access". I have pointed this out to him, but he is getting carried away with his own enthusiasm. "Reasonable access" tries to balance the needs of the habitat and wildlife—about which he talks so eloquently—and the needs of the public. He knows that the countryside is a living countryside and that there must be a balance between those interests. The conflict between them interests all of us who are concerned with the future of the countryside.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Bearing in mind your strictures, Sir Geoffrey, and the two interesting interventions that we have heard, I shall move on to the second part of my speech and deal with "reasonable access thereto"—the exact words used in the amendment.

Mr. Winterton: Does my hon. Friend accept that my intervention relating to the cost of "reasonable access" had an important impact on the amendment? The amendment states that the public should be allowed reasonable access, and the clause relates to inheritance tax. I repeat that my hon. Friend has considerable knowledge of the countryside because of his practical experience as a farmer. Are there not considerable costs involved with this amendment? Should not the amendment—which the hon. Member for Sherwood has quite reasonably tabled—clearly reflect the costs involved for those who own the land in question?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reinforcing his earlier intervention. It is a good point to debate. What is "reasonable access"? Does it mean one person a year having access to one habitat site? Does it mean that an enormous number of people should have access, such as we saw in the Peak district national park where rocks were flown in by helicopter to maintain paths? They had to fly in rocks because thousands of people were visiting the area. I do not disparage that, but is it "reasonable access" to a habitat scheme? I would suggest that it is not.

If the amendment were accepted, we would need a clearer definition of "reasonable access". My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) is absolutely right to suggest that a general right to roam is not "reasonable access" as it will have a cost. He rightly pointed out that I am a practising farmer, and I obtain some of my income from my farm. I know full well that unreasonable access on a completely ad hoc basis—which the hon. Member for Sherwood is seeking—could do immense damage, particularly to stock-rearing areas where, I understand, many of the habitat schemes envisaged in the amendment would be.

The hon. Member for Sherwood wants the public to have an unfettered right of access to habitat scheme areas, but does he believe that that would damage the livelihoods of farmers? I support a right of access, provided that access is channelled to the right place at the right time, but if the public were able to walk everywhere—as I believe the amendment would allow—it would cause damage. For example, dogs might stray as a result of the type of irresponsible rambler to whom I have referred.

The key to all my remarks is that farmers' livelihoods are being damaged by irresponsible ramblers, and although farmers accept that the vast majority of ramblers are responsible, there is always one who spoils it for everybody else. For example, a rambler might allow his dog loose and the dog might kill several lambs or ewes. Who will pick up the bill for that? The rambler who has let his dog loose will be long gone by the time anyone discovers what has happened.

Mr. Tipping: May I remind the hon. Gentleman for the third time that the amendment does not ask for unfettered access but "reasonable access"? My position on this matter is set out clearly in the Access to the Countryside Bill, which I advise him to read. He can then identify my position, rather than make a false prospectus. Many of the points that he has made could not be attached to the Access to the Countryside Bill.

Mr. Clifton–Brown: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for trying to clarify his position, and I look forward with great interest to reading his Bill.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): I wandered in and thought that I had got my days wrong. I heard the discussions about habitats, but I thought that we were discussing the Finance Bill. I have listened with interest to my hon. Friend who, if I may say so, is making heavy weather of this. I hold no brief for the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping), but the word "reasonable" is very important in the legal sense. We all know that some people abuse these schemes, but we must bear it in mind that the public legitimately want access to the countryside and that we want to preserve habitats. There should be "reasonable access" and some give and take by farmers and ramblers. If people start going the wrong way, we must take action against them. But perhaps we should be more liberal than regressive on this matter.

Mr. Clifton–Brown: I am trying hard to keep my remarks brief, Sir Geoffrey, but I keep being distracted. Unfortunately, my hon. Friend was not here for the start of my speech, so I must briefly tell him that I am not against public access at all, but that we must have the right attitude towards it. The existing rights of way network should be upheld, but if the hon. Member for Sherwood wants to table an amendment such as this, he must specify what he means by "reasonable access."

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): The hon. Gentleman is making a terrible meal of this. He has made clear to the House that he has interests in a farm, and so have I. My farm is in Scotland where there is, in effect, a right to roam. It has never caused anybody any problems, and there is a good partnership between members of the public who walk around the countryside and the farming industry. What is the point in having a habitat scheme to protect habitats for the benefit of the public if we deny the public reasonable access to them? He is overdoing it.

Mr. Clifton–Brown: The hon. Gentleman has shown clearly that he has no idea what the habitat scheme is for. The whole idea is to keep an area completely undisturbed to enhance a particular habitat, and we must not get that muddled up with other areas of farming land where the public have a perfect right of access. The whole idea is that we wish to enhance particular flora or fauna which otherwise would not exist. That is why we are prepared to pay taxpayers' hard-earned money—to enhance those things that the public want to see.

I do not know about the farm of the hon. Member for East Lothian, but if the amendment were to be applied to it, I suspect that valuable areas of habitat might be affected. We are talking about small areas, and we do not want to deny the public the right of access to huge areas of countryside. We are making heavy weather of this because I keep being interrupted. The amendment is absolutely nonsensical and totally contrary to the purposes of the scheme. On that basis, I totally oppose it.

Mr. Alan Milburn (Darlington): We have had an interesting diversion for the last 28 minutes. It has been a veritable tour de force—a tour of fauna and flora, molluscs, insects and the animal kingdom.

I want to bring the debate back to the amendment. My hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping) has raised an important issue, which is something of a hardy annual in Finance Bills: it comes back year after year. My hon. Friend should be congratulated on being such a doughty champion of the right of access to land that has benefited from the public purse. He raised the issue in Committee last year and he has done so again today, this time in relation to clause 92, which extends inheritance tax relief to land within habitat schemes.

The amendment would make the relief conditional on a modicum—a reasonable amount—of public access. That is exactly the sort of phraseology that was encompassed in the original Act to deal with the issue: the Finance Act 1976. The continual concern of the hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton–Brown) about the words "reasonable access" can therefore perhaps be laid to rest if he cares to examine previous laws dealing with the matter.

The argument is not about the principle of relieving inheritance tax in exchange for gaining public access to important parts of the countryside. The simple principle is that if the taxpayer is forking out a small fortune—because that is what is represented by the millions of pounds of revenue forgone in the past—the Government should ensure that the recipients either fulfil their obligations to public access or forgo the tax advantage.

It is a question of rights and responsibilities: the right to receive public subsidy and the responsibility to guarantee public access. That is the principle that my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood wants to enshrine in the law through the amendment. The problem, as he said both this year and last year, is that public access cannot be guaranteed when information about the land concerned is not readily available.

We do not even know the number of sites that are subject to conditional exemption. The Government's shuffling off of responsibility to the Countryside Commission and individual local authorities simply will not do, because the local authorities do not know, and the commission will not say, where the sites are. The public, who are the ultimate financiers of the relief, cannot find out where the land is.

Last year, I paid particular attention to the Minister's comments when he replied to a similar debate in the Standing Committee. He sought to reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood about information being available to the public. He said that such information was available

"if we care to ferret out the facts."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 27 February 1996; c. 555.]

It is not. In any case, the public should not have to ferret out information that should by right be theirs.

I appreciate that it would be wrong for the Inland Revenue to disclose information about the affairs of individual taxpayers. We do not ask how much relief is worth in individual cases, but we want to know where access has been promised in return for relief and we want that access to be guaranteed. As the Ramblers once memorably put it, the law is supposed to give the taxpayer some quo for its quids.

Mr. Jack: Has the hon. Gentleman studied Inland Revenue publication IR156?

Mr. Milburn: I have not had the opportunity to study that publication, but I am sure that in his response the Minister will acquaint the whole Committee with its contents. I am concerned to ensure that, if public subsidies are given to landowners to take land out of farming use and to attain the laudable environmental objectives of preserving the countryside, the people that that is supposed to benefit—the public—have a right to reasonable access.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: The hon. Gentleman is advancing a reasonable case, but he should consider the cost of granting that reasonable access to the countryside. I make this intervention because part of my constituency lies within the Peak park, which was referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton–Brown) in his 28-minute contribution. Will the hon. Gentleman make reference to the substantial cost that is often involved in granting what the hon. Member for Sherwood has rightly described as reasonable access to the countryside? I make particular reference to the cost of maintaining footpaths, as I have considerable knowledge of the Peak park and of the problems that growing access to the public cause to that rural environment.

Mr. Milburn: The hon. Gentleman makes an important and telling point. If rights and responsibilities apply on one side of the argument they must apply on the other. We should certainly not condone behaviour in the countryside that causes damage to areas of outstanding natural beauty or creates additional costs for those who are responsible for looking after them. I hope that the Minister will take note of the hon. Gentleman's point about my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood having a reasonable case.

8.15 pm

It is especially important that the right of public access should be guaranteed where it has been promised, because many of the lands covered by existing inheritance tax agreements lie in areas of outstanding natural beauty—the jewels in the crown of our countryside—but we do not even know where they are, so members of the public cannot properly enjoy them.

Conservative Members have been as concerned as Opposition Members about some of the issues that we have discussed this evening. The National Audit Office also expressed concern about the operation of the current inheritance tax regime, which the clause extends to lands under the habitat schemes.

An NAO report in 1992 said:

"The Department should give further attention to the nature and frequency of the procedures to monitor owners' compliance with undertakings given in return for conditional exemption from inheritance tax on land, buildings and particularly chattels. They should also review the extent to which assurances on retention, maintenance and rights of access remain heavily dependent on owners themselves."

It is five years since the office produced that report. I understand that a Public Accounts Committee report produced the following year made similar recommendations.

Perhaps the Minister can allude to the Government's response to the NAO report and to the subsequent PAC report. A consistent thread runs through the arguments of the NAO, the PAC and my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood. It is that simple maxim that if the public are to foot the bill through tax reliefs and tax subsidies to landowners, it must be conditional on the owners guaranteeing the public the simple right of access. That is an important principle, and I hope that the Minister will respond favourably to the amendment.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak briefly on the important amendment moved by the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping). The hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) gave the game away in terms of his philosophical approach when he talked about the public footing the bill for tax reliefs or tax allowances. It is worth reminding him that we are not talking about handouts from taxpayers, but about a change in the law that would allow certain individual taxpayers to keep more of their own money and not have their assets taxed by the state as much as they would otherwise have been.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend may be confusing two issues. One is the payment for the habitat scheme, to which I think that the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) was referring. The other is set out in the clause on exemptions from inheritance tax.

Mr. Lidington: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for putting me right. I am, indeed, referring to the inheritance tax reliefs in clause 92.

My concern about the amendment of the hon. Member for Sherwood derives partly from the conservation efforts being made in my constituency and in other parts of the Chiltern hills and partly from the list of enactments in clause 92(3). Clause 92(4) empowers the Treasury to

"by order made by statutory instrument amend the list of enactments in subsection (3) above."

I shall return later to the principle of enabling powers, and of giving a further such power to the Government.

First, I will deal with clause 92(3)(a) and (c). Paragraph (3)(a) refers to regulation 3(1) of the Habitat (Water Fringe) Regulations 1994.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Is my hon. Friend aware that there are six such designated areas under clause 92? The Committee may be interested to know that they are as follows: the York, Derwent and Rye system; the Ribble tributaries; the Shropshire meres, which are especially important for people who live in the Welsh Marches; the River Beult, which I gather is in Kent; the Flapton Ley, which I believe is in Devon; and the upper Avon, Wylye and Nadder valleys in Hampshire and Wiltshire.

Mr. Lidington: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Inland river systems sustain a great variety of wildlife, but they have come under increasing pressure in recent decades as a result of changes in farming techniques, improved drainage and the greater use of pesticides. It is important that we should do our utmost to conserve the flora and fauna that remain in those rich habitats.

By their nature, water fringes, especially when they are near large population centres, attract many people as sites for picnicking, camping and other recreational pursuits. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) has, like me, enjoyed a family walk along a country river or around a lake. His mention of the Shropshire meres reminded me of such an afternoon in the company of my wife—and a very pleasant outing it was.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: My hon. Friend mentioned meres, but what about canals? I refer in particular to the Cheshire ring and the Macclesfield canal. What about the flora and fauna there? Will he comment on that in adding to his excellent contribution?

Mr. Lidington: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the benefit of his customary detailed knowledge of the area that he represents.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury informed the Committee that regulation 3(1) of the Habitat (Water Fringe) Regulations 1994 does not apply to the canal systems in Cheshire mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton). However, statutory instruments, by their nature, can easily be extended and this one could be extended to cover more sites than were included in the original Department of the Environment list. It is certainly conceivable that the canals mentioned could come within the scope of subsection (3)(a) if the Government of the day decided to amend the provisions. My hon. Friend made an important point about canals, which sustain a variety of wild plants and animals. To his knowledge of the waterways of Cheshire, I add mine of the Aylesbury and Wendover arms of the Grand Union canal which both support wildlife and attract people who live and work in towns and want to get out and enjoy the countryside.

This debate forces us to examine carefully the inevitable tension between the interests of conservation and of the rights of public access to recreation in the countryside. Water fringes are vulnerable habitats, but that is even more true of the saltmarshes mentioned in clause 92(3)(c). I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury has been able to ascertain a list of those sites covered by the Habitat (Salt-Marsh) Regulations 1994.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): Mention of salt marshes makes me think of the coast of north Norfolk. I am not expert on this part of the Bill. Can my hon. Friend explain whether coastal saltmarshes would be affected by the regulations?

Mr. Lidington: The salt marshes of north Norfolk and the Wash would appear, at least in principle, to be eligible for inclusion in the Habitat (Salt-Marsh) Regulations 1994. If they are not among those sites which would be affected directly if the amendment were passed, they could be affected in the foreseeable future.

8.30 pm

Mr. Tipping: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that access to saltmarshes is already provided under one of the agri-environment schemes—the scheme on public access to environmentally sensitive areas? Does he agree that the balance between protecting the landscape and the environment and allowing public access is what is exercising the mind of the Committee?

Mr. Lidington: I wholly agree with the hon. Gentleman that the test for the Committee is to get the balance right. It is my contention that that is best achieved by examining the terms of schemes and making arrangements for access to sites rather than by incorporating the rather broad language of the amendment in the Finance Bill.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend asked me whether I had been able to obtain any information about the saltmarsh option. Unlike the water fringe option, which is for inland waterways—fresh water—at six designated sites, the aim of the saltmarsh option is to create and extend areas of saltmarsh on suitable land, consistent with the provision of effective and sustainable coastal defence. That might be helpful to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Lidington: Indeed. We have only to consider the pressure on saltmarshes, as on inland waterway systems, not only from agriculture but from development of various types, to see why we need to take great care to ensure that such sites are adequately protected. North Kent and the now aborted proposals to develop the Maplin area of the coast of Essex for an airport in the 1970s are just two examples of the pressure on saltmarshes around the coast of Britain. That is why the Committee should be careful before allowing public access in the way that the hon. Member for Sherwood wishes. I know that it is not his intention, but the amendment might unwittingly have the effect of allowing access to such an extent as to damage the habitat that attracted people there in the first instance.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: I am becoming genuinely interested in the point about public access. There is a distinction between public access and total exclusion of the public. Is there any halfway measure under which restricted access could be allowed, either now or in the future? I know that certain categories of people are allowed into certain special conservation areas. Is that relevant to the clause?

Mr. Lidington: My hon. Friend makes an important point. One of my quarrels with the term "reasonable access" in the amendment is that it does not seem to allow sufficiently for the dilemma that my hon. Friend has illustrated.

I return to the point that I made to the Committee earlier. If a public access agreement is drafted which is specific to a particular site, it will allow for access to be given to biologists and genuine researchers. It would allow the public to be barred from sites at particular times of the year, in the same way as public access to the Fleet lagoon in Dorset is strictly limited when the wading birds are likely to be nesting. Detailed site-specific arrangements could then be made. My fear is that the language adopted by the hon. Member for Sherwood would allow public access to continue and to grow, perhaps to the detriment of particular sites.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friends have raised an important point. Of course, the scheme is time-limited to 20 years, so any public access would be prescriptive rather than statutory. If it were prescriptive, would it be possible to limit public access to certain times of the year? To take my stone curlew nesting example, it is important to keep the public away during the nesting months of April and May. Does my hon. Friend think that that would be a good idea?

Mr. Lidington: That would be a good idea. Even within a public access agreement for an individual site, it would be desirable to allow a degree of discretion to the managers or those responsible for supervising conservation on a particular site. For example, if a particular habitat is used by migratory birds during their flight north or south in spring or autumn, it would surely be sensible to allow a measure of discretion to those responsible for conservation so that if migration was early or late in a particular year, they could bring forward or put back the period of public access in the interests of conservation. My hon. Friend's point strengthens my view that the language of the amendment is inappropriate.

I move from new section 124C(3)(a) and (c) to the subsection which, I confess, troubles me most. New section 124C(3)(b) refers to the Habitat (Former Set-Aside Land) Regulations 1994. As every member of the Committee will appreciate, set-aside land is found in every part of the country. No one knows for certain how the scheme is likely to develop. There have been significant changes during the past 12 months, as a consequence of the impact on the European beef market of the BSE crisis since March 1996. That brings me away from the coasts and back towards my constituency and neighbouring constituencies and to the Chiltern hills.

The Chilterns are a valuable habitat. They include much land which is classed as an area of outstanding natural beauty, and much which is green belt, but the Chilterns also often mark the dividing line between land which is given that class of protection and land which is available for normal development, subject to the usual planning process.

Counties such as Bedfordshire, Buckinghamshire and Berkshire, which are just beyond the rim of the London green belt, are peculiarly subject to development pressures. Anyone who has studied the Department of the Environment's recent Green Paper on household projections will know how the demand for housing and new premises for employment in those south-eastern counties is forecast to grow steadily—some might say dramatically—in the next 10 to 20 years. That growth will put still further pressure on agricultural land and woodland in my constituency and in other parts of the Chiltern hills.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: And in the Cotswolds.

Mr. Lidington: The Cotswolds and the Chilterns probably have a great deal in common so far as development pressures are concerned.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: My hon. Friend makes a good point, but does he accept that it is not merely areas to the north and west of Greater London, such as the Chilterns, his constituency and the Cotswolds, that suffer such pressures? Areas on the periphery of great cities such as Manchester also suffer. I refer to my constituency of Macclesfield in Cheshire, where the same pressures are being exerted and the same arguments are relevant to my hon. Friend's proposals, which he is making in an excellent contribution to the debate.

Mr. Lidington: I thank my hon. Friend. Having some good friends who live not in his constituency, I fear, but nearby, and having visited Wilmslow, Knutsford and Mobberley, I am certainly aware that development pressures in Cheshire as a consequence of people coming out from the Manchester conurbation are probably as acute as those affecting counties such as mine, which are adjacent to the London conurbation, although on a slightly smaller scale in view of the relative size of the two cities.

There is not only development pressure on the Chiltern hills and Buckinghamshire. Understandably, there is also a huge demand for public access and I have immense sympathy for that. I was brought up in north-west London and used to go for Sunday walks with the family along the Chess valley or the scarp of the Chiltern hills. None of us wishes to deny such walks to present or future generations, but we have to ensure that public access does not develop in such a way that it damages a precious environment. Public access has to be managed.

[Mr. Lidington]

In my part of the country, there are many opportunities for legitimate public access through long-distance paths such as the Ridgeway along the scarp of the Chiltern hills and the north Buckinghamshire and south Buckinghamshire footways, which Buckinghamshire county council has developed with great prescience and vision to balance public access, conservation and efficient farming in a way that I am sure that the hon. Member for Sherwood seeks to achieve as much as anyone else.

There have also been clashes, however. A number of farmers and landowners in Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire have been alarmed at some of the initiatives taken by the Ramblers Association and people such as the hon. Member for Sherwood who want a more general right to roam enshrined in law.

8.45 pm

Mr. Tipping: I think that the hon. Member for Aylesbury missed the beginning of my speech. I have never advocated an unrestricted right to roam. As I said earlier in this short—but extending—debate, my position is set out in the Access to the Countryside Bill, which tries to deal with the tensions that the hon. Member so rightly recognises.

Mr. Lidington: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point clear.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: This is becoming a very interesting debate. Before I became a Member of Parliament, I spent much time in the national park areas involved with the Duke of Edinburgh award scheme and so forth. To what extent do these issues differ in national park lands and in the areas that he is describing in Bedfordshire and Buckinghamshire? Does national park status make a difference and, if so, how?

Mr. Lidington: I am no expert on national park land. Some people have argued that the Chilterns or the Cotswolds might be given national park status. I would prefer to avoid that degree of what some people might describe as overmanagement and rely on finding a sensible and pragmatic balance between the differing interests of agriculture, forestry, public recreation and conservation in the way that I have sought to describe.

Two local issues have given me cause for great concern about clause 92(3)(b). The first is my knowledge of the efforts being made by the Berkshire, Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire Naturalists Trust to establish a network of nature reserves throughout the Chilterns to try to bring back some of the flora and fauna that have been lost as a result of poor stewardship during previous decades of this century. The people most closely concerned with those projects have told me that it is no good relying on a tiny network or series of oases of nature reserves, from which we exclude the public altogether and expecting that plants and animals will thrive in those isolated colonies. Instead, they argue, we need to link those oases through hedgerows and set-aside land which is responsibly managed in the interests of conservation. The creation of those links between nature reserves, in the traditional sense, could be put at risk by the amendment.

My second cause for concern locally derives from the ambitious project under way in the Chilterns—due in part to the great generosity of my constituent Mr. John Paul Getty—to reintroduce the red kite back into England. You will know, Sir Geoffrey, that the red kite is a bird of prey which, through persecution, had been confined to a small area of mid-Wales around Plynlimon, but which can now be seen by drivers along the M40, thanks to a sensible programme of conservation and management.

The hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), contributing from the Opposition Front Bench, referred to the fact that it was difficult to obtain details of every site listed under the various regulations described in clause 92(3).

Mr. Tipping: I hesitate to correct the hon. Gentleman. However, the sites that we said the public had difficulty in finding were not those to which he refers, but those which have conditional exemption from inheritance tax to allow greater public access. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman has been following the debate closely enough.

Mr. Lidington: My point is that in the interests of good conservation—this was certainly true in the case of the red kite—it is often important to keep the location of specific sites secret so as to ensure that rare species are allowed to breed and thrive without the attentions of bird egg collectors or poachers intervening in that process. I would not want circumstances to arise in which, in order to achieve the desirable objective of greater public access to and enjoyment of our countryside, we allowed intrusions that could severely damage efforts to introduce or restore species to habitats in this country and to ensure that they thrive there.

I said earlier that I wanted to return to the enabling powers that the clause would give to the Government. I simply note that in clause 92 the proposed section 124C(4) to the Inheritance Tax Act 1984 would enable the Treasury, by order, to "amend the list of enactments in subsection (3)".

It follows that if the Committee were to accept the amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Sherwood we would be putting into law a right of public access—or "reasonable access" in the terms of the amendment—not only in respect of those enactments already listed in proposed section 124C(3), but in respect of any future enactments added to the list by any future statutory instrument introduced at the behest of any future Government. It is a good principle that, whenever possible, we should try to avoid giving too many enabling powers and it is that principle which causes me to have further doubts about the amendment.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: The amendment moved very reasonably by the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping) seeks to make inheritance tax agricultural relief for land dedicated under long-term habitat schemes conditional on the public being allowed reasonable access to the land. Does my hon. Friend accept that protecting or improving the environment and creating public access to land are totally different objectives, albeit equally desirable ones? Is that not why there are different arrangements dealing with habitats and with public access to land? I have considerable sympathy with the argument advanced by the hon. Member for Sherwood, but are not the matters relating to habitats and public access that we are debating two very different issues? Will my hon. Friend deal with those two issues?

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. Before the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) deals with those points, I must say that that was a very long intervention.

Mr. Winterton: And a very relevant one.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. Relevant or not, interventions are supposed to be brief and to the point—and that one was neither.

Mr. Lidington: I am sure that my hon. Friend will try to catch your eye later in the Committee's proceedings, Sir Geoffrey, so that he can develop his important arguments.

I want to conclude by saying to the hon. Member for Sherwood that, although I understand and have some sympathy with the motives behind his amendment, he has chosen a blunt instrument with which to secure his objective: there are better ways of securing improved public access to our countryside.

Mr. Jack: This has been an interesting debate, which has shown that Conservative Members have a clear understanding of and a great deal of sensitivity towards the issues relating to the countryside and habitats.

I want to deal directly with the lines of argument advanced by the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping) when moving his amendment.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth (Coventry, North–East): Some time ago.

Mr. Jack: Indeed, it was some time ago. I might be wrong, but I believe that the hon. Member for Sherwood has stirred up the proverbial hornets' nest among Conservative Members.

First, I want to direct the hon. Gentleman's attention to an important piece of logic relating to his amendment. I would not normally accuse him of being an opportunist, but there is an element of opportunism in the phrasing of his amendment. He has, in his own way, asked for land covered by clause 92 to be subject to an extra requirement in respect of access. As I know from a former ministerial incarnation, the hon. Gentleman takes an interest in countryside and farming matters, so he will understand that we could not have had this debate had it not been for the fact that the Government responded to representations from concerned landowners, who wanted to advance land into various environmental schemes for the general benefit of the people and of the countryside environment, but who would hold back from so doing if we were to leave the law unchanged. Taking into account the inheritance tax factors affecting ordinary farmed land, it is an entirely praiseworthy and meritorious development that we are now moving towards encouraging more land not to be farmed but to be dealt with in an environmentally sensitive way. I therefore hope that the hon. Gentleman will give us some brownie points for our actions in that respect.

Although clause 92 is fairly narrowly drawn in the areas that have to be exempted from inheritance tax provisions, the debate has alerted us to a wider issue, with which the hon. Gentleman entertained the Committee. The narrow issue is the question whether there should be "reasonable" public access to the types of habitat scheme enunciated in proposed section 124C(3) to the Inheritance Tax Act 1984. What is distressing coming from someone who takes a genuine interest in countryside matters is the fact that the hon. Gentleman has not defined what he means by "reasonable".

In my former incarnation at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, I opened one of the first six habitat water fringe schemes. I recall tramping through a meadow adjacent to the Ribble and understanding precisely what was happening in that ecologically finely balanced area as a result of the scheme, which imposed a highly restrictive regime on the farmer concerned. If we had not had a clear definition of the word "reasonable", we might have had large numbers of people, having been alerted to that habitat scheme, tramping across the meadow land and taking away all the advantages of its entering the scheme in the first place. The Committee could not reasonably be asked to support the amendment without the word "reasonable" being more closely defined.

Sir James Molyneaux: In view of the consensus that has been achieved in the course of this good natured debate, could not the two Front Benches come to an agreement—enter into collusion, if necessary—reinforced by all the rest of us, to ensure that any future Treasury Bench, under whatever management, would underwrite landowners' interests? I am only a window box farmer, but such a measure would cover landowners against public liability claims, which have arisen in my constituency to the extent that one farmer was forced to sell his land because of an alleged injury sustained by a rambler walking across his land. As no insurance company will provide such cover, a future Chancellor of whatever party should undertake to do so, even if it means increasing income tax.

Mr. Jack: The right hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point, which may be relevant to the general issue of encouraging farmers to offer to put land into habitat schemes that require public access. Those points will no doubt have been noted by my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who is responsible for schemes such as the countryside stewardship scheme. I shall draw the right hon. Gentleman's remarks to his attention.

I have criticised the narrow point of the amendment and shall now trespass a little into other areas. First, however, I refer to the incisive speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton–Brown), who made cogent, coherent and knowledgeable representations about this matter before the Finance Bill was published and before the announcement on the issue on Budget day. He spoke on behalf of many concerned landowners in advocating that we follow that measure. I publicly record my appreciation for his lines of argument alerting us to the matter in the first place. In my hon. Friend's knowledgeable speech, he attested to many of the real issues that surround the whole question of reasonable—however one defines that—access to land in the type of habitat scheme that is the subject of the amendment.

[Mr. Jack]

The hon. Member for Sherwood went wider than the narrow terms of the clause and took us into two important realms, one of which was land that is already the subject of the inheritance tax exemption, but which may be in various forms of habitat scheme. The debate ranged over schemes such as the countryside stewardship scheme, the countryside access scheme, environmentally sensitive areas and the woodland grant scheme, to name but four of the major schemes. If I understood the hon. Gentleman correctly, in moving his amendment in that way, he sought to make the wider demand that, if that land was to continue to enjoy the inheritance tax exemption, as does all other farm land, because of its habitat nature that land, too, should have greater access. He cited the Ramblers Association audit of knowledge about the schemes.

I do not want to go into areas where I should not go, but it is worth reminding the hon. Gentleman to look carefully at publications on the countryside access scheme, which tell farmers who put their land into that area the ways in which they should make information more widely available. The hon. Gentleman and I have debated before the signposting of information in tourist centres and so on. The best service that I can render the hon. Gentleman and the Committee is to draw to the attention of my ministerial colleagues responsible for policing those schemes some of the deficiencies that have been attested to.

It was interesting to note the figures that the hon. Member for Sherwood gave. He said that a third of the land was difficult to find. He did not, however, say whether the people trying to find it were experts in map reading and using other aids to locate it. Nor did he entertain us with information on whether the other two thirds was found easily.

Mr. Tipping: I am conscious that the Financial Secretary had to miss part of the debate. Had he been present, he would have heard me say that at that time the countryside stewardship scheme was administered by the Countryside Commission, and that 20 per cent. of the grid references provided by the Countryside Commission were wrong.

Mr. Jack: Clearly, that is historic information, but it is important. The point that I am making is that, to join all those other schemes, landowners must fulfil various access requirements, yet under clause 92(3) some other forms of land are particularly sensitive and one would have to be certain about what "reasonable" meant in those contexts.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Jack: I should like to make a little progress, but I shall give way briefly to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Winterton: Does my hon. Friend agree with the point made by the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping), that all landowners must—I emphasise the word "must"—publicise public access arrangements that are agreed by the appropriate heritage agency working in conjunction with local authorities and other interested parties? Is that not vital to the Government's aims, and does it not work towards what the hon. Member for Sherwood is trying to achieve?

Mr. Jack: Yes, but I fear that three different issues concerning access have become muddled. My hon. Friend's remark is relevant and correct. In a moment, I shall deal briefly with the third issue, about which the hon. Member for Sherwood had something to say, relating to land that may be farmed.

In general, if farm land is admitted to environmental schemes, closely defined access requirements are already built into the schemes, so there is no need to embroider them.

I pay tribute to the perceptive and sympathetic remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington), who drew our attention to the terms of the salient part of clause 92, which is of direct relevance to our discussion.

The third issue to which the hon. Member for Sherwood drew our attention was those forms of asset—in this case, land—that were the subject of exemption from inheritance tax, in exchange for access, so to speak. I remember that last year the hon. Gentleman debated the subject at length, but I shall not attempt to paraphrase our comments. I undertook to make that information more widely available.

The hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) said in his pugnacious way that members of the public should not have to go ferreting around for that information. I can tell him that the ferrets can go back in the pocket and down the trouser leg: the public have no need to ferret about, because we have taken further action to make the information exceedingly widely available. That is why I asked the hon. Gentleman whether he had read Inland Revenue publication No. 156. I shall furnish him with a copy of that excellent new leaflet, which sets out the broad-brush approach for obtaining information about the land that is on the exempt register.

I have asked the Inland Revenue to write to all the local authorities that run a library service, giving information about the availability of the Inland Revenue leaflet and providing a poster to publicise our efforts to make more knowledge available about where the land is and how it can be accessed, while maintaining taxpayer confidentiality. We have put the entire register on the Internet, so there is now public as well as private provision for obtaining the information.

We have addressed all three of the areas of concern identified by the hon. Member for Sherwood. In the light of the information and assurances that I have given him, I hope that he will not press the amendment to a Division.

Mr. Tipping: The debate has been stimulating and enthusiastic. We have been taken down paths that perhaps we should not have trodden, we have been to faraway fields, and at times the debate almost became a picnic. We have tested your tolerance, Sir Geoffrey.

Across the Committee, there has been a recognition of the need for a balance between protecting the habitat and allowing public access. That is a great challenge. I have set out my position in the Access to the Countryside Bill, which is before the House. It deals with many of the points made in the Chamber—for example, the notion that access should be allowed only at certain times of the year, the notion of restriction orders, and the notion that access not only is a right, but entails responsibilities. I am particularly interested in the point raised by the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Sir J. Molyneaux) about owner liability. I am currently addressing that issue, with a view to including it in a subsequent version of the legislation.

The Minister called me an opportunist—he was very nice about it—and I confess to that charge. The amendment was intended to provoke debate and discussion. One or two hon. Members said that their interventions would be short, but if their walks are as long as their short interventions, I shall never accompany them.

I have taken the opportunity to raise issues such as public access to environmentally sensitive areas, countryside access schemes, the countryside stewardship scheme and conditional exemption from inheritance tax. I praised the Financial Secretary earlier in the debate for always listening and taking an interest in such matters. I believe that we shall continue to tread this path. I am conscious that changes have been made, but much more remains to be done.

The hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) referred to issues of cost, and he will recall that I identified sources of funding. For example, I mentioned the arable area payments scheme, in which the hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) is also interested. Landowners and farmers receive substantial sums from that source and the hon. Gentleman has advocated capping that expenditure.

There is general agreement within the Committee that we must balance the people's right to access the countryside against the need to enhance and protect the countryside and lift the landscape. It is a complicated area, and I am delighted that we have had such a stimulating debate. I am glad that the Minister has re-examined the matter, and I shall continue to press him on those issues. Progress has been made, so I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Milburn: I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 81, line 46, at end add—

'(7) This section shall only apply to land which has been acquired for bona fide reasons and shall not apply to land which has been acquired as part of a scheme or arrangement of which the main purpose, or one of the main purposes, is the obtaining of a tax advantage.'.

The amendment has one simple, but significant, purpose: to protect the taxpayer and the Inland Revenue from any possibility of abuse as a result of the proposal in clause 92 to extend inheritance tax relief to land in habitat schemes. The Opposition support the principle behind the habitat scheme: promoting nature conservation is clearly a laudable objective, particularly as it applies to sites of special environmental significance. We would like to see the common agricultural policy reformed in such a way that it focuses resources still further on those positive environmental objectives.

We are equally concerned about protecting family farms. Those family businesses provide a key focus for stability and continuity in rural communities—they are often the backbone of our countryside. It is clearly an important Government objective to try to avoid the break-up of working farms of that sort. The extension of agricultural property relief under the IHT rules in the 1992 Budget from 50 per cent. to 100 per cent. was presented as a means of doing just that. Nowadays, exemption from inheritance tax can be gained after only two years of owner occupation of a working farm. Two years ago, provision for 100 per cent. relief was also extended to tenanted farms. According to the Budget press release of 26 November 1996, the Government's—

Mr. Clifton-Brown: There is a slight inaccuracy in what the hon. Gentleman has just said. The exemption for tenanted farms was only that granted in the recent tenancy legislation for farm business tenancies, not for all tenanted farms.

9.15 pm

Mr. Milburn: That is right. It is 100 per cent. relief after seven years rather than two for owner-occupied farms.

According to the press release of 26 November, the Government's new intention, which is enshrined in clause 92, is to extend relief from inheritance tax to land managed under the terms of the habitat scheme. The release tells us that the Revenue has received legal advice that as the law stands such land would not qualify for such relief. Perhaps the Minister will explain how that situation arose. He alluded to representations that have been made by landowners. I hope that he will tell us how many representations were made. He might allude as well to the legal advice that he has received that has necessitated the clause that is before us.

I hope also that the Minister will indicate the costs of extending relief in the way that is set out in the clause. That is important for two reasons. First, those with land covered by the habitat scheme are already receiving a public benefit. Expenditure on the scheme is projected to rise to almost £2 million by the end of the decade. Extending the IHT relief to land in habitat schemes represents a double benefit at public expense so it is doubly important that the taxpayers' interests are properly protected from abuse.

Secondly, as there is now a substantial body of evidence to suggest that agriculture property relief is being systematically abused for tax avoidance purposes, our amendment aims to prevent such abuse so that the extension of APR is available only to those who have a genuine desire to farm and to protect the countryside. It would prevent the unscrupulous from hiding behind a laudable environmental objective purely for the purpose of erecting a convenient tax shelter.

Such abuse has become all too common. The Financial Times of 14 May 1994 contained an article entitled "Tax farming: an old crop is revived".

It outlined how tax avoidance under IHT rules could not be simpler for those who could afford it. It is an interesting article. It referred to the current market for land and the fact that there were only a few farms available for sale at that time, partly because of the influx of British and foreign buyers. It reads:

"British buyers now include the rich, eager to take advantage of the new inheritance tax rules. 'Sell a house in the English home counties', says Christopher Wilson of buying agent Wilson and Wilson, 'and put the proceeds into a farm with vacant possession. Work it for two years, perhaps by contracting out, and IHT will vanish.' His firm and accountants Grant Thornton have formed a 'city landowners service' to handle that sort of work."

[Mr. Milburn]

In other words, those who are wealthy enough can enjoy a 40 per cent. tax windfall simply by parking some cash in farmland for two years.

The article went on to suggest that the changes in IHT rules are distorting the market for farming land. There is some evidence to suggest that the very people who the IHT rules were designed to protect—small working family farmers—are losing out as wealthy buyers from home and abroad buy up land for tax avoidance purposes.

I do not regularly surf the Internet, but thankfully we on the Opposition Benches have one or two advisers who do, and they came across an interesting article—if that is the right word for it—just two days ago, from Strutt and Parker. It says:

"Since the beginning of 1996, Strutt and Parker have sold and purchased in excess of £100 million worth of farms and estates throughout the United Kingdom."

The article talks about the upturn in the market for land and farms. It goes on to say:

"However, 1996 saw the re-emergence of a substantial amount of non-farming money which purchasers were looking to invest in farmland. Many of these investors were tax driven, taking advantage of rollover relief and reinvestment relief. Others were looking to acquire agricultural property for Inheritance Tax purposes."

Indeed, the article says that, such are the distortions in the market, towards the end of 1992 there was a lack of farms available for sale.

The Sunday Times of 3 September 1995, commenting on the 1995 inheritance tax relief rules, quotes Mr. Adrian Baird, the Country Landowners Association chief tax adviser, as saying:

"we are worried that exploitation of the legislation for tax avoidance, particularly by outside people buying into land, will bring it into disrepute."

The article, which is entitled "Rich landowners to reap millions in tax changes" goes on to say that the paper has surveyed many of the country's biggest landowners and has looked at the way in which they plan to benefit from the new rules.

"Some,"—

it says

"are interested,"—

purely

"because it allows the perfectly legitimate avoidance of inheritance tax, others because it offers ways of giving tenant farmers shorter leases."

Indeed, the article quotes several examples. The Marquess of Normanby's 60,000-acre estate in Yorkshire is one such example. James Jackson, the Duke of Northumberland's agent, is quoted as saying that he was considering "one or two wheezes" relating to the new legislation on the Duke's 90,000-acre estate.

The reality is that it is possible to drive a coach and horses through the existing inheritance tax rules. Of course there should be proper protection for people who are genuinely in the business of farming, but the current loopholes in the inheritance tax rules make it all too often little more than a tax shelter for the very wealthiest, at the public's expense.

Inheritance tax, particularly agricultural property relief, is like manna from Heaven for the tax planning industry. I took the opportunity today to look at Tolly's Taxfinder, the Bible on these matters, and I came across the following passage on page 23 of the 1993-94 tax planning guide, volume I, which says that the remarkable new regime introduced by the Finance Act 1992

"is potentially there also for the benefit of others, since it provides the opportunity almost to 'buy' freedom from inheritance tax by purchasing an appropriate category of property and owning it for two years. It is even possible,"—

it says

"to do so through the purchase of a USM portfolio, which would require no participation in the business or the need to farm."

It is precisely such loopholes that make tax avoidance so easy, and which are now being extended in clause 92. Indeed, extending them without proper safeguards, as the Bill as drafted does, removes the inconvenience of even having to farm the land to make the gain. Instead, the land can just be sat on for two years before 100 per cent. inheritance tax relief comes into effect.

Mr. Home Robertson: It is worse than that, because not only can the land just be sat on to qualify for the tax breaks to which my hon. Friend referred but even more money can be paid in from the taxpayer by setting the land aside, and getting paid by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for doing nothing.

Mr. Milburn: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. He brings a certain knowledge to our debate—not knowledge of tax avoidance, of course, but knowledge of rural communities and the agriculture industry. Perhaps I have been too generous in regard to those matters.

Without our amendment, the possibility of abuse and tax avoidance will be extended. The amendment would empower the Inland Revenue to deny inheritance tax relief to those owning land in habitat schemes when it was clear that the purpose was tax avoidance. We want relief to focus on those with genuine environmental objectives, not on those who shelter behind them merely to gain a tax advantage. The public should not foot the bill for the wealthiest, who are using lax laws to reduce their liability.

At a time when ordinary families are paying more tax than they were at the last general election, the Government should stand up for the decent, hard-working majority of taxpayers. Those who are experiencing the biggest tax hike in peacetime history, following 22 separate tax rises, are entitled to demand a fair and efficient tax system; but the current inheritance tax rules ensure that the system is not fair and efficient. In many respects, inheritance tax has become a purely voluntary tax, and clause 92 would extend that spirit of voluntarism to land covered by habitat schemes.

The loopholes in the inheritance tax system mean that many of the wealthiest members of society get off scot free, or at least mostly tax free. The latest figures for 1993-94 from the Inland Revenue's 1996 statistics—a riveting read, as the Government Whip will no doubt appreciate—show that there were only 1,478 cases of inheritance tax being paid on agricultural property, out of a total of 17,363 paying any form of inheritance tax. That represents just 6 per cent. of the total number of estates notified for probate.

The Government's argument seems to be that, as the inheritance tax system that they created is so riddled with anomalies and loopholes, the answer is not to reform it but to extend it on the way to abolishing it. It is less a case of "If it's broke, fix it" than a case of "If it's broke, axe it"—and, as I have said, the beneficiaries of such an approach would be the wealthiest members of society. If the Prime Minister's objective—abolition of inheritance tax—were fulfilled, the wealthiest people would reap the biggest rewards. At the very top, each of the 201 families inheriting estates valued at more than £2 million would gain nearly £1 million. Such a tax cut would hand out millions to people who are already multi-millionaires.

I do not believe that abolishing inheritance tax, or extending it in the way suggested in clause 92, will do anything to create an enterprise economy in which merit is the crucial determinant of success. If the Conservatives got away with their objective, it would merely make the wealthy even wealthier. If there is room for tax cuts in the future, they should be used to help the hard-working majority. Opposition Members want to reform the inheritance tax system rather than abolish it, and the amendment is a step in that direction.

It is of course right that the inheritance tax system does not penalise people on middle incomes, whose property values may rise over time, which is why raising inheritance tax thresholds—

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): The hon. Gentleman appears to be drifting into a general discussion on inheritance tax. The amendment—as he knows, because he moved it—deals specifically with inheritance tax and habitat schemes.

Mr. Milburn: I was about to mention two matters. First, raising inheritance tax thresholds may be a desirable reform. Secondly, however, the system must be safeguarded against abuse if it is to have integrity and command public confidence. Amendment No. 7 intends to achieve precisely that objective, which is why it is so important.

We want family businesses and farms to be protected. Opposition Members want to prevent the breaking up of bona fide businesses and farms and the tax system to work fairly and efficiently. The extension of inheritance tax proposed under clause 92 should not be made unless taxpayers' interests are properly safeguarded. Our amendment would accomplish that goal. It would prevent tax avoidance but offer help to genuine farmers and to those interested in preserving the very best of the British countryside.

I find it hard to believe that an argument can be made against such a motive or that a convincing argument can be made against our amendment. In his speech, no doubt the Minister will prove me wrong. In the meantime, however, I commend our amendment to the Committee.

9.30 pm

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury kindly mentioned that I made representations to him on clause 92's exemption for habitat schemes. That tribute should have gone to my constituent, Mr. Michael Fitzgerald, because he brought the matter to my attention. Thereafter I brought the matter to the attention of my right hon. Friend.

I think that it would be helpful if I explained to the House the origin of clause 92 and the need for amendment No. 7. I am indebted to the Country Landowners Association, of which I am a member, for providing the technical note which I shall use. It is important to understand how the issue arose, and the note at least partially answers the questions asked by the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) about why it was necessary to include clause 92 in the Bill.

Under section 117 of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984, as amended, agricultural property can qualify for inheritance tax agricultural property relief only if the property is "occupied for the purposes of agriculture"

during the required period. As the hon. Member for Darlington made clear, in the case of owner occupation the required period is two years immediately prior to any transfer of the property, and in the case of occupation by someone other than the owner, the required period is seven years immediately prior to any transfer.

When set-aside schemes were first introduced, owners who elected the fallow option were considered to remain in occupation of their land for purposes of agriculture because the scheme required the landowner to maintain the property in a fit state for agricultural production. The Revenue's view was that, although minimum maintenance was required under the scheme, the requirement provided sufficient indication of intent, as suggested by the word "purposes".

The 20-year habitat scheme, the inheritance tax exemption and amendment No. 7—all of which the Committee has spent so much time discussing today—push so far forward any prospect of future agricultural use that the requirement to maintain the land in a fit state for future agricultural use would not make sense. Thus, there is no hook on which the Revenue can justifiably hang a proper belief that such land remains in agricultural application.

When I brought the matter to the attention of my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, he took legal advice from the Revenue—perhaps also from elsewhere—and its view was precisely the one which I have paraphrased. However, he considered—I am grateful to him for this—that a charge to inheritance tax under the habitat schemes would deter people wishing to enter those schemes. Indeed, my constituent, Mr. Fitzgerald, who entered 212 hectares in the scheme, would not have done so had it not been for clause 92. I am therefore grateful that my hon. Friend has seen fit to remedy the situation in that way.

The amendment exemplifies some of the worst fears of farmers and landowners. The hon. Member for Darlington made it clear that should the Opposition get anywhere near power, they will not only introduce changes such as that which they have proposed this evening but will seek to extend the scope of inheritance tax. One of the easiest ways to extend its scope would be to abolish what are known as potentially exempt transfers.

Anyone who keeps an asset for more than seven years is exempt from inheritance tax, but I believe that one of the first things that the Opposition would do is abolish that relief. We should then have a potential wealth tax in the making—who knows, perhaps the Opposition are proposing a wealth tax. The Opposition have ruled out some personal taxation options but that means that others will have to be considered. This particular exemption relating to habitat schemes—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows when he is guilty of straying out of order.

Mr. Clifton–Brown: To return to the amendment, I must say that it strikes one as a little spiteful. We are trying to improve the environment. If someone has the foresight to buy a piece of land, and probably pays a great deal of money for it, he is by nature altruistic and wants to improve the general habitat. Does it really matter if, at some stage in the future, he might get away without paying a little bit of tax? The amendment is simply jealousy of the highest order and shows that the Opposition are still unreconstructed when it comes to tax. Jealousy is still their motive.

The proposed new provision contained in clause 92, which would give exemption from inheritance tax, is a preliminary to our abolishing inheritance tax. The Opposition spokesman made it clear that his philosophy is to extend it. Tonight's debate could not reveal more sharply the philosophical difference between us when it comes to raising taxation: the Opposition want to increase taxes in rural areas and destroy rural employment. Anyone thinking about voting for the Opposition at the next election should consider that point very carefully.

Mr. Jon Trickett (Hemsworth): Having listened carefully to my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), I have to say that I detected none of the implications referred to by the hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton–Brown). I did, however, note that the point of the hon. Gentleman's speech was precisely what the amendment is intended to prevent—the possibility that a further loophole may be opened in the inheritance tax legislation and rules.

In considering the matter, we are entitled to examine the broader context in which clause 92 is being proposed. Part of that context is formed by clause 91, which raises the threshold for the payment of inheritance tax from £200,000 to £215,000. That is £10,000 more than is necessary for the usual indexation, and it will cost £16 million a year in lost revenue to the Exchequer. Adding that to the previous year's huge increase, the threshold for inheritance tax has risen by 40 per cent. in two years, from £154,000 to the proposed figure of £215,000. Inflation is running at about 2.5 per cent. That threshold increase vastly outstrips the retail prices index and house price inflation.

Conservative Members have declared an ideological opposition to inheritance tax. This further loophole may be designed to ensure that the tax is eventually abolished. The implications of abolition are substantial. The likely cost would be £1.6 billion—the equivalent of 1p on the standard rate of income tax.

Given the Government's record and their ideological commitment to the removal of inheritance tax, we are entitled to be suspicious that they may be opening a further loophole in the tax through which millionaires and others could crawl, as happened with the 1992 decision to relieve agricultural properties from inheritance tax. A small industry has developed, advising estates on how to take advantage of that provision. The industry could also feed on clause 92. According to the 1996 Inland Revenue statistics, a large number of the country's wealthiest estates have already found loopholes to avoid inheritance tax.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman must relate his remarks to amendment No. 7.

Mr. Trickett: Thank you for that advice, Mr. Morris. I shall endeavour to take it.

It is clear that a large industry of tax advisers, lawyers and others has developed around the specific function of advising estates on how best to exploit any loopholes that emerge. Our amendment was drafted to offer the Government assistance—they are obviously in need of it—in avoiding the possibility of the clause becoming an additional loophole.

Even without clause 91, there has been a decline in the inheritance tax base, as the Inland Revenue figures show. There has been a 2.5 per cent. reduction in the past two years in the number of estates paying inheritance tax. We need to ensure that a potential new loophole is not opened. The amendment would help to do that.

Mr. Clifton–Brown: Do the hon. Gentleman or any of his hon. Friends have any idea why reliefs were given to agricultural properties? It was because agriculture is a long-term business with relatively low long-term returns.

Mr. Trickett: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. That may have been the intention, but, as civil servants in ministerial offices who draft legislation often do not realise, there is a wise world out there, full of people who do nothing but try to find ways of exploiting loopholes. The Sunday Times said that the Marquis of Bath, whose wealth is estimated at £40 million, was investigating the loophole. Our amendment is drafted to secure the objectives that the Government claim to want to achieve. We feel that there is a danger in the drafting of the clause that a further loophole might emerge.

I thank you for your tolerance, Mr. Morris. I suppose that I have stretched the point slightly, but I have attempted to address the issues behind the amendment and the logic of our proposals.

9.45 pm

Mr. Jack: This has been an interesting debate. Before I deal with the substance of hon. Members' remarks, I hope that, with your indulgence, Mr. Morris, I can deal with the detail of the points relating to clause 92 and something that I said in previous exchanges.

I did not in any way want knowingly to mislead the hon. Member for Sherwood when I said to him that we have made the register more widely available. I should be absolutely clear: the path that is more widely available in the ways that I described—through libraries and the Internet—relates to works of art. Particular provisions relate to the requirements that those who qualify for exemption for land should, with the help of heritage advisory agencies working with local authorities, draw up a list of such information. In following up the points, I satisfied myself—indeed, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) probed me by means of parliamentary questions on how we audit the fact that such matters are properly adhered to—about that information, but in the light of the further comments of the hon. Member for Sherwood, I shall obviously look again at the matter.

Mr. Tipping: I am very grateful for the Minister's comments. If works of art can go on the Internet and not breach taxpayer confidentiality, I find it difficult to understand why the issue of land cannot be considered again.

Mr. Jack: I am sure that local authorities, for example, that keep lists of land that is available for public access will have taken careful note of what the hon. Gentleman has said. He will understand that those items of land are included in more general lists of land where access is available precisely for the reasons of taxpayer confidentiality. I am grateful for his comments.

I turn specifically to the content of the amendment. With his considerable knowledge—not only from his direct farming interests—of land law and surveying, my hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) made the farming background to the measure very clear. He went to the heart of why we are debating the item. Indeed, the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) asked me specifically where the representations came from, from whom we had heard, and so on, and made a number of points about legal advice.

This is one of the rare occasions on which all Members of Parliament say to people, "Why don't you write in and we will have a look at the matter." This is one of the genuine occasions when a concerned citizen did just that through the good services of his Member of Parliament. As my hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury said, the matter was taken up by the Country Landowners Association, and we also received representations from the National Farmers Union. To a certain extent, the matter snowballed, but one could not say that there was a mass lobby of the Treasury on the point.

Once we had taken legal advice on whether the concerns of those who made representations were real or imaginary, I understood very clearly the importance of ensuring, especially with regard to the narrow range of schemes so affected, that there were not unnecessary barriers to land entering an environmental scheme. Our previous exchanges identified fairly adequately the narrow range of habitat schemes that potentially would have caused somebody an inheritance tax liability—as clause 92 does—as opposed to other environmental schemes which would not. It was right to make the move.

The reason why the Government said that the proposal's costs were negligible is that under the scheme the land has to come from within the curtilage of an existing farm. The short answer is that if the land had not gone into one of the tightly defined environmental schemes, it would have continued to have been farmed land. If the land had been on an owned farm or on one farmed under the Agricultural Tenancies Act 1995, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury referred, by definition it would have automatically qualified for inheritance tax relief, subject to the conditions to which my hon. Friend accurately attested. By definition, costs cannot therefore be anything other than negligible.

In terms of this tightly defined scheme, we are talking about relatively small parcels of land. I stated earlier that I had been to see one habitat scheme alongside the River Ribble, and it involved a margin of land alongside a tributary of the river. We are not talking about broad acres, but narrow areas. Other forms of environmental scheme are more extensive in terms of acreage—for example, the environmentally sensitive areas scheme covers something like 10 per cent. of farm land in this country. The narrow scheme that we are discussing does not fall into the same category.

As we have been invited to consider seriously the amendment, we must look at exactly what it says. At its heart there is a motive test. The hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) had clearly done a certain amount of homework, but he did not tell us what kind of motive test he envisaged. If the amendment were passed, it would create considerable uncertainty among those who may have to act upon it. The amendment is flawed in that respect.

The scheme cannot be deemed to be a vast handout to rich people. I doubt very much that anyone would follow the circuitous route referred to by Opposition Members during their remarks on the amendment. If one followed the logic of the hon. Member for Darlington, one would go out to buy a farm to put a piece of land into a narrow group of environmental schemes to get the inheritance tax relief that one could otherwise have received even if one had not put the land into such a scheme. He went down an extremely tortuous route to try to make his wider point—that inheritance tax relief on agricultural land is, in some way, a vast tax dodge.

The constituency of the hon. Member for Darlington is surrounded by some of the best farming land in north Yorkshire, and he will know that the countryside can remain almost unchanged for decades and centuries, as families with a long-term interest in the area farm the land. If he ventures out from the urban citadel that is Darlington, he will meet some of the farmers whose families have farmed the land for up to three generations. These are precisely the people to whom the hon. Gentleman referred in his opening remarks, when he said that we must maintain the fabric of the community, and particularly family farms. These are the people who, by and large, form the farming communities in this country.

The hon. Member for Darlington also asked what would happen if someone bought a farm to get the advantages of clause 92, but then simply "sat on the land" and allowed it to rot. He asked whether such a person would still qualify, and that is a serious point. This is where the two-year rule to which he referred is used. In judging whether the farm is a working farm, the Inland Revenue will look at the farm's accounts to see if proper business has been carried out. If it turns out that the farmer has simply sat on his backside and done nothing, the accounts would quickly start to show that it was not a properly farmed piece of land, and it would not—by definition—qualify for the types of relief about which we have been talking.

I must remind the hon. Member for Darlington that the two-year test in terms of owner-occupation—introduced to establish whether the land acquisition was merely a passing fancy or a genuine attempt at farming—was a definition borrowed from the capital transfer tax regime that a previous Labour Administration introduced. We merely carried forward the test into our legislation, and I hope that he will agree that there is some sense in that. I hope also that he will accept our assurances about the way in which the Inland Revenue checks to make certain that the land is being properly farmed. If it is being properly farmed, the hon. Gentleman—from his earlier comments—can have no objection to the inheritance tax provision being applied. That is another reason why the amendment is entirely unnecessary.

The hon. Gentleman gave the Committee the impression, perhaps inadvertently, that all farm land was owned by some vast group of rich people using it simply as a means of tax avoidance—no, I do him a disservice, because he mentioned family farms, and I must not mislead the Committee about that, although he did give that impression in his later remarks. He may be interested to know that the majority—more than 70 per cent.—of estates in receipt of relief are worth less than £500,000, and 90 per cent. less than £1 million. Considering that agricultural land prices might be £2,000 to £3,000 per acre, we are hardly talking about especially large farms.

We are talking about precisely the group of farmers that the hon. Gentleman said should receive assistance, to avoid having the family farm broken up through the inheritance tax mechanism. I could not stand here and say that some people may not in the past have bought a farm with tax in the back of their mind, but the evidence that I put before the Committee this evening showed that proper working farmers gain the advantage of the provision.

On habitat land, we are not talking about fly-by-night merchants. The habitat schemes require management undertakings for up to 20 years and if people did not do what they were supposed to—if they were to withdraw from a scheme before its end, for example—they would face penalties. The schemes are properly organised, managed and run.

There has been a consensus across the Committee this evening that we want such environmental provision for land; if there was a barrier through inheritance tax, we have removed it in the clause. The amendment is therefore not necessary and I invite the Committee to reject it if it is pressed to a vote.

Mr. Milburn: This has been an illuminating debate. I am especially grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Trickett) for his perspicacious probing of the Government's intentions on inheritance tax.

I remind the Committee of the intention behind the amendment: to stop abuse of the tax system. It is designed specifically to prevent the buying up of farm land—in this case, land set aside for conservation purposes—as a cover for tax avoidance. It would empower the courts to test whether the buying up of farm land designated under a habitat scheme was for genuine purposes or for tax avoidance.

The amendment has three aims: to protect genuine farms, and especially small family-run farms, from being broken up; to encourage more farmers actively to engage in efforts to preserve the best of the countryside; and to root out deliberate tax avoidance. We have heard how the current inheritance tax rules, which are being extended in the clause, are wide open to such abuse. The system effectively allows the very wealthiest to make a tax killing simply by parking cash for two years in farm land. That does nothing to encourage family farms and everything to encourage tax avoidance.

I would have thought that a responsible Government would want to take a tough stance on tax avoidance. After all, in the Budget the Government declared war on tax loopholes. I am afraid that once more dogma is standing in the way of reason. The Minister has refused to give the Committee an assurance that tax avoidance will be clamped down on; instead, he has stood up once again for the vested interests of those who can make huge tax gains at the public's expense, simply because of their huge wealth. He has stood up for the few against the many; for unfairness against fairness; and for irresponsibility in tax matters against responsibility. For that reason, the Minister's approach leaves us with no alternative but to test the opinion of the Committee.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Family Mediation Scotland

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

10.17 pm

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the important subject of Family Mediation Scotland. I know that my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State recognises the importance of the topic, as do Scottish Members of Parliament on both sides of the House, including my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) and the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) who, I recall, asked me a question on this very topic on 30 March 1994. I see the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Chisholm) on the Opposition Front Bench. The hon. Member for Monklands, East (Mrs. Liddell) was courteous enough to apologise to me for being unable to attend because of a particular commitment; I know that she, too, is interested in the subject.

My right hon. and learned Friend's commitment to Family Mediation Scotland was demonstrated this morning, when he met me at short notice. He has given an extremely positive and speedy response to the representations made to him in respect of grants for Family Mediation Scotland under section 10 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968, and he will no doubt want to bring the House up to date tonight.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who has always been kind in this context, for giving way. I understand that only six of the 10 services will receive funding. Has the hon. Gentleman any indication of that? We all want the family mediation service to be fully funded at all levels and in each region of Scotland.

Mr. Stewart: I understand that all the applications have been granted, but I would rather leave the details to my right hon. and learned Friend when he replies to the debate.

Misunderstandings sometimes arise about what mediation is. It should not be confused with arbitration or marriage counselling. It is a voluntary process in which a trained, skilled mediator enables people to negotiate their own mutually acceptable resolutions to issues arising from separation or divorce, especially concerning the continued parenting of children. The advantages of mediation are clear. Although it must be recognised that it will not always be successful, at the other end of the spectrum it can sometimes save marriages. The major advantages of mediation are that it takes place at an early stage and that the children's interests are a priority of the process.

Everyone recognises the desirability of resolving problems, if possible, before they reach the courts. That is in the best interests of parents, children and the legal system.

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): Will my hon. Friend accept, in response to the point raised by the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing), that all who applied have received grants?

Mr. Stewart: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for confirming my understanding of the situation. He is to be congratulated on his response to the representations made to him.

How sad it is to hear a husband or wife say in court, "It should never have come to this." That is recognised in legislation, and the availability of accessible family mediation services is essential to the implementation of part I of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, which my right hon. and learned Friend so ably piloted through the House. Part I of the Act, which was implemented on 1 November 1996, aims to create a new climate within which children experience parental separation and divorce. It is based on the following principles: first, that parental responsibility and rights in relation to children will not be affected by parental divorce; secondly, that co-operative parenting should be the basis of the relationship with children after divorce; thirdly, that parents should seek to take a non-adversarial approach to parental separation and divorce; and, fourthly, that court is not the appropriate place to resolve disputes in relation to children.

Family mediation services provide not only opportunities for parents to resolve disputes but potential on-going support for parents in the co-operative parenting which the Act presumes. The Act also imposes specific obligations on the courts to give children an opportunity to express their views and to have them regarded by the court. As from 1 November last, the courts are obliged to make that further inquiry, which may involve sending an appointed person to seek the child's views. Litigation could become more lengthy and costly, but that could be avoided through mediation. It is crucial that services are readily available to ensure that the spirit of the 1995 Act is implemented.

The Scottish Office is to be congratulated on its early, consistent and sustained support for Family Mediation Scotland through section 10 of the 1968 Act. Funding is available from a variety of other sources—trusts, fees, local authorities and fund-raising by organisations. My right hon. and learned Friend confirmed in his response that applications for continued section 10 funding from Borders, Tayside, Western Isles and Central Scotland have been granted, together with applications for new services in Dumfries and Galloway and in Grampian.

There has been a growth in all-issues mediation—mediation as one process covering issues related to the children, property and financial issues. There are two possible sources of mediation in Scotland, including all-issues mediation: the services provided by the family mediation service, which is the subject of this Adjournment debate, and the services supplied by solicitor-mediators—people who are solicitors and trained mediators.

The Scottish Legal Aid Board launched a pilot project in 1995 to pay out to solicitors as an outlay to a solicitor holding a legal aid certificate or as a payment under the legal advice and assistance scheme. I recognise that the pilot project will need to be evaluated. My right hon. and learned Friend will not be able to give such an evaluation this evening, but I hope that he will accept that the present legislative position seems to create a problem in Scotland, as against that south of the border. Under present legislation, the Scottish Legal Aid Board cannot make a block grant to the family mediation service without primary legislation. I am glad to see the hon. Member for Moray nodding in agreement. I understand that, in England, such a grant can be made under the Family Law Act 1996.

[Mr. Stewart]

With regard to the pilot project, there is a question about whether it is right to go down the solicitor-mediator route. The training of solicitors is adversarial: that is their role. I do not criticise them for that, but mediation is an entirely different process.

A further question concerns the public expenditure implications of the other methods of financing mediation services. I make no criticism of the hourly rate paid to Scottish solicitors, which I believe to be of the order of £80 an hour under the legal aid arrangements. That is about 10 times the sum that mediators are paid by the family mediation service. Legal aid is demand led, and my right hon. and learned Friend will know the problems that demand-led programmes can create. My right hon. and learned Friend will not be able to provide answers tonight to questions about the pilot project because the evaluation has not been completed, but I hope that he agrees that those questions must be considered seriously. I hope that he will agree also to examine the legislative difference between Scotland and England and Wales, as it is clearly creating problems.

My right hon. and learned Friend's commitment to mediation is extremely well documented and well known. During debate on the recent Children (Scotland) Act 1995, he emphasised that we must put the interests of the child first in this process. I look forward to hearing him respond to the debate tonight. I am happy to give the Floor to my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie), who wishes to make a brief comment.

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): My hon. Friend will have noticed in the Scottish press comments by the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) about my right hon. and learned Friend and his ability to listen and take the message on board. It seems that my hon. Friend has certainly been listened to, and he must be delighted by the way in which the message has been taken on board in this instance.

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) most warmly on bringing this matter before the House. The presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) and of the hon. Members for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Chisholm) and for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) in the Chamber tonight demonstrates the importance of the subject. In responding to my hon. Friend's speech, I shall try to present our thoughts about the future of family mediation services in Scotland. I will also deal with the future of the organisation, Family Mediation Scotland, which I visited recently.

My hon. Friend has recalled the origins and development of family mediation in Scotland from the time of the establishment of the first service in Lothian in the early 1980s to the service that is now available in almost every part of Scotland. That is truly a remarkable achievement in a relatively short period. Those who pioneered the service in its early days must be proud—and justifiably so—of that achievement. Those who continue to provide and develop family mediation in Scotland must share that feeling of pride. It has not always been easy for them and they have come through some difficult times, but the sustained growth of a family mediation service in Scotland is a tribute to their determination and perseverance.

I am pleased that the Scottish Office was able to play a part in the service's development from the very beginning of family mediation in Scotland. We funded the Lothian service from the outset in the early 1980s when it was an innovative pilot project. That project demonstrated the value of mediation, and services began to be established in other parts of Scotland. By the mid-1980s, the headquarters body—Family Mediation Scotland, or the Scottish Advisory and Family Conciliation Service as it was then known—had been set up. Again, I am pleased to say that we have also assisted the headquarters body with central Government grants totalling just under £600,000 over 10 years.

During the past three years, we have provided support for several local services. We currently support five such services. When combined with the grant paid to the headquarters body, we are currently making available just under £220,000 for family mediation in Scotland. I say "currently" because, as I announced earlier today, from next year we intend to extend our support by some £50,000 in order to introduce a further two local services—Family Mediation Grampian and Family Mediation Dumfries and Galloway. In addition, we shall be able to renew the grants for four services beyond the end of their current funding period. I am sure that that will come as welcome news for those services, as it will for all those in Scotland who are concerned with mediation services.

Mrs. Ewing: I am delighted to hear that there will be an extension of the service to Grampian. The Minister and I have been in correspondence about the extension over several years. Can he say how many qualified and trained mediators will emerge from the new project? It is not merely a matter of talking to somebody; we need people with qualifications. Will the Minister comment on that?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I shall be happy to make inquiries and to write to the hon. Lady with the precise detailed facts that she requires.

As a Government, we believe in marriage and the family as the proper foundation for a civilised and responsible community. For this reason, we propose to offer additional support totalling £50,000 to marriage guidance in Scotland. We believe that this will help to save marriages that still have hope of reconciliation. We shall shortly be advising the individual organisations about this.

Sadly, a proportion of marriages nevertheless break down. Marital breakdown is a cause of distress, and it is exacerbated when there are children of the marriage. Our policies have generally been designed to ensure fairness to both parties when a marriage breaks down. This underlies the Family Law (Scotland) Act 1985. We have also promoted the need to consider the welfare of the marriage, and this principle is given legal status in part I of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. It is generally accepted that where a marital breakdown is acrimonious, this is more damaging for the children. We therefore want to minimise the opportunities created by the law for acrimony between the parties.

In the 1985 Act we provided that the matrimonial property should be shared fairly between the parties to a divorce. The Act provides that fairness demands equal shares, but the court has a wide discretion to make orders meeting the actual needs of the parties. One of the factors to be taken into account is the burden of caring for children, which may fall more upon one party than upon the other. In the Child Support Act 1991 we removed the issue of child maintenance from the divorce courts. This was another means of reducing the scope of litigiousness between the parties.

In part I of the Children (Scotland) Act we have created a clear framework for the welfare of the children of a marriage to be the paramount consideration for the court in making orders concerning children. The Act sets out in sections 1 and 2 the responsibilities and rights of a couple as parents. Those responsibilities and rights should normally survive separation and divorce. Each parent is given an active responsibility to promote the child's continued relationship with the other parent. Ideally—this is a most important message—the parties should agree arrangements between themselves for the continued discharge of parental responsibilities and rights.

Part I of the Children (Scotland) Act embodies the concept of minimum intervention by the court. Only if it appears to be in the interests of the welfare of the child should the court intervene. This reinforces the fact that the burden of making appropriate arrangements for the children now lies with their parents. The parents should explore all avenues and agree as much as possible between themselves before approaching the court. There may even be no need for the court to be involved, other than to grant the decree of divorce.

Most importantly, if it proves necessary for the court to be involved, part I now requires the court to take into account the views of the child—if the child has sufficient understanding and maturity to express these and wishes to do so. There is a presumption that a child over 12 has sufficient maturity. It is no longer possible for the parents and the court to develop proposals for the child without the child being given the opportunity to be consulted, except in the case of very young children and those who cannot understand what is going on. Similarly, before reaching any major decisions which would affect their children, parents are required under section 6 to take into account the views of their children.

It is against that background that we reaffirmed the important place of family mediation services in various remarks in this House and in the other place. We fully accepted that such mediation services have an important part to play in making certain that couples discuss any difficulties that they have concerning the future of their children. That reduces the scope for acrimonious litigation and the consequent harm that that can cause the children caught up in separation or divorce.

For some years now, rules of court have enabled the court to refer parties to mediation at any stage during the process where questions arose about children in a family action. That rule has been re-emphasised with the commencement of part I of the Act by enabling the court to arrange a hearing at a very early stage of a case, to take out of contention the issues between couples involving children and thus to maximise the possibility of early resolution of such matters. We will monitor the effectiveness of court referrals to mediation as part of our general evaluation of the Children (Scotland) Act reforms. This may be an appropriate time to point out that neither the primary legislation nor the rules of court prescribe which organisation is to provide the mediation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood drew attention to the fact that Family Mediation Scotland is the major player in family mediation in Scotland, and that through its affiliated services it has a very important part to play in our programme of reform. There is another source of mediation through solicitors who are members of Comprehensive Accredited Lawyer Mediators, otherwise known as CALM. They may provide mediation if either party is referred by their solicitor or the court.

We are currently funding a research programme to study the effect of participation in mediation, whether provided by Family Mediation Scotland affiliates or by accredited lawyer mediators. That research is proceeding well and we believe that it will be successful in providing qualitative evaluation. It will also look for evidence that mediation is more cost-effective than traditional dispute resolution through the legal process in Scotland.

The qualitative arguments for mediation are, to my mind, every bit as important as any financial arguments. It appears intuitively likely that a mediated agreement between couples about such issues as care of children after separation or divorce is likely to be a better quality agreement and to be more durable. We shall look for evidence of that from the research that is in hand.

Mrs. Ewing: I am very interested in what the Minister is saying about the assessment that will be made. Will it include an assessment of the implications for aid and assistance? As constituency Members, most of us find that legal aid is often one of the major problems, from whichever direction it comes. Will an assessment be made of that?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: On the subject of legal aid, as the hon. Lady and my hon. Friend know, in the White Paper on crime and punishment we have undertaken to consult on civil legal aid. Proposals for the future funding of family mediation is one of the issues that could be covered in that consultation. I hope that that will be of assistance.

One challenge that I would like to offer to Family Mediation Scotland in its future development concerns the matter that I mentioned earlier of considering the views of children. If it is to play its full part in these reforms, it will need to develop ways of ensuring that parents accept their responsibility to take the views of children into account in reaching mediated agreements.

I have already announced extensions to the funding of Family Mediation Scotland affiliated services from social-work-related grants, but I am all too well aware of the arguments that that is not a satisfactory long-term basis for funding these services. We have had extensive discussions with Family Mediation Scotland about the suitability of seeking to fund its services by charging the parties. That would unlock the possibility of its being funded as a legal aid outlay where the reference is made by the court or by a solicitor acting for a legally aided party.

While Family Mediation Scotland has seen some scope to introduce charging for its services, I understand that it does not regard this as a way of securing the future of the local services. It stresses that mediation is most effective introduced early in the process of divorce and separation, when it is unlikely that the parties will have approached a lawyer. We have noted those points.

We have also noted the support that Family Mediation Scotland has given to the approach south of the border, where the availability of mediation will be explained to parties seeking a divorce when they attend the compulsory information session at the beginning of the process. The Lord Chancellor intends mediation to be funded through block contracts with the Legal Aid Board, and to be subject to tests of means.

We have not yet decided whether it is right to reform Scots family law in line with what has been done in England and Wales. In Scotland we have a background of less acrimonious divorce generally than south of the border. In 1995 around 65 per cent. of divorces in Scotland were on the grounds of non-cohabitation, but we accept that that percentage falls to 47 per cent. in relation to couples with children.

We believe that the process of mediation can and should take place between the parties and their lawyers and should not be seen only as a diversion from the legal process. We shall certainly be examining the present state of our family law to see whether further reform is desirable to achieve that. Our examination will include consideration of such issues as whether fault grounds for divorce should remain. We shall also consider whether mediation by mediation organisations should be given a more prominent place in the process.

Mrs. Ewing: Will the Minister give way?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I have only a few moments left in which to speak, and I have already given way twice to the hon. Lady.

I hope that what I have said offers some reassurance to hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood. The main good news tonight will be the success of the applications for section 10 grant from Dumfries and Galloway and from Grampian. As for the longer term, I must stress again that we have under active consideration the future place of family mediation, both in relation to legal aid and in relation to family law generally. We shall of course consult widely on any new proposals, and I can tell all hon. Members who have been public-spirited enough to attend this important debate that they—along with interested organisations including Family Mediation Scotland—will be able to influence the outcome. I look forward to hearing their representations in due course, and I thank them for their welcome for the extra steps that we have taken.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Electoral Registration

1. Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimates he has made of under-registration on the electoral registers which will be used in the next general election; and if he will make a statement. [10547]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Tom Sackville): Figures for the number of electors on the registers coming into force on 16 February are not yet available. In 1996, there were 42.8 million names on the electoral register in Great Britain, compared with an estimated resident population of eligible age of 45 million.

Mr. Barnes: Will the new registers operating from 16 February, which will be used in the next general election, be in a better state than previous registers which had millions of people missing from them? I have raised this matter many times before in the House. Can details comparing the registered and eligible populations in each constituency be published as soon as possible so that we can see what state the registers are in? Will every effort be made to put people on supplementary lists so that, even under the current inadequate system, as many people as possible are on electoral registers before the general election?

Mr. Sackville: We continue to spend substantial sums trying to encourage people to register through advertising and in other ways. As the hon. Gentleman knows, however, even after the obvious discrimination was removed from our electoral system, we retained an element of permanency of residence as a condition. That means that those who cannot claim to have been resident in a constituency on a particular date in the preceding October will not be registered there. It does not mean that we are not making the greatest effort to ensure the highest possible level of registration.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Does my hon. Friend agree that, by law, an electoral registration officer may not have his or her register up to date but that it must be at least five months out of date? Can serious consideration be given—perhaps not for the forthcoming general election, but for the one after that—to introducing a system of rolling registration so that people can be registered to vote at the place where they are resident?

Mr. Sackville: A rolling register would be expensive, bureaucratic and unlikely to achieve a higher overall level of registration. The current system of a register which requires people to prove residence in October has served us well.

Mr. Henderson: Does the Minister accept that if democracy is worth having it must be paid for? Is it not embarrassing to our democracy that some 3 million adults will be disfranchised in the election that will take place in a few weeks' time? Should that not be a matter of concern to the whole House? Should not the Government now consider establishing an all-party Committee of the House to see how best we can tackle the problem and enfranchise all our country's citizens?

Mr. Sackville: Obviously ideas can be put forward, but the hon. Gentleman should remember that we cannot force people to register if they cannot be bothered or simply do not wish to register. What we can do, however, is try to encourage all those who are prepared to take an interest to take the trouble to ensure that they are on the register.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: My hon. Friend referred to a degree of permanency of residence. In considering that aspect, will he bear in mind the question of constituencies with universities? Students are there for a very ephemeral time and yet they can affect the whole outcome. They need make no effort to get on the register; they are simply put on it by the university authorities. Could they not register in their home towns rather than in those where they are ephemeral students?

Mr. Sackville: Students can register in any place where they can establish a degree of permanency of residence. If any misdemeanours are taking place involving people being registered but not at their own request, my hon. Friend's electoral registration officer should look into the matter.

Reoffending

2. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his current estimate of the proportion of the prison population who reoffend after being released. [10548]

The Minister of State, Home Office (Miss Ann Widdecombe): The most recent available information indicates that 51 per cent. of all sentenced prisoners discharged in 1992 from Prison Service establishments in England and Wales were reconvicted for a standard list offence within two years.

Mr. Cohen: Does not the fact that more than half of all prisoners reoffend within two years of release make a mockery of the Home Secretary's claim that prison works? Are not the reoffending rates similar after prison and after probation, whereas the cost per prisoner is £1,800 per month and the cost of probation is less than £200 a month? Are there not strong cost and rehabilitation grounds for putting fewer people in prison?

Miss Widdecombe: No, in either case. First, prison reconviction rates at present are better than reconviction rates for those being sentenced in the community. Secondly, it is not merely a question of cost. The hon. Gentleman should understand that prison works by protecting the general public from the activities of those who are kept within it.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: Is it not astonishing that the reconviction rate for those sentenced in the community is higher by 4 per cent. than the reconviction rate for those sent to prison? Does my hon. Friend draw from that fact the conclusion either that the probation service is not so effective as it ought to be in rehabilitating offenders in the community, or that prison is more effective than many people think that it is in rehabilitating offenders inside prison?

Miss Widdecombe: I attribute the success of the Prison Service in rehabilitation to the tremendous strides that it has made in its programmes over the past few years. The number of prisoner hours in education has increased from 4.6 million in 1979 to 9.4 million in 1995-96.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: You have doubled the number of prisoners.

Miss Widdecombe: There has been a rise of 21 per cent. in expenditure between 1993 and 1995. The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) called out from a sedentary position that the number of prisoners has doubled. If he works it out, he will see that the rise in the number of hours has far outstripped the rise in the number of prisoners. The types of national vocational qualification offered have increased from 24 only three years ago to 48, and there has been a similar increase in offending behaviour courses. That is where the explanation lies.

Mr. Winnick: Is it not important that those who commit the most serious crimes should be in prison in the first place? Is the Minister aware that many of us are deeply concerned that those responsible for the murder of Stephen Lawrence have not been brought to justice? Is it not important that every effort should continue to be made to put those who murdered that 17-year-old lad in the dock? We hope that speedy progress will be made by the police force.

Miss Widdecombe: Whereas I can extend my sympathy to the relatives concerned, I cannot comment on the case in the terms that the hon. Gentleman invites. Where serious crime has been committed, it is important that the perpetrators are brought to justice. If the hon. Gentleman feels that as strongly as I do, and if he believes that those who commit the most serious crimes should be in prison, why did the Labour party abstain on the Crime (Sentences) Bill last week?

Mr. Booth: As was stated in the lead-up to the Prisoners' Earnings Bill last year, Home Office research shows that prisoners released from prison after having proper work experience in prison had a reoffending rate that is 50 per cent. better. As the Home Office supported the Bill, will it go on monitoring the working of the legislation?

Miss Widdecombe: I congratulate my hon. Friend on introducing that Bill. I can confirm that it assists prisoners if they have good work opportunities in prison. We shall, of course, monitor that and seek to increase those opportunities.

Cannabis

3. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek to amend the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 to allow cannabis to be prescribed by medically qualified doctors. [10549]

Mr. Sackville: No.

Mr. Prentice: What on earth is so dreadful about allowing medically qualified doctors to prescribe cannabis when it was quite lawful before 1971? Many people with disabling conditions, such as multiple sclerosis and arthritis, claim that cannabis gives them relief. Is it not curious that only two days ago the Minister said that dronabinol, which is an active derivative of cannabis, may be prescribed lawfully by hospital doctors? Some 24 years after cannabis was banned from use in hospitals, it has been discovered that dronabinol can combat nausea suffered by patients undergoing chemotherapy. Is there not a compelling case for allowing the doctors—and not the politicians—to decide?

Mr. Sackville: If there are medicinal claims about cannabis or its derivatives, they must pass through the same mechanisms as other medicines. Unless clinical trials prove that they are safe and efficacious and that there is a consistent level of product quality, they will not be licensed as medicines.

The World Health Organisation made recommendations about dronabinol. A company must lodge a licence application for the product, which must then pass through clinical trials in order to get a licence in this country. In the event of medicinal claims about products, applications can be made to the relevant authorities at the Medicines Control Agency.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Does my hon. Friend recall the words of the late Home Office pathologist, the famous Professor Francis Camp, who said that soft drugs such as cannabis inevitably lead to hard drugs and that hard drugs lead to death—often within seven years? Is that not a warning to the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice), for the Liberal Democrats and for all who advocate the use of soft drugs?

Mr. Sackville: Although there are some genuine cases, there is no doubt that many of those calling for the medicinal use of cannabis are using it as a stalking horse to promote the campaign for its legalisation. The Liberal Democrat party conference voted for the legalisation of cannabis, and I hope that the Liberal justice and home affairs spokesman, the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), will withdraw from that decision. If there are medicinal uses for cannabis, they must be proved. In the absence of such evidence, we must not send a confused message to young people when we have told them that cannabis and all illegal drugs are dangerous and should be avoided.

Mr. Flynn: Would not the better message be that all drugs are dangerous, that young people who smoke cigarettes are 22 times more likely to use hard and soft drugs than other groups, and that in 95 per cent. of cases hard drugs are used under the influence of alcohol? Does the Minister recall that, in answer to a letter from three hon. Members representing three political parties—including his own—the Medical Research Council said that it was an established fact that cannabis was uniquely valuable in treating multiple sclerosis, the side-effects of chemotherapy and several other diseases and that there was no replacement product? Why on earth are the Government sticking to their line in order to gain popularity with the voters and thereby denying the sick a unique medicine?

Mr. Sackville: It is open to any producer to apply for a licence for a cannabis product. As to the hon. Gentleman's comments about other dangers, no one disagrees that pharmaceutical drugs and cigarettes are dangerous. However, he should not use them as a front for implicitly calling for the legalisation of drugs. I hope that Opposition Front Bench Members will distance themselves from his remarks.

Members of Parliament

4. Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the number of hon. Members. [10550]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Michael Howard): The full complement of this House stands at present at 651 right hon. and hon. Members. That figure will rise to 659 from the next general election.

Sir David Knox: After the general election, there will be 34 more Members of Parliament than there were when I was first elected to the House almost 27 years ago. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the time has come at least to stabilise the number of Members of Parliament or, preferably, to start to reduce the number?

Mr. Howard: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. The steady increase in the number of constituencies in recent years is a consequence of the way in which the rules for the redistribution of seats have been interpreted. I do not think that that outcome was wholly foreseen when the rules were first agreed, which is why I have announced my intention to conduct a review of them.

Mr. Dalyell: As the question on the Order Paper is about "honourable" Members, may I ask the Home Secretary whether he has had brought to his attention the new statements of Mohamed Al Fayed on television, which many of our constituents throughout the country have seen, reflecting the gravest allegations—

Madam Speaker: Order. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is making a very good point with which we may have some sympathy, but it really does not relate to the question on the Order Paper, which is an important question, and I shall call a couple of hon. Members from both sides of the House.

Mr. Barry Jones: Does the Home Secretary agree that what is required for this honourable House is many more Labour Members on the Government Benches?

Madam Speaker: I thought that I was doing the House a service, but it does not appear that I am. However, I am sure that the Home Secretary will want to reply.

Mr. Howard: I think that the hon. Gentleman will have to whistle in the wind for quite some time. The truth of the matter is that the House provides a most effective way of representing the views of our constituents, as reflected by a majority on the Conservative Benches. I have every confidence that such a majority will continue after the election.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Would not the creation of a Parliament with tax-raising powers north of the border call into question the number of Scottish Members in the House? Is that not a particularly important issue to address?

Mr. Howard: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. I was disappointed that the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) did not raise the West Lothian question, which he originated and which is central to this issue. The Labour party has still not begun to provide an answer to the question: why should Members be elected in Scotland to come to this place to decide matters of health, education and transport in England when English Members of Parliament will have no say whatever in deciding questions of health, education and transport in Scotland?

Mr. Llwyd: Does the Home Secretary not realise that the answer is simple and straightforward? He could reduce the number of seats in the House by 112 immediately by granting proper legislative Parliaments to both Scotland and Wales, which would be to everyone's benefit.

Mr. Howard: I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman's view of what should happen is entirely shared by Opposition Members who argue the cause of devolution so strenuously. There may well be a logical consequence and a link between the two which the hon. Gentleman identifies, but it is a question and a link that the Labour party has consistently failed to recognise.

Metropolitan Police

5. Sir Michael Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on current manning levels and prospects for recruitment during 1997–98; and if he will make a statement. [10552]

Mr. Howard: I regularly discuss with the Commissioner staffing levels and prospects for recruitment in the Metropolitan police. He assures me that the proposed settlement for the Metropolitan police for 1997-98 would enable him to increase officer strength to 27,400 during 1997.

Sir Michael Shersby: Despite the very welcome drop in crime of about 13 per cent. in the Metropolitan police area as a whole, is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that there is concern in the outer London boroughs—particularly in south-west area No. 5, which includes my constituency—about proposed changes in manpower? Is he further aware that the need for effective policing means that there is a need to maintain those manpower levels? Will he therefore review the impact of the national funding formula arrangements on the Metropolitan police and provide an appropriate mechanism to ensure that the special needs of the Metropolitan police area are taken fully into account and that manpower continues to be maintained at a high level?

Mr. Howard: I have, indeed, undertaken to review the application of the national funding formula to the Metropolitan police and the arrangements that we have made for the funding of the Metropolitan police include a recognition of the special needs of the Metropolitan police force. Indeed, the funding that we propose for 1997-98 represents a 3.4 per cent. increase on the 1996-97 allocation—an increase of no less than £55 million.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Will the Home Secretary explain how he reconciles with his declared policy on the effectiveness of police officers a reduction of 755 Metropolitan police officers in the past four years and a reduction nationwide of about 1,000 police officers over the past four years? Those are Home Office figures.

Mr. Howard: The truth of the matter is that the September 1996 figures showed that there were more than 98,000 police constables in England and Wales, which is more than there have ever been before. The public are interested in seeing police officers on the street on patrol duty helping to create a safer Britain. That is exactly what is happening.

Mr. Congdon: I very much welcome the fact that there are 5,000 extra police officers in the Metropolitan police area compared with 1979. When my right hon. and learned Friend quite properly reviews the national funding formula, will he take particular account of the impact on outer London?

Mr. Howard: I understand my hon. Friend's point. The internal allocation of funding and officers within the Metropolitan police area is an operational matter for the Commissioner, but I am sure that all relevant matters will be taken into account in the review.

Clear-up Rates

6. Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of crimes notified to the police were cleared up in the latest year for which figures are available. [10553]

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Maclean): Clear-up rates vary considerably, depending on the type of crime. The overall clear-up rate for notifiable offences in 1995 was 26 per cent. For the most serious types of crime, clear-up rates were very high: 92 per cent. of all homicides, 77 per cent. of acts of violence against the person and 76 per cent. of sexual offences were cleared up.

Mr. Bayley: Is the Minister aware that since the Conservatives came to power in 1979 the number of offences committed in North Yorkshire has trebled from 20,000 to 59,000 a year? According to the chief constable's reports during that period, the detection rate has fallen from 49 per cent. to 23 per cent., and North Yorkshire now has fewer police officers than it had in 1979 under the Labour Government. Is that not a crushing indictment of the Conservatives' failure to control crime and convict criminals? Is it not time that the Conservatives went?

Mr. Maclean: I suggest that the hon. Gentleman brings his facts up to date. According to the figures that we have received from North Yorkshire, the chief constable expects to recruit 20 extra officers this year as a result of the additional funding that we are giving him. If the hon. Gentleman and his party were concerned about crime in North Yorkshire in the 1980s, they did not show much sign of it. They voted against everything that chief constables in North Yorkshire and elsewhere wanted in order to tackle crime. With regard to the power of the Attorney-General to review lenient sentences, for instance, Labour Members voted against that measure then, and they did not even have the guts to vote for the Crime (Sentences) Bill last week.

Mr. Bayley: You are lying, and you know it.

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has used unparliamentary language, which is unacceptable. Will he withdraw what he has just said?

Mr. Bayley: The Minister's comments were— [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I will deal with this matter.

Mr. Bayley: The Minister's comments were a total misrepresentation of the position in the 1980s, but if you require me to withdraw the word that I used, Madam Speaker, I do so.

Madam Speaker: I do require you to do so.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: In seeking to cool the atmosphere, may I ask whether my right hon. and learned Friend accepts that closed circuit television has made a major contribution not just to reducing crime, but to bringing people who have committed offences before the courts? Will he continue to give maximum financial and other support to the establishment of closed circuit television systems in town centres, and particularly in the centre of my town of Macclesfield, which has submitted an application that I hope will be warmly endorsed by his Department?

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend is well known as one who pours oil on troubled waters whenever he can. He will know of the tremendous funding that we have given to the establishment of closed circuit television. We see CCTV as a means of preventing crime, of catching criminals and of helping to convict the guilty, which is why we put £5 million into it in the first year and £15 million last year. We are reviewing the bids for CCTV in the current round and we shall consider all representations carefully because we want to spend the £15 million as wisely as possible throughout the country. I thank my hon. Friend for his warm welcome for that initiative.

Mr. Michael: Can we cut through the Minister's rhetoric and deal with facts? Does the Minister not realise that the only people who are happy with the Government's record on crime are the criminals? As crime has doubled and prosecutions have dropped, the criminals are twice as likely to get away with it as they were under the last Labour Government, and three times as likely to get away with violent crimes. Is the Minister proud of his record?

Mr. Maclean: That was rhetoric if ever we heard it. The hon. Gentleman talks about criminals being happy. I think that it was the head of the Superintendents Association, Chief Superintendent Brian Mackenzie, who said this week—following Labour's behaviour in the other place—that criminals would be clapping their hands with joy because Labour peers had voted for two contradictory amendments. [Interruption.] I have not given the House rhetoric; I have given the House facts. I have given the House the facts of the Labour party's voting record, which has been consistent in the 1980s and the 1990s. Last week, when we discussed the Crime (Sentences) Bill—which gives powers to lock up automatically, for life, the most serious violent and dangerous offenders, powers to lock up drug dealers for seven years and powers to lock up persistent burglars for three years—Labour Members abstained. They voted against such legislation in the 1980s and abstained in the 1990s. That is why they will be rejected in a few months' time.

Woodhill Prison

7. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has for the future of Woodhill prison. [10554]

Miss Widdecombe: There are no plans to change the role of Woodhill as a local prison, or its capacity. It will also continue to take category A prisoners, and a programme of work is under way to provide improved physical and procedural security to meet the relevant recommendations of Sir John Woodcock and General Sir John Learmont.

Woodhill will continue to take a small number of disruptive prisoners, and they will be housed in a new close supervision unit. In addition, the same building will include a small unit for holding female prisoners who need to be kept in conditions of high security.

Mr. Butler: May I begin by saying what a pleasure it will be to address my hon. Friend as my right hon. Friend? I offer my congratulations on behalf of Conservative Members.

My hon. Friend will be aware that there has been great concern in my constituency and elsewhere near Woodhill about constant reports that there is to be upgrading and that money is to be spent to permit Myra Hindley to be held there. May I make it clear to my hon. Friend that although we want Myra Hindley to be held for as long as possible, we do not want her to be held anywhere near Milton Keynes and we do not require luxury facilities to be built for that purpose?

Miss Widdecombe: I think that I can reassure my hon. Friend. No decision has been made about the location of any particular prisoner in connection with Woodhill. As for the stories of luxury, they are similar to the scaremongering stories that we often hear from the Labour party. In fact, there is only the most basic provision in Woodhill, in keeping with my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary's policy that prison should be decent but austere. There will be no in-cell television or radio, normal volumetric control will apply and furniture and equipment will be standard prison issue, including metal-frame beds. Association areas will have standard furnishings and equipment.

Recorded Crime

8. Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the overall levels of recorded crime for the last three years for which figures are available. [10555]

Mr. Howard: Recorded crime levels in the last 12 months to June 1996, the latest period for which figures are available, were 10 per cent. lower than three years before that. That is a fall of more than half a million offences—the biggest continuous fall over three years since records were first kept in 1857.

Mr. Sweeney: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that the figures that he has given compare favourably with those for any country in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development? Will he join me in congratulating the Vale of Glamorgan police, who have achieved a substantial reduction in the rate of recorded crime for the last two years? Will he also accept the plaudits of the people of the Vale of Glamorgan for the contribution made by the additional police whom he has provided? Tougher penalties for criminals have helped to produce that success.

Mr. Howard: In the last two years for which figures are available, the fall in recorded crime in England and Wales was the highest recorded in a survey of 18 OECD countries. Across the country, the police deserve congratulation on that success. I am delighted to be able to join my hon. Friend in congratulating the police in the Vale of Glamorgan on their success.

Mr. Sheerman: The Home Secretary must know that the public are suffering from reporting fatigue. They are fed up of reporting burglaries and car break-ins. Real crime is still rising, and rising fast. Is not it time that he spoke to the great British public, who would tell him that time and again?

Mr. Howard: The odd thing is that when the crime figures were rising, Labour never criticised them. When we introduced the Criminal Justice and Public Order Bill, the Leader of the Opposition, no less, asked:

"If it does not cut crime, will he accept that it has failed?"—[Official Report, 11 January 1994; Vol. 235, c. 21.]

Since it has been on the statute book, recorded crime has consistently fallen. I hope that the Labour party will now accept that that Bill and our other measures have succeeded in helping to make Britain a safer place.

Mr. Garnier: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that one of the best ways to reduce crime is to introduce closed circuit television? In the borough of Oadby and Wigston, in my constituency, the predominantly Liberal Democrat council refuses to support an application by schools and the police in Leicestershire for its introduction. Following that application by the police and by Conservative-minded and anti-crime people, £95 million of Government money is to be spent introducing it, to the benefit of the population.

Mr. Howard: I am not at all surprised by what my hon. and learned Friend said. The attitude of that Liberal Democrat-controlled council is typical of Liberal Democrats across the country. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) likes to pontificate, but the actions of Liberal Democrats in control of local government show that they do not care in the slightest about taking effective action to deal with crime.

Mr. Straw: Does the Home Secretary recognise that he is no more convincing when he talks about crime figures than he was when he used to talk about unemployment figures? Why does he not own up not to figures for the past 12 months but to those for the past 18 years, during which crime has doubled? The Conservatives have achieved the worst record of any Government since the war. Internationally, they have the worst record of any industrialised country. On serious crime alone, their record since 1979 is 10 times worse than that of the United States. That is a record of abject failure.

Mr. Howard: Unlike the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), the hon. Gentleman seems to set great store by the figures. I hope that he accepts what the figures show for the past three years. He is not in the best position to talk about sounding convincing. Earlier this week, he gave an interview to The Independent, which was reported by no less a person than Polly Toynbee who said, roughly, that she trusted the hon. Gentleman because she did not believe a word that he was saying.

Drug Abuse (Prisons)

10. Mr. Hawksley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what initiatives the Prison Service is taking to control prisoners' access to drugs. [10557]

Miss Widdecombe: Specific measures to control the supply of drugs into prisons include enhanced searching, increased use of closed circuit television and sniffer dogs. We are also assessing the results of a pilot scheme on the mandatory use of non-contact or closed visits. In addition, many establishments have taken the opportunity to develop local initiatives for controlling the supply of drugs.

Mr. Hawksley: I had hoped that when people were sent to prison, there would be an opportunity to reduce the amount of drugs that they took. I welcome the mandatory drug-testing regime, but its results show that in Cardiff 74 per cent. of tests were positive and in Featherstone and Dorchester the figure was more than 50 per cent. Has any disciplinary action been taken against the warders and governors of prisons that show high levels of positive results from mandatory testing? They appear to be turning a blind eye to the problem, because almost all the drugs must come from visitors, whom they could control.

Miss Widdecombe: It is certainly not the case that a blind eye is being turned to drugs in prisons—many initiatives and ring-fenced funding have demonstrated our commitment to combating the problem. A prisoner who was found to have taken drugs could be subject to disciplinary action, resulting in the loss of up to 42 days' remission; a prison officer who was found have brought in drugs would be subject to dismissal; and a visitor who was found to have brought in drugs would be subject to prosecution. We have a firm programme, which is working.

Mr. George Howarth: I congratulate the hon. Lady on being made a Privy Councillor. Will she acknowledge that, over the past few months, Ministers have repeatedly given me inaccurate information on the scale and types of drugs being detected in the prison system? Does she accept that as soon as accurate information is available, it should be published so that we can make a proper assessment of what is happening in prisons and informed decisions on how to combat the growing menace of drug abuse in our prison system?

Miss Widdecombe: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind remarks. As I met him this week specifically to discuss the issue, he will be aware that there are some doubts and questions—which are perhaps not particularly large or with a particularly vast effect—on the integrity of retests, which are given after test results have been challenged, and on the impact of that matter on the overall figures. He will be aware—as I have given him an undertaking—that the matter is being examined urgently, that the figures are being refined and that any past statements we have made that may have been based on old and questionable figures will be corrected.

Violent Crime

12. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the finding of the British crime survey regarding the proportion of adults who were victims of violent crime once or more during 1995. [10559]

Mr. Maclean: The 1996 British crime survey found that overall 5.2 per cent. of adults were victims of violent crime one or more times during 1995. That percentage includes woundings, robberies and domestic violence.

Mr. McAvoy: Are not those figures a shocking indictment of the Tories' record on crime prevention? They claim to belong to the party of law and order, but, during a 12-month period, one in 14 adults were mugged at least once, and very few of the offenders were caught. Does the Minister accept that a Government who are incapable of protecting citizens should go?

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman has not been paying attention to the substantial falls in crime over the past three years. We do not merely claim to be the party of law and order—we are the party of law and order, because we vote for law and order measures. If the hon. Gentlemen and the Labour party want to inherit that mantle, they had better start voting for such measures, rather than voting against them or abstaining.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: Are not the reductions in crime, which are very welcome, a direct result of the measures taken by the Government to ensure that legal obstacles are swept aside, so that guilty people can be convicted? Are not criminals the only group who would welcome the election of a Labour Government, as they would know that a Labour Government would not lift a finger to remove other legal obstacles to imprisoning more criminals?

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. As Chief Superintendent Brian Mackenzie said this week, criminals will not have been lifting their fingers but clapping with joy at the decision taken by Labour peers in another place. Over the past three years, under a Conservative Government, crime has decreased considerably, which is testimony to the record number of police constables that we now have.

Police Duties

13. Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of how many more police officers will be on the beat in 1997 than (a) 1979 and (b) 1992. [10560]

Mr. Maclean: On the basis of chief constables' estimates, by March 1997 there could be over 16,000 more police constables in England and Wales than there were in May 1979, and about 3,000 more than in March 1992.

Mr. Hawkins: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. Do not those figures demonstrate that the Conservative party has consistently supported a policy of getting more police officers back on the beat? Will he confirm that the Government intend to provide ever more funding for ever more police officers on the beat? Is it not true that, on law and order, the British people can trust only the Conservative party—unlike the Labour party, whose Front-Bench spokesman was this week so strongly supported by a fellow 1960s liberal?

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We do not need to look at forecasts to see the record of the Labour party in power on police numbers. In 1979, the police force was 8,000 under establishment; now, we have 16,000 more constables, paid for and provided by the British taxpayer under a Conservative Government. We shall continue with our pledge to have 5,000 more police officers—I notice that the shadow Home Secretary has not acknowledged or promised to commit himself to that pledge.

Mr. Hutton: Will the Minister remind the House how many police forces in England and Wales will have fewer officers on the beat in 1997 than in 1992? If he needs any help in answering that question, I can tell him that one of those police forces will be Cumbria constabulary, which covers his constituency and mine.

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman is totally wrong on that, too. I have given the House the figures, which show that we have record numbers of constables, and they are constables for operational duty. Cumbria, too, has benefited from the increased funding provided for the 5,000 more officers promised by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. A party that left the police force 8,000 under strength is in no moral position to quibble about the present record police numbers.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 23 January. [10577]

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Salmond: Does the Prime Minister realise that for £200 million we could re-equip every primary school in the United Kingdom with books and new computers to the tune of £10,000 per school? Would not that be a more meaningful project for the millennium generation than building a giant dome in Greenwich with a lifespan of 10 years? How does he think people in Birmingham, Swansea or Glasgow feel about the concentration of funds on Heseltine's folly on the Thames?

The Prime Minister: Many different projects will come out of the millennium fund—all of them worthy—including that to which the hon. Gentleman referred. It is not a question of having only a single project for the millennium. As a result of the lottery, which we established, about £1.8 billion will be available for the millennium. It will be spent in a variety of ways, and I think that, in one way or another, it will benefit almost every part of the country.

Mr. Alexander: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, since the last general election, unemployment figures have fallen dramatically and without resort to a windfall tax? If anyone was minded to impose one, should not we be told which companies would be subject to it, on what basis they would be subject to it, how much it would cost them and what revenue would result?

The Prime Minister: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend about the desirability of knowing precisely what the windfall tax might amount to and who would pay for it. There seems to be some confusion about who would pay for it. I gather that yesterday the Leader of the Opposition's office said that British Airways did not fit inside the terms of the windfall tax but that the shadow Trade and Industry Secretary said that, as far as she was aware, no one had ruled out the fact that British Airways would have to pay a windfall tax. Remarkably, having contradicted the leader's office, she went on to add that she did not think there was any confusion about that policy.

Mr. Blair: The Prime Minister seems very keen to ask me questions and have me answer them. I suggest that if he is really keen on that, he goes ahead and calls the general election. However, let us do things in a more conventional way to begin with.

After this morning's Cabinet meeting, will the Prime Minister confirm unequivocally what he said unequivocally in December: that he will not rule out the option of joining a single currency in the next Parliament, even in the first wave, and that that will remain his party's position at the next general election?

The Prime Minister: I can certainly confirm that point and I will explain to the right hon. Gentleman what the Cabinet did and decided this morning. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor has conducted a review of the criteria for a single currency and that was looked at in depth in Cabinet this morning. We have concluded, on the basis of that detailed examination of the criteria and on the basis of the information currently available, that it is very unlikely, although not impossible, that a single currency will be able to proceed safely on 1 January 1999. I am talking not just about Britain's participation, but about the single currency itself. If it did proceed without reliable convergence, we would not, of course, be part of it.

Mr. Blair: Let us just—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blair: Let us be clear about what the Prime Minister means there. Is he saying that it is unlikely—

Mr. David Evans: What is your policy?

Madam Speaker: Order. This is not a time when the Opposition answer questions; it is a time when the Opposition ask questions.

Mr. Blair: Let us be clear about what the Prime Minister is saying, particularly in light of the interview that the Chancellor has just given on television. Is the Prime Minister saying that it is unlikely that the whole system will go ahead on 1 January 1999? Is it clear that if the system does go ahead on 1 January 1999, he retains the option to join?

The Prime Minister: If the right hon. Gentleman reads what I have said, he will find that I answered that question quite explicitly just a few moments ago. I said that on the information currently available, it was very unlikely that the single currency would proceed safely on 1 January 1999 and that if it did proceed without reliable convergence, we would not be part of it.

Mr. Blair: The Prime Minister is not answering the question of whether he agrees with the Chancellor that if the single currency does proceed on the right criteria, he retains the option to join. Let him answer that question specifically and then let him answer this question, too. If that is the position of the Conservative party, is it the position of the whole Conservative party? [HON. MEMBERS: "Yes."] "Yes", they all chorus. Will he then tell us whether he will prevent—[HON. MEMBERS: "Bye bye."] I know quite well why Conservative Members want this question to be shouted down. Will the Prime Minister undertake to say that if that is the position of the whole Conservative party, he will prevent any group of Conservative party candidates from standing on the manifesto of ruling out the option altogether?

The Prime Minister: If the right hon. Gentleman had had a mirror in front of him so that he could see the faces behind him, he might just have settled on my first two answers, both of which I am happy to reiterate to him.

Mr. Yeo: Does my right hon. Friend agree that if any politicians try to persuade voters that living standards and pay packets are safe in their hands by making a few pledges about income tax rates, and if those politicians do not simultaneously and unequivocally rule out any tampering with the ceiling on national insurance contributions, they are guilty of a gross and serious fraud on the British people that only he and a continuing Conservative Government can prevent?

The Prime Minister: It was an extraordinary speech by the shadow Chancellor the other day, and one I greatly enjoyed reading and will greatly enjoy revisiting time and again between now and the election. The reality is that it is not a case of whether a Labour Government would increase taxes; it is simply a question of where a Labour Government would increase taxes. Would it be by increasing national insurance contributions, changing the rate of national insurance contributions, cutting tax allowances or raising inheritance tax? The scope is very wide.

Mr. Blair: What about the 22 tax rises?

Mr. Major: Twenty-two tax rises says the Leader of the Opposition. Which of those would he repeal? Which of those would he reverse? What about the 25 tax reductions that he never mentions?

Q2. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 23 January. [10578]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Cohen: Is the Prime Minister aware that, in my constituency, one in five primary school children are taught in classes with more than 30 other children? [AN HON. MEMBER: "Lucky."] A Conservative Member says, "lucky." Does the Prime Minister agree with that? I presented the Class Size (Reduction) Bill, and Labour has made a firm election pledge on the matter. Why have his Government done nothing except preside over ever-rising class sizes? Why do his Government prefer silly status symbols to sensible class sizes?

The Prime Minister: I am not sure whether that counts as an expenditure commitment; it will be interesting to see in due course. The proportion of children in classes of more than 31 has fallen since 1979. Beyond that—[Interruption.] Hon. Gentlemen might wait a moment. Beyond that, there is evidence that parents agree that class size is not the most important factor. If the hon. Gentleman doubts that, let me tell him that the average class size for 11 to 16-year-olds in Islington is smaller than at the London Oratory.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is less expensive to keep good youngsters good, which is why any initiative to expand the cadet forces must be welcomed? Such an initiative would impose on left-wing authorities the cadet forces' right of access to school property and buildings.

The Prime Minister: I saw the speculative stories in the press this morning about cadet forces and must say that they were a touch overblown in the way in which they were printed. I strongly encourage participation in cadet forces. They provide young people with the opportunity to develop qualities of responsibility, self-reliance, resourcefulness and endurance.

Mr. Tony Banks: Why did the right hon. Gentleman not join, then?

The Prime Minister: I did not join because I was playing cricket, which provides exactly the same qualities for people.

There are now more than 130,000 young people in the cadet organisation. I would certainly wish to encourage wider voluntary participation in the cadets. That of course requires more assistance from adult volunteers, but I hope that it will be possible to increase the scheme.

Q3. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 23 January. [10579]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. McAvoy: Will the Prime Minister confirm that one of his reasons for wanting school children to join the cadets is that they can learn the qualities of loyalty, self-discipline and leadership? Is it not therefore regrettable that the Defence Secretary, the Deputy Prime Minister and the Prime Minister were never members of the cadets, as the first needs lessons in loyalty, the second in self-discipline and the third in leadership?

The Prime Minister: That was very well rehearsed. [HON. MEMBERS: "Author."] One scans the sides to my hon. Friends' cries of "Author". The hand behind the words can readily be discerned.

Q4. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 23 January. [10580]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Bellingham: Does the Prime Minister agree that businesses need certainty and stability when planning investment? Do not the conflicting statements about which companies would pay a windfall tax prove yet again that there is a gaping hole at the heart of Labour's spending plans that can only—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must ask a question about the Government's policies. If he can do that, I will hear him, but if he cannot he must resume his seat.

Mr. Bellingham: Is the Prime Minister aware that any windfall tax would lead to higher gas, water and electricity bills for my constituents?

The Prime Minister: It is undisputed that if there were to be a new tax at an undisclosed rate on an undisclosed number of companies at an undisclosed time, it would have an impact not only on the price of the products those companies produce, but on the dividends that the shareholders legitimately expect from having invested in those companies. At the moment, there is complete uncertainty about any windfall tax proposals. Clearly, the proposals are coming apart at the seams. It is a case of give Labour spokesmen the facts and let them draw their own confusions.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Can the Prime Minister say why he is spending hundreds of millions of pounds in compensation for farmers in the BSE crisis and is preparing to spend more than £100 million in compensation under the Firearms (Amendment) Bill, yet adamantly refuses to pay any compensation to those infected with hepatitis C by contaminated blood transfusions? Where is the justice in that? Will he take personal charge, show some compassion and, even now, ensure that legitimate compensation is paid?

The Prime Minister: Everyone has great sympathy for the people who suffer from hepatitis. The underlying point is essentially whether action was taken that could have been better done at the time that then created the problem faced by the sufferers from hepatitis. If one accepted that principle, it would be a wholly new principle for the national health service and not one that any Government have accepted in the past. The hon. Gentleman himself understands that.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mrs. Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): May I ask the Leader of the House for details of future business?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 27 JANUARY—Until about Seven o'clock, Second Reading of the Sex Offenders Bill. Followed by progress on remaining stages of the Education Bill.

TUESDAY 28 JANUARY—Conclusion of remaining stages of the Education Bill.

WEDNESDAY 29 JANUARY—Until Two o'clock, there will be debates on the Motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Conclusion of remaining stages of the Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Bill.

Motion on the Police Grant Report (England and Wales).

THURSDAY 30 JANUARY—Until about Seven o'clock, Second Reading of the Civil Procedure Bill [Lords].

FRIDAY 31 JANUARY—Private Members' Bills.

MONDAY 3 FEBRUARY—Motions on the English Revenue Support Grant Reports. Details will be given in the Official Report.

The House will also wish to know that on Wednesday 29 January there will be a debate on artists' resale rights in European Standing Committee B. Details of the relevant documents will be given in the Official Report.

Wednesday 29 January:

European Standing Committee B: European Community Document: 7050/96 relating to Artists' resale rights. Relevant European Legislation Committee Reports: HC51-xx111 (1996-96). Monday 3 February: The relevant orders are as follows:

The Local Government Finance Report (England) 1997/98, Special Grant Report (No 23); The Limitation of Council Tax and Precepts (Relevant Notional Amounts) Report (England) 1997/98.

I regret that once again I am not able to be as forthcoming as I would like about the second week.

Mrs. Taylor: I start by thanking the Leader of the House for moving the debate on the police grant report to Wednesday which will allow more hon. Members to participate in the debate on the English revenue support grant reports on the following Monday. Can he tell us whether an Opposition day will be scheduled during that week?

Are the Government intending to respond to Lord Nolan's suggestion today that the funding of political parties should be examined by a Select Committee of the House? Does the Leader of the House agree that that issue should be examined, but that it is a pity that the remit of the Nolan committee was not widened as requested by the Labour party two years ago? Does he further agree that the principle of an independent inquiry has to be maintained in all those areas if public confidence in any new rules is to be established? Is not the Nolan committee itself an appropriate body to look at party funding?

Secondly, what arrangements is the Leader of the House making to ensure that the House is kept updated on the issue of BSE, in view of the reported memo from the Meat and Livestock Commission that the rules to protect the public from BSE are still being broken and today's report that cattle are being exported with misleading BSE-free certificates? The issue has been widely discussed, but it still causes much concern to constituents and Members of Parliament and everyone should be kept as fully informed as possible. Will there be a statement next week?

Thirdly, has the Leader of the House seen today's report on child benefit fraud by the Select Committee on Social Security? If so, will he now reconsider his refusal of our offer of co-operation on legislation to change the rules for obtaining birth certificates to close "The Day of the Jackal" loophole? Does he now regret not taking up the offer that I and my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) made in November 1995? Has he ruled out taking any action in what is left of this Parliament? Would not closing that loophole save millions of pounds of taxpayers' money?

Finally, what are the Government's intentions with regard to the Wirral, South by-election?

Mr. Newton: First, I thank the hon. Lady for her acknowledgement of the way in which we have responded, following discussions in the usual channels, to the number of points made about next week's business, including the handling of the Education Bill. I am also aware of the desire of the Labour party—and, no doubt, the minority parties—for Opposition time, and I continue to bear that in mind.

So far as Lord Nolan is concerned, I thought the request by the hon. Member for Dewsbury was a little curious as she did not acknowledge the fact that there was a thorough investigation by the Select Committee on Home Affairs in 1994. It may be that she preferred not to refer to that because we have implemented all the recommendations and the Labour party has not.

I cannot promise a statement next week on BSE, but I will bring the hon. Lady's point to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who has over many months made plain his willingness to keep the House informed on developments when he thinks it appropriate.

On the question of the Select Committee on Social Security's report on fraud, we recognise that the report makes a valuable contribution to the debate on curtailing fraud, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security will give the recommendations careful consideration. I will also draw his attention to the point that the hon. Member for Dewsbury has made today—I acknowledge that she has made it on previous occasions—about birth certificates.

Lastly, the hon. Member for Dewsbury will be aware of what has been said by my right hon. Friends on the Wirral, South by-election. The moving of the writ is not a matter for me and I cannot add to what has been said.

Mr. Charles Wardle (Bexhill and Battle): Will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the conduct of Department of Trade and Industry inspectors' inquiries? Is he aware that questions remain unanswered about earlier inquiries—for example, those into Blue Arrow, Guinness and House of Fraser? Is he further aware that there are questions about the circumstances in which inspectors were appointed and about the conduct of the inquiries?

Mr. Newton: I will certainly bring those matters to the attention of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): How soon will the House have an opportunity to examine the implications of the apparent change in stance by the Cabinet this morning on the subject of monetary union? On a separate and more detailed point, when will we have a statement on the Government's attitude to investment in the tourist industry? The promotion and development of that industry to its full potential is incredibly important to many parts of the country. Yesterday, Ministers gave me the figures relating to the reduction in the amount of money now made available to the English tourist board. It has dropped from 30p per head in real terms to just 10p, while at the same time, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland have increased spending on their tourist boards by 50 per cent. in real terms. That demonstrates how important they consider the tourist industry to be to their economic development.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman will have heard what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said on the first matter he raised, so I do not see any need to add to that.

I acknowledge that tourism is an important industry. It makes a great contribution to employment opportunities in this country as well as to foreign earnings for this country. I am sure that his desire for a debate on the subject is shared by my hon. Friends, but he need only look at today's business statement and recall the other matters that he knows will come before the House to appreciate that there is great pressure on time.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid–Kent): My right hon. Friend may be aware that the Lib-Lab coalition running Kent county council is so monumentally incompetent that one of its spokesmen has said that it requires a 10 per cent. increase in real terms merely to stand still. As the confusion, anxiety and distress among the population of Kent at the proposed cuts by that incompetent coalition is so extreme and well-founded, may we have a debate on the council as a matter of urgency?

Mr. Newton: From what I hear at the Dispatch Box each week, my hon. Friend's view of that council is unanimously shared by the Members of Parliament for Kent. Perhaps they would like to group together to put in an application for a debate on the council on a Wednesday morning.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): We have.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Will the Leader of the House make time for a debate on the Child Support Agency, which is still not working efficiently or fairly? It is causing a great deal of distress to thousands of families and also a great deal of work for Members.

Mr. Newton: I am afraid that I cannot undertake to provide time for a debate for the reasons that I have already touched on. I draw the hon. Lady's attention to the fact that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security is due to answer questions on Tuesday.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): In past European debates one must admit that there have been slight differences of nuance on the subject between myself and my right hon. Friend. Could we have another debate on Europe soon so that my right hon. Friend and I can debate our identity of view on what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said today? My right hon. Friend would then be able to agree utterly with me that it is totally out of order for anyone on the continent to suggest that we should have a unified system of taxation in Europe.

Mr. Newton: That is a very helpful question from my hon. Friend, and I should simply like to thank him for it.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East) rose—

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North–West): My hon. Friend is always being called these days.

Mr. Faulds: Not often enough.

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that we must have a debate [HON. MEMBERS: "Prompt him."] I do not need prompting; I am very good at my own words. We must have a debate on foreign affairs before the Government eventually cede to the need for a general election. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of two areas where an international crisis could break out literally at any moment, for both of which the British Government in the past have been responsible? Is he aware that in Cyprus the British Government were guarantor to the constitutional arrangements of 1960, which the Greek Cypriots aborted in 1963 and in which the Turkish forces only intervened 11 years later, as they were entitled to do under the treaty of guarantee, after the Nikos Sampson coup, which tried to bring about enosis with Greece?

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the other area is Israel—a fake country which was created because of the Balfour declaration promises and because of the immense American pressure under President Truman on Haiti to give the one critical vote needed to create Israel? It has depended entirely on American subvention ever since.

Mr. Newton: I can readily agree that the hon. Gentleman is very good with his own words, but there do seem to be rather a lot of them. I will bear in mind his request.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): Following the Government's decision to provide more opportunities for youngsters to join the cadet movement, will my right hon. Friend seek time for an early debate on the subject so that Conservative Members can reinforce their long-standing commitment to the movement—a commitment that can be contrasted to the attitude of Labour Members, particularly members of the teaching profession who have been hostile to the movement for many years? In such a debate we could also show our resistance to the proposals made by the shadow spokesman on education, the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), for a politically correct millennium youth movement, which will doubtless be run by social workers.

Mr. Newton: I shall bear in mind that suggestion for a debate as many important points could be made in it. I take this opportunity to pay tribute to the excellent cadet forces in my constituency which I visit from time to time.

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): I declare an interest as a member of the GMB. The Leader of the House may be aware that 200 workers at GCHQ have had their jobs privatised and taken over by a company called Vosper Mantech, which is to announce today that it has reached a recognition agreement with the GMB union. In light of the new situation, will the Leader of the House find time next week for a debate on GCHQ, where double standards now apply? Some 200 engineering workers and others now have the benefit of trade union recognition, which I welcome, while 4,000 other employees of GCHQ are denied that liberty. Will the Leader of the House accept that that is a priority subject and that time should be found for a debate on it?

Mr. Newton: Given the background to which I have already referred a couple of times, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will understand that I cannot promise an early debate on the subject. I will, however, ensure that his words are studied by my right hon. Friends involved.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): Does my right hon. Friend recognise that there is no more important subject for the House to debate during this Parliament than the future and structure of the United Kingdom? Will he find time, either on one of the three days the week after next, or shortly thereafter, for a full day's debate on a substantive motion affirming the integrity of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Newton: As I rather expected, my hon. Friend's suggestion has widespread support from my hon. Friends and I will give it most careful consideration.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Why is the Leader of the House fighting shy of having a debate or a statement on the funding of political parties prior to a general election? It should be the first item on the agenda before the general election is called so that when people cast their votes they know where the money is coming from. My hon. Friends refused to support the recommendation, not because it was no good, but because it did not go far enough. We are demanding that the Tory party reveals where it gets its funds from and the Tory party refuses to say. It was £19 million in the red last year and now it is suddenly £24 million in the black. Where has the money come from? Overseas. The public should know where the money comes from before the general election. We are prepared to tell everyone where our money comes from and it is time that the Tory Government came clean.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman might be in a stronger position if his party had implemented the recommendations of the report that we have already had.

Sir Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Further to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack), has it not been an enormously long time since the House had the opportunity of debating whether, if Scotland had its own Parliament, Scottish Members of Parliament would be able to vote and decide on matters of English taxation, but English Members of Parliament would not have the opportunity of voting on Scottish taxation? Is not that matter so important that we should have debate on it very soon—or at least, before the general election?

Mr. Newton: I have already told my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire that I shall give that suggestion careful consideration and I anticipate support for such a debate from the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell).

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): We can discuss political party funding on 12 February. As for next week, should not the Secretary of State for Defence return to the House early next week and explain the circumstances that have now surfaced—that the decision about the royal ship was made four months ago and the only reason for its being announced yesterday was because of the forthcoming election? Is it not unfortunate, to say the least, that the present Government—desperate to win the next election—are willing to bring the Queen into electioneering? Why should the Secretary of State for Defence have made his statement yesterday when that decision, rightly or wrongly, was made immediately after the Tory party conference?

Mr. Newton: I reject, out of hand, the suggestion that the Government are seeking in any way to bring Her Majesty into electioneering.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to early-day motion 432?

[That this House recognises the problem caused to the Teachers' Pension Agency funding by the increasing number of teachers seeking to retire shortly after reaching the age of 50; also recognises that such early retirements are, in many cases, of value to the teacher concerned, the school and its pupils; and believes also that further bipartisan consultation is necessary before any final decision is made on teachers' early retirement.]

This relatively new early-day motion relates to teachers' early retirement and has been signed by distinguished Members of Parliament on both sides of the House. It asks that the consultation period, which officially ended last Friday, be extended. As a result of the responsible and constructive mass lobby of the House by the National Association of Head Teachers, I believe that there are good grounds for permitting further time for consultation. Will my right hon. Friend find time either for a short debate or for a statement from the appropriate Minister?

Mr. Newton: Perhaps I might draw my hon. Friend's attention to the fact that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment is due to be in the House on Wednesday next week to answer questions.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): As the Leader of the House found an earlier question from the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) helpful, will he advise the House on whether the Foreign Secretary will be making a statement to the House next week? We have all been told that, in the near future, he is going to make various speeches in respect of flexibility in European Community developments, yet the House of Commons is to be denied the opportunity to question him. Of particular interest to me are the issues of structural funds and cohesion funds, because, under the auspices of the Secretary of State for Scotland, the Highlands and Islands Convention will be meeting in Stornoway on 3 March and it would be helpful if we could have some form of discussion about the Government's view of those matters.

Mr. Newton: Going slightly at a tangent, I take this opportunity to assure the hon. Lady that, after the difficulties that she felt were caused on an earlier occasion, I have carefully noted the date of the next meeting of the Highlands and Islands Convention. Having said that in a helpful and friendly spirit, I have to say that I do not know of any plans for a statement to the House by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary next week.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): May we have a debate next week on the important subject of libraries and their great value in respect of the education and recreation of our citizenry of all ages? That will give me an opportunity to raise in the House the threat to libraries in Ealing posed by Ealing's Labour council, which threatens to close Pitshanger library and curtail services in other libraries so as to save £300,000 out of a budget of no less than £250 million, which is a record budget for Ealing. The council is incompetent.

Mr. Newton: I sometimes think that my hon. Friend's observations about Ealing borough council could occupy every Wednesday morning from now until whenever and I must confine myself to encouraging him to apply for one of the slots.

Mrs. Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough): When the Leader of the House is considering a further statement or debate on the bovine spongiform encephalopathy crisis, will he ensure that that debate or statement contains a full presentation about the disposal of BSE waste? He will be aware that it is apparent from answers in Hansard that only 3.8 per cent. or 1.1 million of all the slaughtered cattle have been destroyed. The rest are stored all over the country in warehouses and cold storage. The House has never been given a proper statement about the escalating costs of storage, transportation and incineration of that waste and it is high time the Government put it on the record.

Mr. Newton: That is certainly a matter which the House has had opportunities to question my right hon. and learned Friend about on many occasions when statements have been made. Of the many logistical difficulties of this whole exercise, the disposal question has been among the most difficult. No one has made a secret of that. I shall bring the hon. Lady's remarks to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): If, as I hope, the Leader of the House is now considering a debate on the constitutional arrangements, may we include in it some reference to the progress of the English regions? People in my part of the world are now beginning to wake up to the fact that, if we have a regional assembly in Newcastle, not only will they pay a Geordie tax to Newcastle but they will be given the crumbs from Newcastle's table when everything from London is filtered through the regional assembly sitting 40 miles away.

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend is right to say that the confusion and dangers of much that the Opposition say on the constitution are not confined to the issues previously raised in relation to Scotland. They underline the case being made for a debate.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On Thursday 16 January, Mr. Mohamed Al Fayed went far further on television during a "Dispatches" programme than he has ever gone before. May we have a statement next week in defence of the good name of us all? This goes beyond a party matter. The leader of the House should watch a video of what was said because the statements that were made brought us all into disrepute. It is simply not good enough for the Leader of the House to say that the matter is being looked at. It is like the Dickensian circumlocution office, because a number of the right hon. Gent's colleagues want to know whether what was said was true. If it was, something had better be done about it; if it was not, our good name should be protected. That is a duty of the Leader of the House.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that, in one sense, his question puts me in a little difficulty because it has been the convention for many years that, as Leader of the House, I am also Chairman of the Committee on Standards and Privileges, which is examining cases that interrelate with what I understand was on the "Dispatches" programme. The hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) is also a member of the Standards and Privileges Committee and she will agree that the right course is to ensure that the Committee's attention is drawn to the hon. Gentleman's remarks so that it can consider them.

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the gastronomical and cultural disaster that faces countrymen of ours right across Europe? I refer to the haggis ban by the European Community. Is he aware that the haggis consists mainly of sheepmeat? Will he find time for a debate to discuss the merits of French frog legs and snails, or German rubber sausages, compared with the juicy, succulent haggis?

Mr. Newton: This sounds like dangerous territory for an English man to get involved in, so I shall confine myself to saying that I hope that, as normally happens to me annually, I shall have the chance to enjoy some haggis at the Burns night celebration in my constituency.

Ms Jean Corston (Bristol, East): Will the Leader of the House find time for a debate on the subject of early-day motion 434?

[That this House notes the Government's decision to suspend the General Household Survey for 1997; notes that this survey has provided essential national information annually about how society is changing not available in such rich variety from any other source and which accounted for 27 tables selected for inclusion in the Government's own key report Social Trends 1996

covering trends in household size, patterns of family building and dislocation, contraception, school-leavers and adults with GCSE grades A-C, membership of occupational and personal pension schemes, consumer durables in the home, visits to dentists, cigarette smoking, alcohol consumption, kind of help given by carers, unpaid services given voluntarily, mobility aids for the elderly, dwelling tenure by ethnic group and occupation, tenure one year after divorce, underoccupation and overcrowding, use of car, activities in the home, and participation in sport, games and physical activities; finds that the consultation period for this decision was 20th December 1996 to 3rd January 1997, covering the Christmas period and when the House was in recess; and urges the Government to restore the GHS on a regular annual basis in 1998.]It concerns the Government's decision to suspend publication of the "General Household Survey", a unique survey of 10,000 households. In the introduction to the last survey, two major users were described the Government for policy formulation and public sector organisations for measuring change. The survey was also the source of 27 tables or sections in the 1996 edition of "Social Trends". To add insult to injury, the consultation period for that decision was 20 December to 3 January, when the House was not sitting, most people were away for the Christmas holiday and Government Departments, research and university departments were closed. Was that done because the Government do not want people to see the evidence of how people's life chances have been betrayed by the Government? It is important that we discuss the matter, so that the household survey can be restored as soon as possible.

Mr. Newton: I am sure that the hon. Lady's words will be carefully examined. I understand that the decision by the Office for National Statistics was taken in the light of an overall consideration of users' needs for social survey data. The introduction of several new household surveys in recent years means that we are now better informed than ever about social conditions.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Will my right hon. Friend call for an early debate on EDM 383?

[That this House welcomes the RSPCA's review of the United Kingdom's system of quarantine and rabies control; notes that the review concluded that rabies vaccines are now very effective and failure rates are minute, blood tests to check that the vaccine is effective are now standardised, international standards for microchips have now been agreed, there has been no proven case of rabies in quarantine in the United Kingdom in the last 25 years, the EU rabies eradication programme has reduced the rabies-infected area in Western Europe to only 130 square miles, Sweden, which introduced a system of vaccination, blood testing and permanent identification in 1995, has reported no health or security problems, the costs and inconvenience of quarantine lead many pet owners to smuggle animals into the United Kingdom, there are no statutory welfare standards for quarantine kennels and in a recent NOP survey, 86 per cent. of people said they would accept an alternative system to quarantine if it was scientifically proven to keep the United Kingdom rabies-free; supports the RSPCA view that a system of vaccination, blood testing and permanent identification for cats and dogs from EU countries which are recognised by the World Health Organisation as being rabies-free in those species would provide the United Kingdom with equal, if not greater protection against rabies as quarantine; and therefore calls upon Her Majesty's Government to commission a full-scale risk assessment and full economic audit to determine how a different system could be effectively implemented to maintain the United Kingdom's rabies-free status.] Does he accept that the present rules in respect of quarantine for dogs are unkind to their owners, unkind to the animals and unnecessary. An early debate would be well received by both sides of the House.

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend will know that the Government announced in November that our rabies policy was being reviewed. Work is continuing, and it would be more appropriate to consider a debate when that work has been completed.

Mr. Edward O'Hara (Knowsley, South): Will the Leader of the House find time for an urgent debate on the future of the car industry in Britain, consequent upon Ford's recent announcement that it intends to shed 1,300 jobs at the Halewood factory in my constituency? The implications are extremely serious. Apart from those 1,300 jobs, a further 3,200 jobs at Halewood may be in jeopardy in the near future, not to mention the gearbox plant there, and 10,000 or more jobs at Ford's plants elsewhere in the country. Ford, the leader in car sales in Britain, will end up importing three of the four best-selling models, at a cost of several billion pounds to the balance of trade. That demonstrates that the vaunted policy of easy inward investment, especially in the car industry, is also easy go.

Mr. Newton: While I understand why the hon. Gentleman raises the matter, and why several Merseyside Members did so last week, I should say firmly that the totality of car investment decisions taken and announced recently, including that by Nissan, makes it clear that the car industry has a good future in this country—significantly better than it had 17 or 18 years ago, when the Government came into office. The hon. Gentleman will know that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry has agreed to meet a delegation of local Members of Parliament, local authorities and trade union delegates to discuss further the concerns that have been expressed about Halewood.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: May I support the earlier call for a debate on the financial crisis at Kent county council? My constituents are in uproar at the proposals by the Labour and Liberal Democrat coalition running Kent county council that there should be cuts of 34 per cent. in the adult education budget, 34 per cent. in the youth budget, 3 per cent. off primary schools and 7 per cent. off secondary schools—all that at a time when the Government have made available an extra £22.5 million, which means an extra 3.6 per cent. on the funding for education. During that debate it should be pointed out that Labour finance spokesmen in the House have said that they do not need more money. Let us reflect on what would happen if the Labour party was in government.

Mr. Newton: I certainly acknowledge that the speech by the shadow Chancellor earlier this week undermines—to put it mildly—the usual lines of argument by Labour-controlled local authorities, no doubt including Kent. As I understood the sedentary interruptions earlier, efforts have already been made to stage a Wednesday morning debate. I am sure that you, Madam Speaker, will bear in mind the obvious concern that is felt in Kent.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Will the Leader of the House reflect on the fact that all 16 Members of Parliament in Kent are Conservatives? Will he take on board the concerns of many of my colleagues on Kent county council who are very angry about the way in which their affairs are being grossly misrepresented in Parliament by Conservative Members? They, too, want to see a debate so that the full story about the financial position of Kent county council may be revealed, their words may be heard and justice may be served in allocating money to the precious services that they are trying so valiantly to protect.

Mr. Newton: As you will realise, Madam Speaker, there is cross-party support for a debate on Kent. That will not necessarily influence the position, but I am sure that it will be noted.

Madam Speaker: As soon as I get to my office I shall look to see whether an application has been made for an Adjournment debate, as I also heard the comment from a sedentary position.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): May we have a debate on the interesting idea of expanding the cadet forces? If such a debate were to take place, would the Government articulate their view that it is quite appropriate for suitable and trained youngsters to acquire military and firearms skills? Would the Government argue also that, when those youngsters leave the cadet forces, they would be encouraged to join the many institutions in this country whose constitutions state specifically that they are set up to instruct young people about firearms skills—namely, the 2,000 registered gun clubs across Britain?

Mr. Newton: I echo the words of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister who said that participation in cadet forces gives young people the opportunity to develop qualities of leadership, responsibility, self-reliance and the like. I would want to continue to encourage such development.

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): May I strongly support what the Leader of the House has said. I was a national serviceman and I am very proud of the fact that I completed my two years' service—unlike a certain member of the Cabinet who ran away from his obligations to his country. We would therefore contribute to a debate with some authority, and I hope that it will take place soon.

Mr. Newton: Should such a debate take place, I would look forward to the hon. Gentleman's contribution.

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): May I press my right hon. Friend to hold a debate on the terms and conditions of employment of public sector employees in light of the shadow Chancellor's implausible pledges on public spending and public sector pay, and the trade unions' veiled threats of a new winter of discontent. Those threats are made all the more potent by the experience in my county of Hereford and Worcester where Unison is taking the county council Lib-Lab pact to court for the shocking mistreatment of its employees, which has prompted a leading Labour councillor, Adrian Gregson, to say that his members were better off under the Tories.

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend makes yet another plea for what I shall call a locally directed debate. I always bear in mind such requests, but I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the possibilities that exist for debate on Wednesday mornings.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Will the Leader of the House allow time for a statement or debate about the operation of the cold weather payments scheme? The southern half of my constituency is served by the Nottingham weather station, which triggered one severe weather payment during the recent cold spell. The northern half of my constituency is served by the Leeds weather station, which did not trigger any such payments. Just over the border, the neighbouring constituency to the north is served by the Waddington weather station, which triggered two payments during the recent cold spell. People who live five miles apart cannot understand why some of them get one payment while others get two, and those in the middle cannot understand why they get none at all.

Mr. Newton: As I think I said last week in response to one of my hon. Friends, the suitability of weather stations in respect of that scheme is reviewed annually, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's representations will be taken into account as part of that.

Mr. Tony Banks: May I add my voice to the clamour for a debate on the cadet forces? Unlike the Prime Minister, I served my nation when at school by joining the Air Training Corps, where I became a sergeant, and I think the whole House can see the mess that it made of me. We do not need any lectures on the desirability of the cadet forces from a trio of white-feathered "jobbies" in the form of the Prime Minister, the Deputy Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Defence. Would not it be better, if we have that debate, to encourage our children to join the woodcraft folk, so that they can learn to love their fellow creatures rather than how to shoot them?

Mr. Newton: I am left slightly open-mouthed by the hon. Gentleman's description of his youth, which appears to bear little relationship to his adulthood, except, perhaps, that he learnt the qualities of resourcefulness and endurance, which were among those on my list. There are many other excellent organisations, including the scouts and the guides and their associated groups, and many others as well, and none of us would wish to do anything other than encourage them. Before anybody asks me, I did not join the cadet force, because I went to a Quaker school that did not have one.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): May I return yet again to my non-political subject of last week? Bearing in mind the fact that the hon. Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) is shortly to introduce the Bill of the late Lord Houghton, which twice went through the other place, I ask the Leader of the House to prevail on his colleagues to give that Bill some assistance through the House during the current Parliament, as it brings into effect many of the proposals contained in the Home Affairs Select Committee's report on dogs, and it would be both a tribute to the late Lord Houghton and a great service to the canine population of this country, which needs some protection.

Mr. Newton: I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary will take careful note of the hon. Gentleman's observations.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): When can we debate the report of the Parliamentary Office of Science and Technology on nano-technology? This is the technology that will delight and provide jobs for our grandchildren and our great-grandchildren. Britain had a worldwide lead in this, yet the Government have cancelled research and broken up the nano-technology forum. Will not future generations look at this Parliament and say that we were mad, because we are spending £60 million on a symbol of the nation's pride in the last century and refusing to spend £4 million on what could be the nation's pride in the next century?

Mr. Newton: I have not had an opportunity to study the report to which the hon. Gentleman refers, but I shall ensure that I obtain a copy and look at it.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): May we have an early debate on the crisis in further education? Is the Leader of the House aware that, in my constituency, Nelson and Colne college decided yesterday to make redundant no fewer than 37 teachers and lecturers? Is he further aware that, since incorporation in 1992, one post in every five in further education has been lost? The Governments's own chief inspector said in the annual report last year that the drift towards part-time work in colleges was seriously damaging standards. If we cannot have an early debate on that, what on earth can we have a debate on?

Mr. Newton: I cannot promise an early debate, again for reasons that I have touched on several times. The hon. Gentleman will no doubt have noted that the Education and Employment Secretary is due to answer questions next Wednesday, and I shall bring that possible debate to her attention.

Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle): Can my right hon. Friend advise me whether, during the business that he announced to the House for next week, there will be an opportunity for me to raise in some detail the case of, Mrs. Sherratt, a constituent of mine who, regrettably, was shot and paralysed by an off-duty policeman while on holiday in Morocco? The Moroccan Government have refused to accept any responsibility for the actions of their police officer. I wish to raise this matter in some detail in the House.

Mr. Newton: It is obviously the sort of matter that, under certain circumstances, could be raised on a Wednesday morning. There is a great deal of pressure for such debates. Indeed, Wednesday mornings have been a considerable success. Apart from that, I think that the right course would be for me to ensure that my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary has his attention drawn to my hon. Friend's concerns.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I hesitate to add your burdens, and I certainly make no complaint about being snuffed out during Question 4 to the Home Office, but could I ask that, over the weekend, you have brought to your attention what was said by Mohamed Al Fayed that Thursday evening, 16 January? This is far beyond a party matter. It reflects on the good name or otherwise of the House of Commons. You, Madam Speaker, have a stake in that, to put it mildly. All I am asking is that you obtain the video and make a judgment for yourself. If you decide to make a statement, that is Madam Speaker's judgment. At least you should be formally alerted to the situation. More than a million people up and down the country saw what happened, and they were left open-mouthed.

Madam Speaker: I listened attentively to the hon. Gentleman's question to the Leader of the House a few moments ago on that matter. I am sensitive to the points that he makes, and I shall take every opportunity to defend the honour of the House. I shall reflect over the weekend on what he said. He may find that I shall come back to the House next week on those matters.

BILL PRESENTED

Police and Firemen's Pensions

Mr. Secretary Howard presented a Bill to amend the Police Pensions Act 1976 and the Fire Services Act 1947 so as to make provision in respect of transfer values and other lump sum payments and permit police and fire authorities to provide information relating to pension schemes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed [Bill 78].

Orders of the Day

Finance Bill

(Clauses Nos. 40, 62, 68, 82 and 92 and Schedules Nos. 7 and 13.)

Further considered in Committee.

[MR. MICHAEL MORRIS in the Chair]

Clause 40

GROUPS CONTAINING BODIES OF DIFFERENT DESCRIPTIONS

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

4.18 pm

Ms Dawn Primarolo (Bristol, South): I would have wished to move amendment No. 8. Is that not in order? May I have some guidance, please?

The Chairman: That amendment was not selected. The debate is on clause 40 stand part.

Ms Primarolo: I am grateful for that information. I can make the points in this debate that I would have made on our amendment, had it been selected. I hope that that is in order.

The notes on clauses explain that clause 40 clarifies how members of VAT groups, who have a special status, are treated, and prevents potential tax avoidance. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his Budget statement on 26 November 1996, he made several important points that relate directly to this clause and to a number of others. He said:

"Inland Revenue tax experts will be redeployed to investigate even more rigorously how some big, sophisticated companies seem to pay so little tax. They will make sure that companies are paying what they owe, and what we"—

the Government—

"intended they should owe. . .

There will be more resources in the Revenue and Customs to stem the growth of the shadow economy . . . There will be more Customs and Excise officers to tackle value added tax and other tax abuse, including . . . more to target the smuggling of alcohol . . .

The 'spend to save' package will cost £80 million over the next three years to secure . . . revenue and expenditure savings of well over eight times that amount—£6.7 billion."—[Official Report, 26 November 1996; Vol. 286, c. 163.]

Given the Chancellor's explicit statements relating specifically to companies, I feel that we should seek further scrutiny of the arrangements to allow VAT groups of companies. I also seek an assurance that the Government have considered the possibilities for tax avoidance that may be created by the existence of such groups. Although we do not propose that the present arrangements should be disturbed at this stage, we think that an assessment should be made, as problems have occurred in the past.

In this and previous Finance Bills, the Government have expended considerable effort on trying to close VAT loopholes, some of which have been potential loopholes rather than giving rise to significant loss of revenue. At the same time, the Government have allowed VAT group treatment to continue virtually unchanged. In discussing the relationship during debates on previous Finance Bills, they have told us that this treatment of groups costs the taxpayer some £400 million, because VAT that would otherwise be chargeable has not been charged. Clause 40 addresses the position again.

It should be put on record that the amount of revenue that would be involved if the present arrangements were disturbed might not be £400 million for very long, because companies could reorganise themselves in order to realign their tax affairs. The withdrawal of VAT group treatment might well impose a greater administrative burden on both the taxpayer and Customs and Excise, and in that sense it would not be a sensible strategy. None the less, the arrangements should be scrutinised.

Clause 40 is designed to ensure that, when a VAT group includes a company that is entitled to zero rating or exemption as a result of some special status, that zero rating or exemption does not extend to the rest of the group. Special status companies include insurance companies, education institutions and charities. Customs describe the provisions as dealing with a potential problem. If he is in a position to disclose the information, I should be grateful if the Minister could explain the potential problem and say how much revenue may have been at risk.

Overall, clause 40 appears to achieve its objective, and seems unlikely to cause significant problems. Several universities rely on their education exemption not extending to their trading subsidiaries. The debate revolves around the loss of VAT receipts. The Government have had problems for several years in forecasting likely income from VAT receipts. It would be helpful if the Government could show that the group companies arrangement does not continue to provide loopholes.

Many clauses contain anti-avoidance provisions, which are especially important given the Minister's declared objectives. The previous Minister responsible for VAT, the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), wrote to me on the matter on 31 May 1996. I had sought an assurance on potential VAT anti-avoidance problems with the group relationships. He said:

"Customs give a high priority to anti-avoidance activities. A new Headquarters branch has been set up to co-ordinate anti-avoidance policy as a response to more aggressive tax planning and marketing of avoidance schemes. Additional resources have been deployed to enable the branch to monitor and evaluate new avoidance schemes and propose measures, including possible legislative changes, for countering them. The branch is supported by a national network of Tax Avoidance officers whose role is to identify and report avoidance schemes and to provide advice to local visiting staff."

So far, so good.

Specifically, the group relationship is being examined—big companies that make tax returns individually and, in particular, companies that are grouped for tax purposes. A shortfall of some £5.5 billion has been identified—no small amount—from three possible causes. The first is a shift in consumer spending; certainly the group relationship would give an opportunity to build on that. The second is an increase in tax avoidance, or, as it is politely called, tax planning. Thirdly, it could be straightforward non-compliance and evasion—the growth of the shadow economy.

As the Government have spent so much time and effort establishing the unit and explaining the problems of VAT collection, and given the considerable press speculation, we need more guidance from the Minister about why he does not intend to scrutinise the group arrangements more closely than is provided for in clause 40.

The issue of VAT receipts and companies' ability to minimise their obligations to pay VAT is building up considerable pressure, and not only because VAT is now set at 17.5 per cent. and is a significant revenue source. In his reply on clause 40, I should be grateful if the Minister would make a clear statement on VAT-grouped companies; on whether the Government will continue to monitor and investigate VAT relationships; on whether it may be necessary to revisit the issue of VAT groupings, on precisely which potential loophole clause 40 is intended to close, on how much revenue will be protected, and on whether alternative tax-planning strategies will be open to companies so that they can minimise payments to the Exchequer—which would only be bad for citizens.

4.30 pm

Mr. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood): Clause 40 is important because it provides the Committee with an opportunity to examine the issue of tax loopholes. The clause deals with

"Groups containing bodies of different descriptions"

and the way in which those groups are able to manipulate VAT payments. It also sets out the way in which loopholes or potential loopholes—perhaps in the insurance industry, or for educational institutions—could be closed. The sum involved—potentially £400 million—is not insignificant.

I was impressed by figures provided in the Red Book, on page 69, on the shortfall in VAT receipts. Halfway down the page, it states:

"VAT receipts in 1995-96 would have been £6 billion higher."

It also contains lengthy speculation—on which I should like the Minister to comment in his reply—on the various reasons why VAT receipts have been much lower than predicted.

The Red Book goes on to state:

"VAT receipts have picked up this year, and it looks likely that 1996-97 will see the first rise in the VAT/consumer spending ratio since the late 1980s".

I should be grateful if the Minister will confirm whether that is likely to happen.

Among the various reasons given by the Red Book for VAT receipts falling so far short of predictions, one is particularly applicable to clause 40. It states:

"better tax planning and increasing tax avoidance by companies"

is a significant factor. The clause potentially closes tax loopholes, but it leaves it open to companies to review the situation and to indulge in reorganisation. I suspect that tax planning consultants will give advice on that matter.

There is an interesting tension in that the Minister, his advisers and Customs and Excise are engaged in combat with a group of highly paid and well-organised professionals. I do not think that they would put it in those terms, but it is the reality. It is important that the Government have the people necessary to be on the winning team.

I was particularly interested in some comments that the Chancellor made in his Budget speech. He said that he recognised that there was a problem and that some measures needed reinforcing. He talked at some length about a range of "spend to save" initiatives, and said:

"As part of our continuing fight against tax and benefit fraud and tax loopholes, I am introducing a package of measures called "spend to save" . . . There will be more resources in the Revenue and Customs to stem the growth of the shadow economy . . . There will be more Customs and Excise officers to tackle value added tax and other tax abuse".—[Official Report, 26 November 1996; Vol. 286, c. 162-3.]

The Chancellor said that his proposals would cost the public purse £800 million, but would bring in eight times that amount—£6.7 billion.

I hope that the Minister will confirm that clause 40 will close the £400 million loophole, but the "spend to save" package is extremely ambitious—spending £800 million over three years to bring in £6.7 billion over three years will take a great deal of doing. I support the commitment—it is right that we should go for it—but it is an ambitious target, which, if not met, will leave a hole in the finances which will have to be filled by a future Government.

How many Customs and Excise staff will be working specifically on the technical issues of VAT avoidance? I am conscious of the fact that I am an outsider, a non-professional, but I read the financial press and I see the advertisements from and publicity surrounding VAT consultants. I am anxious about the impression given and the rewards that appear to accrue to such consultants' clients.

In summary, I support clause 40. I am pleased that the Government are closing the loophole, or the potential loophole. I believe that companies will employ experts to try to find a way around the proposal. It is right that we attempt to tackle fraud and abuse, but the targets that the Government have set themselves are very ambitious. I hope that they can be achieved, and I am pleased that resources are to be put into Customs and Excise to tackle the problem.

There seems to have been a real change in the Government's approach. In the past, they appeared content to allow Customs and Excise staff to decline in number, but there is now a change of emphasis—perhaps a recognition that civil servants such as Customs and Excise staff are valuable in dealing with this highly technical problem. I hope that the Government succeed, but I remain slightly sceptical.

Mr. Stephen Timms (Newham, North–East): I rise to support the amendment—

The Chairman: Order. If the hon. Gentleman had been here at the beginning, he would have noted that amendment No. 8 was not on the selection list; I clarified that point. I remind the hon. Gentleman that this is the clause stand part debate.

Mr. Timms: I am grateful to you, Mr. Morris, for that clarification.

I welcome the clause, because it signifies, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping) explained, a change of heart by the Government and a recognition that the hole in the VAT receipts is now the biggest threat to public finances and to control of the public sector borrowing requirement.

The clause is one of a small number of provisions aimed at improving the alarmingly poor rate of VAT collection. I hope that the Government will keep a close eye on its effects of the clause. As I understand it, Customs and Excise is saying, "This is a potential problem. We do not really know why the hole has appeared in VAT collection. This is one possibility, or one contributing factor." If we are to solve the problem, it is of the greatest importance that we watch carefully the effects of the clause and the other measures that are being taken to try to put the problem right.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood mentioned the "spend to save" initiative, which stands alongside the clause and is designed to try to tackle the problem. It is remarkable that the Red Book projects that, to secure about £2 billion from reduced fraud, about half a billion pounds of extra spending will be needed in social security—rather less than £200 million in the Inland Revenue, and just £100 million in Customs and Excise.

The Government anticipate that, for a very small amount of extra spending—£100 million—they will raise an extra £2 billion in VAT, which will be a welcome addition. I hope that the clause will contribute to that process. We are talking about a very small amount of extra spending, from which a large amount of extra revenue is anticipated. I hope that we shall keep the whole exercise under scrutiny to ensure that it goes in the right way, because the amounts involved are so large.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood suggested that many people have been wondering why it took the Government so long to realise that the problem had arisen, and why, as recently as last May, the then Paymaster General said that the Customs and Excise review would "enable it to reduce staffing levels while maintaining or improving outputs."—[Official Report, 16 May 1996; Vol. 277, c. 567.]

Clearly, that has not been the case, and the clause may be a sign that the Government are recognising the problem and doing something about it.

The Treasury has accepted, as part of the broader "spend to save" initiative, that it should publish data on the overall achievements of the initiative, monitoring spending and savings against the published targets. I hope that, in that spirit, the Government will accept that it will be valuable to monitor what happens as a result of the implementation of the clause—to monitor whether it helps to bring in some of the missing VAT revenue and to consider whether some other initiative is required as well to crack the problem.

The Exchequer Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Phillip Oppenheim): I warmly welcome the Opposition's support for our measures against VAT avoidance. In this bipartisan spirit, I am prepared, generously, to overlook their previous criticisms.

When we have closed loopholes, we have suddenly been accused of putting up VAT rates. That accusation was made, notably, in a leaflet produced by the Opposition entitled "Twenty-two tax increases". One "increase" was a loophole that we closed by imposing VAT on gold granules. Nevertheless, converts, however belated, are always welcome. The Opposition's support is part of their current fashion of poodling along behind us. That is something, in a generous spirit, that we all welcome.

The hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping) asked about the current position on VAT receipts. They are 10 per cent. up over the past year on current figures, which reflects the uplift in the economy, the effect of closing loopholes in the previous Budget, and the effect of measures in this Budget.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about the number of new staff who would be devoted to combating VAT avoidance. There will be 1,100 VAT staff, additional or retained, dealing with general high-profile cases and areas of VAT avoidance that we consider particularly sensitive. An extra 100 customs men and women will be put on specific fraud issues. That is quite a large increase over the previous estimated totals for the year.

4.45 pm

I am also delighted that the Opposition chose this particularly high-profile clause out of all the clauses they could have chosen for debate on the Floor of the House. The hon. Member for Bristol, South (Ms Primarolo) asked why clause 40 was necessary, and whether we had any indication that there might be avoidance problems in the area it covered.

It is part of good tax management to anticipate where problems may come from, and we had some indication from tax planners and tax lawyers that they might probe in this area. There were one or two cases in which the results were a little ambivalent, so we thought that it was good fiscal management to ensure that any loophole was closed in advance, although we do not have any evidence at the moment that there is any revenue loss. We estimate, however, that the revenue protection as a result of the clause will be £50 million, which is quite a significant sum.

The hon. Lady also asked why we were not doing more than introducing the clause. The answer is that we are doing more, because clause 41 also addresses potential group abuses. Last year, schedule 9A was designed to counter most of the existing group abuses and it appears to have succeeded. Obviously, one can sometimes move in advance of loopholes and close them, but sometimes it is not possible. Loopholes sometimes become apparent unexpectedly because, as the hon. Member for Sherwood rightly said, highly paid tax accountants and lawyers are swarming over company accounts and wanting to sell their services, and they come up with wheezes. As soon as they do, if we have not anticipated the loopholes, we try to close them.

The hon. Member for Bristol, South and some of her hon. Friends went a little further, and asked why we could not get rid of the group concession altogether. She asked whether we should not scrutinise the matter more closely; I think that that was the purpose of amendment No. 8, which was not called.

Ms Primarolo: I would like to clarify that point, because I would not like the Minister to mislead the Committee. I asked whether the Government had scrutinised the question whether VAT groups, which were provided under the existing arrangements, were in themselves opportunities for avoidance. If the Minister checks the Hansard record tomorrow, he will see that I was not proposing that the groups should be disturbed now.

Mr. Oppenheim: I am sensitive to the hon. Lady's sensitivities in this area; they are very touching. The Opposition should not—[Interruption.] Would the hon. Lady like to make that comment again at the Dispatch Box in exactly the same terms as she made it just now?

Ms Primarolo: The debate would be helped enormously if we could conduct it in a grown-up fashion. I do not wish to trade insults with the Minister, and I hope that he does not wish to do so with me.

Mr. Oppenheim: As I said, I have noted the hon. Lady's sensitivities. She stood at the Dispatch Box and was quite critical of Government policy. It is reasonable for a Minister to probe the Opposition about what their policies are and to point out that the hon. Lady said in her opening remarks that we should look at the possibility of changes to the group concessions that we have given.

My response, if the hon. Lady will listen to it rather than trading insults that she is, understandably, not prepared to confirm from the Dispatch Box, is this. We constantly scrutinise the position of groups, and where we think abuses are happening, we will close the loopholes. That is precisely what clauses 40 and 41 are about. If the hon. Lady thinks that there is scope to go further—if she will listen to the response to her question—she should make it clear to the Committee. We will make available any information she wants with regard to this matter. If it is the Opposition's policy to go further, they should make it absolutely clear.

The Government do not at the moment want to go further than closing the potential loopholes described in clauses 40 and 41, because the facility was originally introduced to provide administrative advantages, giving businesses an alternative to organising themselves on a divisional basis. The VAT position of a company organised in divisions and a group of companies should therefore be the same.

Steps could be taken to remove companies that are involved in exempt or partially exempt businesses from groups, because that is, as was rightly identified, an area of revenue loss. The likely reaction, however—it is likely in all sectors except, possibly, insurance—is that businesses and organisations will respond by vertically integrating to achieve a position similar to a single entity organised on a divisional basis. That will almost certainly wipe out any revenue gain.

It would be very difficult to argue that that is not a legitimate business move rather than a tax-avoiding move. To keep regulation to a minimum, and on the grounds that such a measure would be particularly onerous to business and especially difficult practically to act on, we have decided to go no further than the proposals in clauses 40 and 41.

The other point of which Opposition Members should be mindful is that many of the groups involved are not businesses—although some of them are in the insurance sector. Many are charities and educational institutions. That is why we are very keen to tread very sensitively.

Clause 40 clarifies how members of VAT groups who have a special status are treated, and prevents possible tax avoidance. The VAT liability of some supplies is dependent on the status of the person providing those supplies. For example, a supply of insurance is exempted only if provided by a permitted insurer. Where such a body is the representative member of a VAT group, some tax planners have suggested, as I said, that the status should be automatically passed to other members of the group.

If that were to be so, businesses would be able to reorganise their affairs so that the VAT reliefs associated with the representative member of a VAT group could be shared by all other group members, to the detriment of the Exchequer and the public services that it finances. It would also be contrary to the original intention of grouping provisions. The measure is designed to clarify the current position, close potential opportunities for abuse, and therefore, in effect, maintain and reinforce the status quo.

Ms Primarolo: May I put on record our acceptance of the Minister's kind offer to supply us with whatever information we require during the course of our deliberations in Committee on the clauses on VAT and potential loopholes? I am sure that it will assist greatly in our deliberations.

Mr. Oppenheim: The offer that I made the hon. Lady—I can understand why she wants to expand the concession into a major loophole—is of further information on the situation regarding groups, as described in clauses 40 and 41, with a view to changing her policy to take away the group concession. We would supply any information in relation to that—

Ms Primarolo: No.

Mr. Oppenheim: More generally, any reasonable request for information will not be refused.

Ms Primarolo: Another Tory promise has already been broken. The Minister made his offer when I gave way to him during my earlier speech.

Consistency is a wonderful quality, which politicians do not always display. I remind the Minister that, in Standing Committee D on 14 March 1995, his predecessor said that there was no need for extra Customs and Excise staff, and that, as the Government, they could maintain and improve the collection of revenue with fewer staff rather than more. The Opposition are very pleased that it has now been agreed that we were right last year to say that resources were needed.

This debate is important, despite the bristling between the Minister and me, which I am sure will develop and illuminate the Committee. I hope that it will not deter us from proper scrutiny of the Bill, with which the House charges us.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 40 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 68 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 7

SPECIAL TREATMENT FOR CERTAIN DISTRIBUTIONS

Sir Robert Hicks (South-East Cornwall): I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 137, line 34, at end insert

'in relation to distributions made on or after 5 December 1996'.

The Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to take amendment No. 9, in schedule 7, page 141, line 25, at end insert—

'13. Paragraphs 4, 5, 6, and 10 above shall not apply to any distribution unless the transaction in securities is carried out for bona fide commercial reasons and does not form part of a scheme or arrangement of which the main purpose, or one of the main purposes, is the obtaining of a tax advantage.'.

Sir Robert Hicks: The purpose of amendment No. 10 is to clear up any confusion that may have arisen over the date of implementation of the proposed new arrangements for the tax treatment of certain distributions where a company purchases its own shares. I must emphasise that I have no quarrel with the Government's proposals for such a change in tax policy. The genuine confusion, and with it a suggestion of retrospection, was drawn to my attention by a family-owned company that has a major investment in my constituency. Indeed, it is the largest single employer.

The company acted in a totally legitimate manner under the previous arrangements, and it was not until the draft legislation was published on 5 December 1996 that it realised that the specific provisions might be applied retrospectively and a tax liability therefore imposed that could be damaging to its business and future investment plans. On the basis of clarity and equity, I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to accept the amendment.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I am delighted to support my parliamentary neighbour the hon. Member for South–East Cornwall (Sir R. Hicks). He and I share not only a boundary but the distinction and responsibility of representing the two bakeries of Ginsters Ltd., which manufactures, as everybody in the House will know, the best-known Cornish pasties in the world. The business is extremely important to us. It also manufactures a number of other products, including custard pies. I shall leave it to the House to determine whether it is appropriate that the hon. Gentleman should represent one product and I the other.

The issue is extremely important, although, as the hon. Member for South–East Cornwall said, it is very technical and appears to apply to very few people. It has the unfortunate effect of applying retrospectively at precisely the moment when the company—Samworth Brothers Holdings Ltd.—had thought that it had obtained clearance from the Inland Revenue for appropriate treatment of the business that it wished to undertake. A press release gave the business confidence that there was no problem, and it proceeded with the transaction only to find that, when the draft legislation was published, its effect was precisely the opposite of what the business and its financial advisers had anticipated.

I am delighted that the Government are minded to respond positively to the amendment, which I am sure will be welcome. As the hon. Member for South–East Cornwall said, the business is extremely important to our part of Cornwall. Indeed, it is a flagship business for Cornish products generally.

I should like to draw the Committee's attention to an article that appeared in Taxation on 2 January, which emphasised that although the issue was a minor one, it raised important wider implications. The author of the leading article said:

"To my mind, if we are now entering an era in which tax rules are changed retrospectively without announcement, there is not really any point in having any rules at all in the first place. The idea of tax legislation is to tell people what tax they owe and on what date. If the legislation no longer does that, we may as well abandon our sophisticated and refined system and simply have the Revenue send round heavy boys periodically to relieve people of as much of their wealth as possible."

I acknowledge that Treasury Ministers have responded swiftly to the concerns that have been expressed on behalf of the company and I hope that the Minister will be able to assure us that problem was an unfortunate oversight rather than an attempt to get away with something that the House would deplore.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I believe that the paragraph from Taxation that the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) read out is, if I may say so, a slight exaggeration. The problem is not exclusively Cornish and I have received a letter from a company in Nottinghamshire that said that its family-owned business would be severely hit by the retrospective and unannounced nature of the proposals. It continues:

"Clearance had been obtained from the Inland Revenue for my Companies to buy their own shares but no mention was made of a charge on the Trustees for additional tax liability."

5 pm

Only one issue of principle arises—albeit an important one—because it was not clear, when the Inland Revenue press release was published on 8 October, that the change would take place or take place on that date. It was not clear until 5 December, by which time another Inland Revenue press release had been issued. I have always been concerned that tax legislation should not contain any element of retrospection. It is not fair on tax payers who need to have a clear understanding about the tax consequences of their decisions. They cannot do that if announcements are made subsequently about changes that will take place retrospectively. We are talking only about a few weeks but a number of taxpayers are affected and I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to respond positively to the representations he has received.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): I wish to speak briefly in support of amendment No. 10. The hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) quoted from the article in Taxation on 2 January 1997. Later the article says:

"with self assessment being imminent . . . taxpayers will have to volunteer their own tax liabilities. They are far more likely to do so fairly and conscientiously if they consider that the tax regime is itself imposed by fair and proper means."

That brings me to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) about retrospection in tax legislation. There should be no retrospection in tax legislation, otherwise none of us knows where we are and nobody can make their tax planning dispositions.

Samworth Brothers is one of the most pre-eminent companies in the food manufacturing industry in this country. Mr. Samworth, whose letter was mentioned by the hon. Member for North Cornwall, won this year's Massey-Ferguson award for agriculture and gave a most impressive presentation when he accepted that award. He demonstrated how his company, which I have known of for many years, has grown and grown to become a pre-eminent company in the meat industry. It provides a good example to many other British companies. I have no doubt that the company's planning of its financial and tax affairs has been involved in its success story.

I hope that the Minister will agree that it would be wrong for the House to act retrospectively and I hope that he will accept the amendment.

Mr. Mike O'Brien (North Warwickshire): I hope that it will be for the convenience of the Committee—if you agree, Mr. Morris—if we have a wide-ranging discussion on the amendments and also schedule 7. In that case, we would not have to have a separate stand-part debate.

The Chairman: The Chairman is here to serve the Committee. We should have discussed that point at the beginning, but if all parties are happy for the general principle of schedule 7 to be incorporated in this debate, I am happy.

Mr. O'Brien: Thank you, Mr. Morris.

Amendment No.10 deals with the issue that arises in relation to cornish pasties and pork pies and the Minister must address it. There have been complaints not only from Samworth Brothers but from organisations such as the Law Society. I suppose I should declare an interest because I am a member of the Law Society, but I have no other interest in the matter. The Inland Revenue press releases appear to have misled certain people—innocently, I am sure. The Inland Revenue press release of 8 October 1996 said in paragraph 1 that "the income tax liability of taxpayers who receive such distributions will be unaffected by the change."

The second press release, on 26 November, went further and it said:

"the income tax liability of taxpayers who receive such distributions will be largely unaffected by the change."

The significance of the insertion of the word "largely" became clear only when the draft legislation was published on 5 December and it became clear that it will impose a new tax liability on trusts.

The Minister should explain the sequence of events behind the press releases. Why was it not made clear on 8 October that the Minister and the Inland Revenue intended to take the course of action that they later took? As a result, certain people arranged their tax affairs in a particular way and might, as a consequence, face a liability that might not have arisen if the Inland Revenue had clearly indicated what it intended to do. I hope that the Minister will deal with that issue today.

More broadly on schedule 7, share buy-backs and special dividends have been identified as a problem for some time. Much credit must go to my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West (Mr. Pearson), who has repeatedly pointed out to the Chancellor, in a series of letters and parliamentary questions, the abuse of the system of share buy-backs and special dividends. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for recognising the problem and putting pressure on at an early stage to ensure that the Treasury also recognised the difficulty. When my hon. Friend raised the issue in March with the Financial Secretary, he provided reassurances. In a letter to my hon. Friend, the Financial Secretary stated:

"The availability of a tax credit on a special dividend is not a tax loophole."

That begs the question of why the Government are now taking action. The definition of a tax loophole is a technicality, but surely creating opportunities for streaming is a loophole for all practical purposes.

The media became agitated by the way in which special dividends and share buy-backs have been used and major company takeovers that resulted in special dividend payments have highlighted the issue of tax-exempt shareholders receiving tax-exempt credits at the expense of the taxpayer. Articles in The Times and in the Lex column in the Financial Times have brought the inconsistencies in the system to public attention. In The Times on 18 August 1996, Graham Sargent wrote:

"Since the beginning of 1995, buy-backs have totalled some £4.8 billion. Those buy-backs cost the taxpayer more than £1 billion in tax subsidies in just 20 months."

Another example of these arrangements is Granada's bid for Forte, the loss to the taxpayer from which has been estimated at roughly £40 million. Special dividends have been widely used in the circumstances, and there are a number of estimates as to the total lost by the Inland Revenue during the past year as a result. I hope that the Financial Secretary will be able to state how much has been lost. It is right for the Treasury to examine this area as a tax issue, and we welcome the Government's decision to make changes to the treatment of share buy-backs and dividends. Our concerns are twofold: why did the Government not do this before, and why are they doing it in this way?

I shall return to a number of issues arising from the wording of the schedule in a moment. The amendment seeks to restrict access to exemptions to bona fide commercial arrangements and not those set up merely to avoid taxation. There may be circumstances in which share buy-backs and special dividends have market benefits, but the issue is whether they should be used merely to avoid tax. A legitimate use, for example, might be when a mature company with cash to spare has insufficient good investment opportunities. In such circumstances, it may be better for the surplus to go to the shareholders, who may divert it to other companies which could use the surplus more effectively.

A difficulty is that the tax rules regard dividends and share buy-backs as essentially the same thing, and treat them as the distribution of capital from a company. Companies are currently required to pay advance corporation tax on distributions at a rate of 20 per cent. on the gross dividend or 25 per cent. on the net dividend, which is the dividend paid less the ACT. Shareholders receive a dividend from the company together with a credit for the ACT paid, and UK taxpayers will pay tax on the gross dividend and can use the tax credit to offset their tax bill. Shareholders who pay income tax at the basic and lower rate pay no further tax on the dividend, and higher rate taxpayers pay an extra 20 per cent. on the gross dividend received.

Pension funds and other tax-exempt institutional shareholders may reclaim the ACT paid on dividends from the Inland Revenue by, in effect, cashing in their credit. In the financial year 1995-96, the Inland Revenue collected £23.6 billion in corporation tax, of which £9.9 billion was ACT. Tax-exempt pension funds and other institutional investors are the largest investors in UK equities or shares, so a substantial proportion of the ACT paid will be reclaimed. That will reduce the tax yield to the Inland Revenue.

The Government proposals in the schedule will have the effect of preventing shareholders from claiming back ACT where their company has paid it as part of any share buy-back, or as dividends paid in more limited special cases. A fundamental principle of UK company law, and of tax law as it applies to companies, is that all shareholders should be treated in the same way. However, prior to the Government's decision to deny the reclaiming of tax credits, various UK companies were engaging in schemes or arrangements where most of the shares offered for buy-backs were purchased by tax-exempt institutions. This practice is often referred to as streaming, and offends the principle of equal tax treatment for all shareholders. It also applies in many ways to special dividends.

The Lex column in the Financial Times on Wednesday 10 January 1996 reported:

"Granada's increased bid for Forte includes a helping hand from the Inland Revenue. The 47p special dividend Granada is proposing to pay from Forte's balance sheet comes with a 11.75p tax credit for tax-exempt institutions such as pension funds. These shareholders—who will determine the bid's outcome since they account for perhaps 50 per cent. of Forte's shares—will receive an extra £50 million or so from the Revenue if the bid succeeds."

"No public interest is served by a loophole that involves taxpayers subsidising corporate raiders."

The timing of the Government's initial announcement in October was prompted by a transaction proposed by Reuters that involved the creation of special shares which could have cost the taxpayer an estimated £150 million. However, instead of dealing directly with the problem of streaming, the Government have denied the reclaiming of tax credits on all share buy-backs, irrespective of whether the shares have been streamed or not. The rules are mandatory, and the Inland Revenue seems to have no discretion as to how to apply them.

5.15 pm

The clause is broadly defined, and there is some danger that the innocent may be caught with the guilty. I hope that the Minister can assure us about the way in which the scheme will be enforced. The scheme may affect company reorganisations and will create another layer of complex fiscal detail. Fiscal detail is sometimes necessary, but we should be careful not to indulge in the creation of fiscal detail for the sake of it, and full explanations will be needed from the Treasury. Companies will have to contend with complex provisions when they arrange their corporate financial affairs as a result of the schedule. It will provide income for lawyers and accountants, but may in effect frustrate many bona fide financial engineering projects within the City.

Mr. Tim Smith: What point is the hon. Gentleman trying to make? Who is he saying should decide whether a "financial engineering project"—as he described it—is bona fide or not?

Mr. O'Brien: My point relates to the provisions contained in section 703 of the Taxes Act 1988, which allowed the Inland Revenue to deal with issues of tax avoidance. The Revenue can look at particular mechanisms and ask whether they are geared towards tax avoidance or towards dealing with genuine commercial arrangements with a practical benefit. Why did the Government not get the Inland Revenue to look at whether the arrangements were bona fide? There may well be good reasons for that, but it remains to be seen whether the Minister can provide a justification for the course that has been taken. The House has a right to hear such a justification.

The Government have provided exemptions to clause 68 but have not sought to distinguish between bona fide operations and any abuse of the exemptions. Why do the Government believe that those in the City who, in a sense, abuse the current system will not abuse the proposed system by, for example, exploiting the exemptions for preference shares and pre-sale distributions? I hope that the Minister can reassure us on that.

The amendment denies the benefit of the exemptions to transactions that do not have commercial justification. Each case would be considered on its merits, and the Inland Revenue would be able to exercise discretion. Where the Inland Revenue and taxpayers agree, both would have recourse to the courts which would decide on the facts and the law in each case. The Red Book forecasts that the Government will save £200 million in 1997-98, rising to £400 million in 1998-99 and 1999-2000. The amendment might provide a little extra help for the taxpayer by increasing resources. It is difficult to gauge precisely how much will be raised, but ensuring that the exemptions are used only for bona fide purposes seems to be a good way to proceed.

I have a series of questions to which I hope the Minister can give me some answers. Why have the Government taken so long to tackle the problem? They knew about the special dividend issue when it arose in bids for several electricity companies back in 1995, as well as in the Lloyds-TSB merger. Surely the Minister could have acted to deal with the matter in the 1995 Budget. Why did it take a further year to take the necessary action? Surely the Treasury must have thought about it during the intervening period, so why did a subsequent complication arise as a result of the various press releases that were issued? That complication had a detrimental effect not only on Ginsters and Samworth Brothers, but various other people have complained to their accountants that they did not realise what would happen.

Even if action was not taken in the 1995 Budget, the Chancellor was aware of the abuse. Why was it not possible to use the powers in sections 703 to 709 of the Taxes Act 1988 to challenge the tax advantages from special dividends in takeovers? The respected Stephen Edge of Slaughter and May wrote an article in The Tax Journal on 10 October 1996 in which he questioned whether the current changes were necessary. He thought that section 703 of the 1988 Act enabled the Inland Revenue to act. Will the Minister clarify the position with regard to that section and explain why it was impossible to use it to deal with the issues that arose in various takeovers?

Why is schedule 7 so widely drawn? Why has it not been possible better to target the abuses? Accountants and lawyers will do very well as they work out the meaning of paragraph 1(3)(a), especially the meaning of

"was . . . referrable (in some way and to any extent) to, or to the carrying out of, a transaction in securities".

[Mr. O'Brien]

Is it the intention that United Kingdom tax exempts should never qualify for ACT refund on share buy-backs? Are we not left with a complex schedule with an uncertain meaning? Will the Minister confirm that the legislation requires to say on the dividend voucher whether the distribution is affected by that legislation? That may prove difficult.

The schedule may create uncertainty because the scope of the wording is too complex and difficult to understand. It requires that companies should prejudge the outcome of any difficulty or complexity before they can issue any dividend. A company is prevented from paying up and arguing later with the Inland Revenue about whether it is covered by the schedule. If that is so, it is likely that mistakes will be made.

Are we not in danger of creating an extra burden on businesses, many of which are not large but may still be affected by the terms of the schedule? Should we not have dealt with the issue of complexity with more care?

A judgment must be made about the dividend voucher before the dividend is issued. What is the penalty for getting it wrong? I have been unable to discover it, but perhaps the Minister can let us know.

The Labour party strongly supports action to tackle the abuse of share buy-backs and special dividends for the purposes of tax avoidance. My hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West deserves credit for repeatedly warning the Treasury about that abuse. We are concerned about the Government's failure to act earlier and the complexity of the method used to tackle the problem. The schedule adds yet a further layer of complexity to an already complex system of corporation tax. It follows other fundamental changes to the imputation system, which have been passed in recent years, such as the decoupling of ACT and the basic rate of income tax and the introduction of foreign income dividends.

The system will become yet more complex because of the schedule and because the income tax and corporation tax structures have changed significantly since the introduction of the imputation system in 1993. Is it not therefore time to consider whether we can simplify that complex system as soon as possible?

I should like to ask the Minister a few questions of a more technical nature, although I accept that he may be unable to answer them immediately. If so, perhaps he can write to me and ensure that those answers are published because the current proposals have led to a number of confusions. Can the Minister confirm that foreign recipients will not be able to claim tax credit repayments on the double taxation agreements? If so, can the Minister explain why such shareholders would be affected in that way?

Can the Minister say whether the words "made to" in paragraph 1(3) in relation to the scope of special rules for trustees referred to in sub-paragraph (4) mean that the provisions apply to bear trusts and not to just to qualifying distributions belonging to the trustees? As for the meaning of payment, can he explain whether the term "payment" in paragraph 1(2) covers payments in kind as well as payments in cash? That uncertainty might create an opportunity for abuse, so I hope that the Minister can clarify that.

As for the meaning of arrangements in paragraph 6(2), can the Minister explain whether the word "arrangement" means any agreement or understanding whether or not it is legally enforceable? On the extent of transactions in securities, can the Minister explain whether the phrase "transaction in securities" in paragraph 1(3)(a) could include the payment of the dividend? Can he clarify the meaning of the words "by virtue of which" and "made referrable to" in paragraph 1(3), which seem to add to the confusion? Can the Minister cite some examples to illustrate the strength or laxity of those important connecting words?

On the scope of exclusion for pre-sale dividends, can the Minister explain the basis of the 14-day limitation in paragraph 6? Why should a dividend that is paid more than 14 days before a sale be regarded as more offensive than one that is paid within that 14-day window? That difference may be academic, but we are here to clarify such details. It is important that we do so because a lot of people will read the answers in Hansard.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Michael Jack): We will be here all night.

Mr. O'Brien: I hope not.

The schedule also has the odd effect that the longer the time the dividend is paid prior to sale, the more likely it is to be safe. It will not be referrable to the later sale. As the time lapse shortens, the risk gradually increases, until at 14 days it suddenly drops to nil. That does not seem logical. I appreciate that the Minister may not be able to deal with all those questions, but I want to place them on record so that answers are given to aid those who will have to deal with the issue later.

Can the Minister advise us whether for the purposes of relief as set down in paragraph 6, it is necessary that the sale should have been completed by the end of the 14 days?

We have sought to clarify the meaning of a complex set of provisions. We also want to strengthen them. The Government are tackling the right issue, but we have doubts about their methods. The Minister must answer some important questions about the effects of the press releases. The points that were raised by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) are important and I hope that the Minister will be able to deal with them. He must deal with those problems—and not just in terms of retrospective legislation. There is also the question of the press releases and whether or not the Inland Revenue properly clarified what it intended to do.

If the Committee wishes, I shall later move amendment No. 9 formally and seek to commend it as one that will add strength and clarity to the schedule.

5.30 pm

Mr. Ian Pearson (Dudley, West): My speech will fall into three parts: first, schedule 7 and the general principle behind it; amendment No. 10; and, finally, amendment No. 9.

Clause 68 and schedule 7 tell a story—

The Chairman: Order. We have finished with clause 68 and are now debating schedule 7.

Mr. Pearson: Thank you, Mr. Morris.

Schedule 7 tells a story that I have been highlighting, as my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien) said, for well over a year. It is the all too familiar story of Government dithering, denial and delay followed by climbdown and belated action. That is pretty much par for the course with this Government, but what marks out this case is the fact that their negligence has cost the hard-pressed taxpayer, by my calculation, £1.75 billion in lost revenue, and possibly more.

On the face of it, schedule 7 provides a number of technical amendments to be made to the treatment of certain distributions by companies. They apply to purchases by companies of their own shares and other distributions, mainly special dividends, which are linked to transactions in securities. The decision to make the changes was sneaked out on 8 October—no doubt coincidentally, but certainly conveniently, during the Conservative party conference. It did not, therefore, receive much publicity; it would probably not have received much coverage anyway. The subject of the operation of the imputation system of taxation and its effect on tax-exempt institutions does not interest the average person in the street and would not grab the imagination of the popular press, but if the story had been headlined, "Ken throws away nearly £2 billion of taxpayers' money"—which is what has happened—perhaps the tabloids would have been interested.

Mr. Tim Smith: The hon. Gentleman has twice said that there has been a huge haemorrhaging of revenue. Does he agree that, if the rules that are now proposed had been in place, the companies would not have behaved in the same way? It is unrealistic to think that, if there is a major change in the law, it does not influence people's behaviour. It is nonsense to suggest that a great deal of revenue was lost.

Mr. Pearson: Surely the hon. Gentleman is aware that the estimated cost savings—on the Treasury's own assumptions—to be made from introducing the Bill will be £200 million in the next financial year and £400 million the year afterwards. Substantial savings are predicted even if people's behaviour has been modified as a result of the change.

If the headlines had been, "Ken throws away nearly £2 billion of taxpayers' money", the tabloids would, rightly, have been interested in what happened. The sum being thrown away by the Government is the approximate equivalent of 1p off the basic rate of income tax—or about the total amount that has been given out in grants to good causes since the national lottery began. That money has been needlessly squandered by the Government when it could have been well spent on improving education and the health service.

We are talking about an abuse of the taxation system or, put differently, a tax loophole—something that the Chancellor always denies exists, but later takes action over. The loophole has been consistently pointed out to the Government by the Opposition. In this instance, it consists of a range of smart schemes that have been drawn up by corporate financiers and which favour the big pension funds at the expense of other shareholders. It has cost the taxpayer millions each time for each deal and it has distorted competition in takeovers.

The loophole was becoming known when the 1995 Finance Bill was passing through the House of Commons, and it was apparent long before the drafting of the 1996 Act. Selective share buy-backs were increasingly used by large companies through 1995 and, as my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire said, the use of special dividends was common in the water and electricity industries. Special dividends were also used in other situations, such as Lloyds bank's bid for TSB and, more recently, Granada's takeover of Forte last year.

It has already been mentioned that many respected financial commentators, such as Lex in the Financial Times and Graham Searjeant in The Times, graphically pointed out the abuse. On 10 January last year, the Financial Times, not for the first time, talked about "the special dividend wheeze and its close cousin the share buyback".

It said that

"no public interest is served by a loophole that involves taxpayers subsidising corporate raiders."

Labour Members, both here and in the other place, highlighted the abuse. I tabled a number of parliamentary questions on special dividends and raised the subject on the Second Reading of the Finance Bill. I even went so far as to table amendments to the Bill to alter sections 703 to 706 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988. That was a clear sign to Ministers that something was wrong, but no attention was paid and the scandal of the abuse of share buy-backs and special dividends was allowed to continue.

The Government's response was to deny the problem. The Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who has unfortunately slipped out of the Chamber for a moment—he probably has an inkling of what is to come—in a parliamentary answer dated 1 February 1996 said:

"The payment of a special dividend does not involve a tax loophole."—[Official Report, 1 January 1996; Vol. 270, c. 862.]

Owing to the Minister's dithering and denial, the use of share buy-backs and special dividends escalated. Figures from Kleinwort Benson demonstrate that quoted companies cut their equity capital by £3 billion from the start of the last calendar year to the end of July alone through selective buy-backs.

The cost to the Exchequer has been an estimated £750 million. That loss could easily have been avoided by a half-competent Government. So, too, could the £50 million or so that the Revenue had to pay to subsidise Granada's takeover of Forte, not to mention the money paid in other special dividends.

In The Times on 19 August 1996, Graham Searjeant expressed the hope that

"even at this late stage, the Chancellor might be stirred from his supercilious lethargy to take some action in his autumn Budget."

If the Chancellor read that article—no doubt, while he was on the beach—it took him until Tory party conference week to act. Typically, he blustered his way through the climbdown, conveniently forgetting what had happened before.

The Inland Revenue press release of 8 October 1996 quoted the Chancellor as saying:

"We have seen recently companies buying their own shares or paying special dividends in such a way that the proceeds end up entirely in the hands of those who are entitled to payment of a tax credit. This has costs for the Exchequer, and if action is not taken soon that cost would escalate."

That was the issue of streaming mentioned early by my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire.

[Mr. Pearson]

In the press release, the Chancellor said:

"we will not hesitate to take any further action should further evidence of abuse appear."

At least he finally admitted that it was an abuse—a tax loophole exploited by companies and their advisers—and, in so doing, he directly contradicted the Financial Secretary who has said all along that it is not a tax loophole. Perhaps he will now apologise and admit that he got it wrong.

During the debate on the Loyal Address, I challenged the Government to publish their figures on the cost to the Exchequer of allowing the loophole to remain open for so long. I had to follow up my inquiry with a parliamentary question, which was due to be answered on 7 November but was not answered until 2 December—and even then it contained an error. That shows just how unwilling the Government have been to tell the truth on this matter.

The answer from the Financial Secretary used the same method of calculation as that used for the estimated cost savings projected from closing the tax loophole, which produced an estimate of the total cost to the Exchequer of £400 million in the financial year 1995-96 and £450 million in the period from 1 April to 8 October, when the Inland Revenue announcement was made. There we have it—the Financial Secretary admitted that the cost to the Exchequer was a total of £850 million over a period of less than two years.

I believe that that is a gross underestimate and many respected commentators agree. On 9 October, the day after the press release, The Times made what I think is a wonderful comment on the Chancellor's decision. It said:

"The only fair complaint against the Chancellor's attack on the gross dividend scandal is that it has taken him at least a year too long to close a loophole so large that it must be visible from outer space."

It went on:

"The Inland Revenue, so deft at plucking numbers from the air, reckons yesterday's change will eventually save £400 million a year."

That is the figure still quoted by the Government today. However, The Times pointed out:

"share buybacks in 1996 alone appear to have attracted about £750 million in tax subsidies. Over two years, buybacks and special dividends paid in takeovers have probably extracted £1.75 billion from taxpayers."

The staff of The Times know a few things about goings-on in the City, and they should be listened to.

I simply do not believe the figures quoted by the Financial Secretary, nor do I accept that the long overdue changes that are to be made will yield only £200 million in 1997-98 and £400 million from 1998-99 onwards. In my view, the yields will be substantially higher than that, which will be good news for a future Labour Government.

Who will take responsibility for losing taxpayers' money on such a grand scale? Nobody, it seems. That comes as no great surprise, even though the financial director of a public company who was this incompetent at managing the business's finances would be dismissed as soon as blunders on such a large scale came to light. We have to ask, who took their eyes off the ball? Was it the Chancellor? Was it the Financial Secretary? Should everything be blamed on the hapless civil servant who undoubtedly gave the Financial Secretary bad advice when he was replying to my question? The taxpayer deserves some honest answers.

The Government's failure to act speedily in the face of the growing scandal of share buy-backs and special dividends exposes as a myth Tory claims to economic competence. When he gave evidence to the Treasury Committee on 9 December 1996, the Chancellor tried to gloss over the Government's negligence in not acting sooner. According to him, the Government acted speedily. He said:

"The particular announcement was timed because the nature of share buy-back was changing at the time and a whole new type of share buy-backs was being devised which in our opinion was not consistent with the purposes for which the previous regime was devised. That was a classic case whereby an allowance or tax arrangement was used for one purpose for a very long time and then suddenly with great ingenuity people found a new way of taking advantage of the tax relief. It is not at all unknown for the government to move quickly, we would have been criticised if we had not, to stop this."

5.45 pm

I am not sure what planet the Chancellor was on when he claimed that the Government moved quickly. Eighteen months previously, it was quite well known in the financial community that such arrangements were an abuse of the tax system. One could talk to any corporate financiers of repute about the issue and they would say, "Well, yeah, it probably is an abuse of the tax system, but we're allowed to get away with it." They all thought that it was a loophole and one that would certainly be closed—not in this Budget, but in the one before.

I shall now consider amendment No. 10, which I support. It should be clear from my remarks that I do not approve of share dividends and share buy-backs being used as a tax wheeze; however, I do believe that retrospection of taxation is an important issue and one that the Minister should address. I hope that he will take the amendment seriously—indeed, I understand that he might do so.

It is not only one prominent company in Cornwall that will be affected by the proposal. A company called The Birmingham Guild Ltd., which is based in Netherton—which is not in my constituency, but which I hope, with boundary changes and after a short general election campaign, will fall comfortably within it—wrote to me about tax-saving measures in respect of companies buying their own shares or paying special dividends. The letter says:

"Our Company, The Birmingham Guild Limited, has over the past few months been involved in certain transactions for bona fide commercial reasons. These transactions have involved the purchase of the Company's own shares from Trustees of family Accumulation and Maintenance Settlements. We have been advised in these transactions by Messrs Coopers and Lybrand who applied for tax clearances on 13 and 24 September 1996"—

before the Chancellor's announcement—

"and such clearances were duly received in October 1996. The retrospective nature of the legislation adversely affects the transactions we have entered into in good faith and in the light of the legislation prevailing at the time."

The company is clearly being penalised as a result of proposed legislation that was rather woollily outlined on 8 October and only inadequately clarified in December.

The letter goes on to quote a number of reputable sources and highlights the interest shown by the chairman of Coopers and Lybrand and by Deloitte and Touche, which has also contacted the Inland Revenue in respect of this issue. The letter concludes by saying:

"I hope you will agree that the retrospective nature of the proposed legislation is quite unacceptable in breaking as it does a long established principle and is absolutely contrary to natural justice. Your help in addressing this matter will be appreciated."

I wanted to read that because it is important for the Committee to realise that the Bill affects real businesses in the black country as well as in Cornwall. We should therefore consider accepting amendment No. 10.

Amendment No. 9 seeks to withdraw the allowance made in paragraphs 4, 5, 6 and 10 of schedule 7 if transactions are not carried out for bona fide commercial reasons. The Minister must look seriously at this matter. It was clear to me when I sought to amend sections 703 to 706 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 last year that those sections could not easily be used to stop streaming. That may be why the Government have adopted such an approach in schedule 7 rather than making a simple alteration to that Act.

However, it is a clear principle—I suspect that the Minister will use it as a reason for opposing the amendment—that "bona fide commercial reasons" is an accepted term in law and is referred to in sections 703 to 709 of the 1988 Act. That Act relates directly to schedule 7, as it provides that if a "transaction or transactions were carried out either for bone fide commercial reasons or in the ordinary course of making or managing investments, and that none of them had as their main object, or one of their main objects, to enable tax advantages to be obtained", tax advantages gained can be counteracted. I hope that that is clear.

The amendment is similarly clear about how we would expect it to operate in law. Section 703 of the 1988 Act could apply to a takeover bid involving the offer of a special dividend but that would depend on two further requirements: first, the obtaining of a tax advantage and, secondly, the absence of a bona fide commercial defence.

In the case of Shepphard and another, trustees of the Woodland Trust, v. Commissioners of the Inland Revenue, members of a family who were also trustees of a charitable trust decided that the trust should be financed by dividends. The company issued bonus shares, which were announced in favour of the trust. The family then renounced the right to a dividend in favour of the trust, and the company paid the dividend to the trust. As a non-taxpayer, the trust was able to claim back the advance corporation tax paid by the company on the distribution. The Inland Revenue sought to deny the claim for repayment, relying principally on section 703 of the 1988 Act, and said that the right to claim repayment of the advance corporation tax was a tax advantage.

That was accepted in the High Court, where Mr. Justice Aldous held that the ability to claim the advance corporation tax paid by the company on the making of the distribution at a later stage on appeal was not a "tax advantage" for the purpose of the provisions, having regard to the statutory definition. He said:

"The whole idea of a tax advantage is that the taxpayer has done something which allows him to resist an assessment and the Inland Revenue can point to something which alters his position to his advantage."

That ruling followed the words of Lord Wilberforce. It is significant to amendment No. 9, which refers to "bona fide commercial reasons" and "the obtaining of a tax advantage".

I was not surprised that the Government rejected the amendment that I sought to table last year to sections 703 to 706 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, but I am surprised that they have not sought to go down that route themselves in their rather complicated schedule 7. I support the principles behind the schedule, but remain to be convinced whether it is effectively drawn. I suspect that clever tax accountants will still find ways to get round it.

The schedule misses the target of special dividend shares that do not require consolidation, and does not establish a level playing field for takeovers. Will the Minister clarify that, because it is an accepted principle that there should be a level playing field for takeovers in terms of the tax system. Whereas the old system offered corporate raiders a tax advantage by allowing them to make a special dividend payment from the target company on a successful takeover, schedule 7 will shift the bias from favouring the bidder to favouring the target company, which will be able to take account of certain tax advantages not available to the bidding company. I suspect that, for that reason and many others, we shall return to the matter in future Finance Bills.

I support amendments Nos. 9 and 10 and hope that the Minister will consider them favourably.

Mr. Stephen Timms (Newham, North–East): I wish briefly to put three specific questions to the Minister. First, why have the Government taken so long to stop this abuse? The original announcement of the proposals on 8 October last appeared to be linked to Reuters' proposed special dividend, but the Government could have acted much earlier. Special dividends were used in the bids for a number of electricity companies in 1995 and by Lloyds bank when it merged with the Trustee Savings bank. The Chancellor could have taken action before the 1995 Budget. My hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West (Mr. Pearson) tabled an amendment to the Finance Bill following that, and the Government did not act. If those bids were not enough, Granada's bid for Forte should have made the Chancellor sit up and take action no later than January 1996.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West mentioned what Graham Searjeant said in The Times on 22 January 1996. The problem was well known more than a year ago, so I want to know why the Government are taking so long to deal with the abuse.

Secondly, why did the Inland Revenue not use existing anti-avoidance legislation to tackle the problem? As a number of hon. Members have said, the powers in sections 703 to 709 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 exist to allow the Inland Revenue to cancel tax advantages from certain types of transactions in securities. The growth in the use of special dividend and buy-back schemes was probably prompted by the Revenue's apparent unwillingness to use those existing powers.

Stephen Edge wrote in The Tax Journal on 10 October, referring to the proposal that we are debating:

"This is probably an unnecessary change if the provisions of s703 were applied properly and it is somewhat puzzling that the Inland Revenue has not responded to the press clamour by saying that it already had adequate weapons to deal with this abuse."

[Mr. Stephen Timms]

Thirdly, why has the schedule been so widely drawn? Why does it not target the problem that has been identified? As it is drawn, it could catch almost any dividend, as Stephen Edge noted in The Tax Journal. The schedule is riddled with complexity and uncertainty, and clever people will probably find ways around it.

Those are my three questions to the Minister: why did the Government wait so long, why was the existing legislation not used by the Inland Revenue, and why has the schedule been drawn so wide?

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Clackmannan): When we are dealing with a Government changing tack, there is always a tendency for us not to adopt the generosity of spirit implicit in the Bible when it says that there is rejoicing in Heaven over one sinner that repenteth.

Ministers always start their speeches in debates such as this by telling us that the Government have changed and that they have listened to what people have been saying. I would respond to that with the words that, as a schoolteacher, I used to write on essays, "Not good enough. Try harder." We are trying this evening to give the Minister the chance to do a little better.

The Government—inept as they may be—have recognised that for 20 months there has been a massive leakage of potential revenue. The ability of predatorial companies to make use of loopholes, and the impact of that on potential revenue, was recognised even by the Government as a matter on which they had to act.

We should all be grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West (Mr. Pearson), who has worked hard to highlight company excesses. We are entitled to claim credit for the Opposition's effectiveness in drawing attention to the shortcomings.

We must find out why the Revenue felt unable to use sections 703 to 709. If those provisions were not appropriate, that is a reasonable defence. It would not be unfair for the Government to accept that. The problem is that several tax experts are of a different mind: they say that the provisions could have been used and that, if the Revenue had applied its ingenuity to the problem, it could have had a go. Even if its attempts had failed, the fact that the Revenue was trying would have deterred some of those who were trying to take advantage of the loophole.

It is not good enough for the Government to claim that on the dawn of 8 October a new world was in prospect, another avoidance scandal was about to break and that, as a consequence, they had to act. Even this wretched Government probably recognised that they could not afford to ignore the issue any longer, so they drafted the measure. Unfortunately, they have botched it again. It is such a blunt instrument and is so widely drawn that it could pull into the provisions certain activities that are quite legitimate.

Amendment No. 9 is more explicit. It states:

"Paragraphs 4, 5, 6, and 10 above shall not apply to any distribution unless the transaction in securities is carried out for bona fide commercial reasons and does not form part of a scheme or arrangement of which the main purpose, or one of the main purposes, is the obtaining of a tax advantage."

A culture has developed over the past 17 years—it has assumed the proportions of an industry—that legislation should be framed in such a way that individuals can obtain tax advantages. Schemes are offered by the City to enable individuals to benefit as a consequence. That should not be the purpose of legislation. If there is to be distribution, it should be for bona fide commercial reasons.

The Minister cannot complain about our amendment. When the Opposition draft amendments, they are advised by skilled draftsmen, but those draftsmen do not have the authority of the Treasury or Inland Revenue solicitors. Amendments are often defective, but the wording of amendment No. 9 is clear and specific. The words are part of everyday parlance in the circles in which those matters are considered.

The Minister cannot say that he does not object to the amendment—he simply does not like the words. He could table a drafting amendment in Committee. That would be no problem. We all know that, from time to time, even the Treasury and the Inland Revenue are less than precise in their language. We are prepared to give them the benefit of the doubt. If the Minister wants to play around with our amendment once he has accepted it, we will be more than happy to let him do that.

We have witnessed 20 months of grief and failure. Various commentators have estimated the amount of revenue lost—£40 million in one deal alone, the Granada bid for Forte. That was a hostile bid which was hotly contested. The advantage gained by the predator in that case must have been critical in determining the price of the bid: if it appeared that assistance would be available, the bid could be framed in such a way that the company was, in effect, being subsidised to the tune of £40 million.

That example and others cited by my hon. Friends add weight to the argument that action must be taken. The Government have responded in part, but they have not got it right. We expect the Minister to claim that the Government have changed, have responded and should be given the benefit of the doubt. If we give the Government the benefit of the doubt, many people will either make a lot of money or lose a lot of money. We want to ensure that the legislation is as tightly and precisely drawn as possible. It must exclude bona fide transactions and a clearance procedure should decide what transactions would be affected. The rules should be mandatory so that the Inland Revenue has no discretion not to apply them. It must be required to do so; we must not see a return to the laissez-faire approach that existed before 8 October 1996.

The legislation must be clear; it is not enough to produce a memorandum of understanding or some form of statement of practice as guidance. The information should be in the core of the legislation. An abuse is being corrected and the issues must be clearly defined. If there is a case for moving on this matter—we accept that there is—there is an even greater case for ensuring clarity and precision.

The Government have come to the issue late in the day. I am sure that the pushing and probing of my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West has played a large part in the Government's U-turn. The Government must tell us why they have decided to move. Is it because the legislation at their disposal is not appropriate and that sections 703 to 709 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 are not relevant? If that is so, the Government should refute the claims of those individuals who have argued that the relevant powers exist. The Minister must not provide a bland assurance such as, "We have been advised that the legislation would not be appropriate to act in these cases." We want more than that: we want a clear statement from the Minister and precise legislation.

We believe that our amendment would afford such clarity: it would give Inland Revenue clear and explicit instructions about how to do its job. That would be far more effective than any side notes or advice to accountants and lawyers. We want to see clear instructions. The measure must come into effect only for bona fide commercial reasons. People must be protected and legitimate business operations should be encouraged. The Government must not introduce a catch-all provision, which we would have to change and improve in subsequent Finance Bills.

The Government deserve a little credit: the massive ship has turned around. However, it has not yet reached its destination, and we shall help it on its way. The amendment offers the Minister much-needed assistance in dealing with the matter properly once and for all. That would be a major step forward in our treatment of this anomaly.

Mr. Tipping: I support amendment No. 10, tabled by the hon. Members for South–East Cornwall (Sir R. Hicks) and for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler). I do not know quite how to describe them. Earlier in the debate, the hon. Member for North Cornwall described the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall and himself as Cornish pasty and custard pie, and he invited us to adjudge which was which. That is a bit like being asked to separate the sheep from the goats, but I think that their amendment is right and just.

The hon. Members mentioned a case in Cornwall, the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) mentioned a case in Nottinghamshire, and my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West (Mr. Pearson)—to whom the Committee owes much recognition and praise for his work in this area—referred to yet another firm. I know of many other examples across the country. It is a straightforward matter: those firms acted in good faith. They were aware of the press release issued on 8 October and they believed that they were acting properly. A further press statement issued on 5 December changed the situation completely and, although the companies had acted properly with the benefit of the appropriate advice, they now stand to lose significantly. I hope that the Financial Secretary will look favourably on the amendment, and I look forward to his reply to the debate.

6.15 pm

The Committee has discussed a wider issue this evening: the significant loss of finance to the Exchequer over a considerable period. As the debate progressed, it became clear that the problem was identified 24 months ago; yet the Government have been slow to act. The Committee has disagreed on the extent of the loss to the Exchequer. For example, we are told that the Granada takeover of Forte involved a potential loss of £40 million. I think that it would be appropriate for the Minister to give us his best estimate of the loss. There is argument, first, about the length of time that it has taken Ministers to act and, secondly, about the cost to the Exchequer.

The Budget statement has featured prominently in the proceedings this afternoon, and I wish to contrast the Chancellor's words with the Government's actions. The Chancellor said:

"As part of our continuing fight against tax and benefit fraud and tax loopholes, I am introducing a package of measures called 'spend to save'."

That is an important statement of the Government's intention to act. The Chancellor devoted considerable time to the subject in his Budget statement. I support his objective: it is vital to close tax loopholes such as this.

However, I shall contrast the determination and vigour of the Budget statement with the Government's tardiness in acting on the matter. I return the Financial Secretary to the Budget statement, when the Chancellor said:

"The 'spend to save' package will cost £800 million over the next three years to secure, in a well-planned and measured way, revenue and expenditure savings of well over eight times that amount—£6.7 billion. These measures are additional to the effective steps that we have taken previously".—[Official Report, 26 November 1996; Vol. 286, c. 162-63.]

I contrast that vigorous statement and the commitment of significant resources—£800 million that will result in a payback of £6.7 billion in three years—with the Government's actions in the circumstances described in schedule 7. It is clear that the Government have been tardy and that a significant amount of money has been lost. Their actions contrast markedly with the Chancellor's promises in the Budget.

That leads me to my final point. Commentators are sceptical about the effect of the "spend to save" package: £800 million spent to bring in £6.7 billion in three years' time. Ministers may not be here in three years' time. It is quite clear that we will have a different Government then. It is important that the Financial Secretary assures the Committee this evening that the rhetoric in the Chancellor's Budget statement will be put into practice. Certainly the example that we have discussed tonight belies what was in it. Unless the "spend to save" package is achieved, my hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench in a future Labour Government will face a real financing difficulty. We will have an inheritance of neglect.

I commend my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West on his long battle to get action on this issue. I believe that he has been successful. I wish that we had seen the same passion from the Government on it.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): I shall make the briefest possible contribution about amendment No. 10, to which I have added my name.

I do not think that anybody would disagree with the objective of closing unsatisfactory tax loopholes. Nevertheless, I believe that it is a key precept of our system—indeed, of any truly democratic system—that legislation should not have a retroactive effect. Many people—rightly in my view—consider that schedule 7, as drafted, will be retroactive in effect, bearing in mind the wording of the original Inland Revenue press release. As a consequence, some family trusts will be adversely affected.

We have it in our power to put matters right. I very much hope that my hon. Friend will accept the amendment.

Mr. George Stevenson (Stoke–on–Trent, South): I support amendment No. 9, which stands in the name of my hon. Friends. I shall reflect a little on the circumstances that have led us to consider this schedule and amendment. I shall also talk about the situation that we shall face if the schedule is not amended, and how that will be interpreted, given the evidence that we have, particularly that from the early 1990s onwards.

[Mr. George Stevenson]

We all know that the Conservative party is desperate—perhaps more than desperate—to establish itself as the party of tax prudence and to have probity in all matters concerning tax. If we look at the circumstances that led to schedule 7, which the Government proposed, and try to relate it to the old saying, "You can lead a horse to water, but you can't force it to drink", we will have a good illustration of the Government's complacency—some would say irresponsibility—in this area.

Some of my hon. Friends have described the situation as a tax scam. I am not sure how individual hon. Members would describe a scam, but it is a scam when a law is being abused and those abusing it benefit. I think that that is the generally accepted definition of a scam. Could any hon. Member effectively deny that that has been happening since the early 1990s in this regard?

I am pleased to say that the horse to which I referred, and which we are hypothetically taking to drink, had a halter put around its neck when the companies involved—Reuters, Granada, some takeovers of privatised electricity companies, and perhaps many more—led even the Inland Revenue to accept that millions, not tens of thousands, of taxpayers' money was being creamed off as a result of the abuse of the regulations and the irresponsibility of the Treasury and Ministers in not applying the law properly, to the evident detriment of taxpayers.

My hon. Friends referred to the estimated £40 million that was lost to the taxpayer due to the Granada takeover. I leave hon. Members to contemplate what they could do with a very small fraction of that money, which they could spend on the dilapidated schools in their constituencies. That underlines how serious this is.

I realise that the Government can sit back complacently and think, "This is a technical matter. It is buried in the schedules and clauses of the massive Finance Bill. Who gives a damn? The general public aren't going to worry about this, only the high fliers in the City, and so on." However, as has been amply shown by my hon. Friends, it does matter, because the more money the Conservative Government complacently allow to be creamed off—money that should legitimately be paid into the public purse—the less there is available for vital projects in our constituencies.

In 1995, that mechanism was used in the Reuters and Granada takeovers and in the acquisition of several electricity companies. The same electricity companies as the Government undersold when they privatised them, which had benefited from massive public subsidy when they were privatised, used this mechanism to cream off more taxpayers' money and the Government sat on their hands and did nothing.

I have heard no one challenge the fact that the provisions of section 703 of the Taxes Act 1988, had they been implemented, could have stopped this scam dead in its tracks. We are legitimately entitled to ask why.

Mr. Pearson: I should like to point out two things to my hon. Friend, who talked about the giveaway to electricity companies. According to my figures, the water and electricity companies combined have probably benefited to the tune of £400 million as a result of the loophole not being closed before the 1995-96 financial year.

Someone in the Inland Revenue must have signed cheques, because this money had been paid out to people. That is how the system works.

Mr. Stevenson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for putting several noughts on the figures that I quoted. I have no doubt that he is correct. I suspect that no hon. Member present in the Chamber could deny that this is the tip of a pretty large iceberg.

6.30 pm

I used the metaphor of the horse being taken to water. The halter should have been put around its neck when this scam emerged. It was tightened by Stephen Edge, who, in The Tax Journal on 10 October 1996, said that the Government should do something about the scam. He said that they should use their powers and did not need to amend the law, and that it was costing the public purse.

This is the Government of tax probity and financial probity: they stand up in the Chamber day after day, week after week, telling us how they intend to close tax loopholes. In 1996, they were told by a reputable, well-recognised authority to do something about it. What happened? Nothing. So the halter was tightened around the horse's neck.

The next step was that my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West (Mr. Pearson) got hold of the halter and pulled it towards the water trough. The amendments that he tabled to the Finance Bill hit the nail on the head.

Mr. Jon Trickett (Hemsworth): On the horse's shoe.

Mr. Stevenson: On the horse's shoe. In a most effective and devastating critique of the Government's complacency and irresponsibility, he urged them—[Interruption.] Some hon. Members may think that this is a laughing matter, but I do not. My hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West urged the Government to take action, and tabled an amendment to that effect. What happened? They did not do "nothing" this time. They were shaken out of the complacent and irresponsible attitude that they had taken for well over 12 months. Heaven knows how much money had been lost to the Revenue by that time because of this scam. They said, in effect, "We will not accept it."

The halter that was put around the neck of the Government horse, the pull that it was given by the reputable authority and the further pull that was given by my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West have brought the Government to the trough. I commend them, because they are now at the trough and their heads are bent forward ready to drink. Unless they accept amendment No. 9, they will bend their heads to drink and, before they know where they are, the clever people in the City will have pulled the plug and there will be no water left in the trough.

What can possibly be wrong? How can the Government concoct or construct a case against an amendment that says:

"Paragraphs 4, 5, 6 and 10 above shall not apply to any distribution unless the transaction in securities is carried out for bona fide commercial reasons and does not form part of a scheme or arrangement of which the main purpose, or one of the main purposes, is the obtaining of a tax advantage."

That is critical.

Mr. Jack rose—

Mr. Stevenson: I realise that the Minister is getting jocular, impatient and nervous. He should be nervous: he should be ashamed of himself, not nervous. His predecessors allowed this situation to develop.

Had the evidence of this scam not been there for the Government to see in the past few years, perhaps they would be entitled to say, "We do not need this amendment. We think that we have got it right." I congratulate the Government on going as far as they have already. The evidence is overwhelming that the bona fide people involved have been penalised and the scam merchants have been allowed to get away with it. That is why our amendment is so essential.

The amendment is based not on a party-political knock-about, but on the facts as we know them. First, the Government's complacency has bordered on the irresponsible. Secondly, they have allowed this scam to continue, which has cost the taxpayer millions. That blows a hole in the Government's propaganda: they have tried to convince the public that they are prudent on tax and want to close loopholes. They are now trying to close a loophole, but they will fail unless the amendment is carried. Thirdly, they will leave a mess that, after the next election, a Labour Government will lose no time in clearing up.

Mr. Jack: This has been a wide-ranging and interesting debate. I should first like to deal with the amendment that has attracted the most attention and support. It was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for South–East Cornwall (Sir R. Hicks) and supported by the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) and my hon. Friends the Members for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), for Ludlow (Mr. Gill), for Keighley (Mr. Waller) and for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan). The hon. Members for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien) and for Dudley, West (Mr. Pearson) also took up this point. I thank them all, especially my hon. Friend the Member for South–East Cornwall, for raising this issue. A number of family companies affected by the new legislation have already made representations to me on this point.

I looked again at the Inland Revenue press release that announced these proposals, to which hon. Members referred. Although it did not intend any element of retrospection, we accept that the original press release was ambiguous, which may have led trustees to take an overoptimistic view. We are prepared to err on the side of the taxpayer and accept the amendment.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: This problem is clearly due to the Government's incompetence. Will the Minister give us the cost involved during the period between the publication of the Bill and that press release? We want to know the cost of this new commitment as a result of the Government's incompetence.

Mr. Jack: I am sad that the hon. Gentleman calls it incompetence. As I said, it was a matter of interpretation. I said that we erred on the side of the taxpayer. If we have made an error, I am always the first to put my hand up and agree that we should put matters right. That is precisely what we have done. The hon. Gentleman implored us so to do, and other hon. Members made their particular points. We have decided to act, but there are some lessons to be learnt for the future.

Mr. O'Brien: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Jack: No, I shall not give way, because the hon. Gentleman had plenty of time to give his view.

In future, it would be sensible if taxpayers and their advisers remembered that Inland Revenue press releases are no substitute for the eventual legislation passed by the House. They simply inform the public that changes are being made. People who are considering entering into transactions can and should contact the Inland Revenue for further guidance, or wait until the legislation is finalised.

I should like to return to the substance of the remarks made by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire and his hon. Friends. It is important to focus on the heart of the matter, which is the use of the tax credit. Many hon. Members have said that money has been wasted, as if it has disappeared. The hon. Member for Stoke–on–Trent, South (Mr. Stevenson) even said that money had been creamed off. This money has gone, by and large, to exempt institutions—by that, we mean charities and pension institutions—ultimately for the benefit of recipients, especially of pensions.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor decided to act, because the cost and the use of the mechanism of paying special distributions by company share buy-backs was getting out of hand, and action had to be taken. I have been asked a number of times why we did not act more quickly. The answer—and, to be fair, the hon. Member for Dudley, West has probed us on this—is that, although we had seen what was happening, the situation had not reached the stage at which we felt that we must act.

In 1996, the use of this mechanism took on a much bigger proportion than was the case in 1995, as I think is shown by the figures published in the parliamentary answer. We therefore decided that it was right to end the activity in connection with security transactions. That is why we took the action that we took to stop the abuse that was eventually occurring. That said, the use of tax credits is important for exempt institutions, but we decided to halt the way in which they were being used by means of the mechanism of "streaming".

It has been asked why we did not use section 703 of the 1988 Act. The simple answer is that the existing legislation was not effective against most manipulation of that kind. If it had been, we would have used it, and we would not be debating the matter tonight. We have also been asked why we chose the mechanism that we chose. Classifying distributions in transactions associated with securities as the equivalent of FIDs was the most effective way in which to deal with the problem, and the terms under which that will apply are clearly stated in the schedule. The arrangements avoid the necessity to include a motive test, and the Bill sets out, precisely and unambiguously, how they will work.

The hon. Member for North Warwickshire asked a series of questions. I was grateful for his kindness when he said that he would allow me to write to him about specific points that he raised, and that is precisely what I shall do.

[Mr. Jack]

As for amendment No. 9, Opposition Members are clearly concerned that what they describe as bona fide activities are not effectively ruled out by our proposals. The legislation has been cast widely to ensure that all the transactions associated with securities that had exploited the streaming mechanism were caught, except those involving bona fide reasons—hence the exemptions for stock options, fixed-rate preference shares and ordinary pre-sale distributions. Those were carved out to ensure that bona fide transactions would not be prevented. In view of the exemptions, which have been carefully drafted to ensure that they do not put the Exchequer at risk, the amendment would produce a further set of hoops for taxpayers to jump through, and would introduce an additional and unnecessary element of bureaucracy.

Our drafting follows the spirit of amendment No. 9, but I think that the amendment is unnecessary. I hope that the Committee will accept amendment No. 10, and that the Opposition will not press amendment No. 9 at this stage.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I am very sorry that the Financial Secretary has not seen fit to accept our amendment, which would clarify the position in a way that he has said is in the spirit of his intention. It is regrettable that the Government have not accepted an amendment that would have clarified a complex schedule. The schedule clearly needs clarification, and, in due course, we intend to press our amendment to a vote.

We have seen this Financial Secretary, and the other Treasury Ministers who are present, rise repeatedly to demand that the Labour party provides costings for this, that and everything. Here we have a Treasury Minister making a concession at the Dispatch Box as a result of the Government's incompetence in failing to set out their tax intentions properly on 8 October. He has no answer to the question, "How much will this concession cost?", but we know that the cost to the taxpayer of the Government's failure to act over the past year has been considerable. It may have been as much as £2 billion. It may have been a good deal less, but it has certainly been in the hundreds of millions.

That money has been used to finance corporate raiders and takeovers. It has been used in a way that is not in the public interest—in a way that has left hospitals short of resources, and schools facing cuts. It could have been used to build hospitals, to provide police officers on the beat and to prevent education cuts, but the Minister has failed to act.

Mr. Jack: I apologise for not dealing with the question of the cost of amendment No. 10. It would be less than £10 million.

6.45 pm

Mr. O'Brien: Over the past year, however, the Government's failure to act has cost the taxpayer much more than that—and now, simply through his incompetence in releasing a press release from the Inland Revenue, the Financial Secretary has cost the taxpayer £10 million. As one of my hon. Friends has rightly said, he should apologise to the Committee. I am ashamed that the Government have taken such a course. They knew the problems, but failed to do anything about them in the 1995 Budget. They failed even to express displeasure at the abuse that was taking place in various takeovers. They did not use the anti-avoidance provisions in the 1988 Act. The Times said that there was a loophole big enough to be recognised from outer space, but the Minister did not even see it.

Today, we have seen the complacency of an incompetent Government and the failure of Treasury Ministers to protect the Revenue. The complexities of tax legislation all too often deter the public from taking an interest; that is a pity, because here we have a scandal that the Financial Secretary has not properly explained. How can the Government justify failing to act when the electricity industry was using £400 million of taxpayers' money, and Granada's bid for Forte was costing up to £50 million of their money—money that could have been used in the public interest? They have wasted taxpayers' money, and that is why we must press our amendment to a vote.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed: No. 9, in schedule 7, page 141, line 25, at end insert—

'13. Paragraphs 4, 5, 6, and 10 above shall not apply to any distribution unless the transaction in securities is carried out for bona fide commercial reasons and does not form part of a scheme or arrangement of which the main purpose, or one of the main purposes, is the obtaining of a tax advantage.'.—[Mr. Mike O'Brien.]

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Schedule 7, as amended, agreed to.

Bill (Clauses 40,62,68 82 and 92 and Schedules 7 and 13), reported, with amendments; to lie upon the Table.

Local Government and Rating Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Ordered,

That the Local Government and Rating Bill be considered in the following order, namely, New Clauses, amendments relating to Clause 1, Schedule 1, Clause 5, Schedule 2, Clauses 2 and 3, Clause 6, Clause 4, Clauses 7 to 33, Schedules 3 and 4, Clauses 34 and 35, New Schedules.—[Mr. Curry.]

New clause 1

PARISH COUNCILS: ADDITIONAL POWERS

'(1) A Parish Council may provide on an agency basis within the Council's area any service within the area by any public body or statutory undertaker.

(2) A Parish Council may make grants towards the enhancement or preservation of any service by any public body or statutory undertaker, including any local authority health authority, public utility, public transport operator, quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisation, housing association or any agency or voluntary body acting on behalf of or as contractor to any such body in exercise of their functions.'.—[Mr. Rendel.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

7.2 pm

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): With this, it will be convenient to discuss also the following: New clause 3—Audit—

'( ) Before a parish council or community council may exercise a power given to it under this Part it shall subject its accounts to audit in accordance with Part III of the Local Government Finance Act 1982.'.

New clause 4—Local partnerships—

'(1) Where a parish council or community council exercises a power under sections 26 to 30, it shall have regard to any transport plans published by a local authority in its area which co-ordinates local partnerships, including any interested body.

(2) Where a parish council or community council exercises a power under section 30, it shall have regard to any community safety or crime prevention plans published by a local authority in its area which co-ordinates local partnerships, including any interested body.'.

Mr. Rendel: I am grateful for the opportunity to move new clause 1. As Liberal Democrats have said all along, the Bill is generally to be welcomed, because to some extent it enhances local powers. However, we have tabled the new clause because the Bill misses a good opportunity—it misses more than one good opportunity—to do much more to enhance local powers and to devolve central powers down to local councils.

When speaking in Committee about part III of the Bill, which deals with new powers for parish councils, the Minister said

"It is a deliberately limited measure".—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 3 December 1996; c. 147.]

I do not know whether it was deliberate, but it is certainly limited. The purpose of new clause 1 is greatly to enhance the new powers provided in the Bill to parishes.

Some parishes are very small and may not wish, or may not be able, to take on many new powers. Other parishes, however, are now remarkably large, and some are even as large as the smallest district councils and unitary authorities. It is ludicrous that powers should not be given to such large parish councils after the Government have decreed that the similar powers should be given to district and unitary councils of a similar size.

It would be wrong to impose on all parishes all the powers that might be granted to the larger parishes, but there is no reason why the Bill should not at least enable parishes to take on greater powers if they feel that they are able to do so and are sufficiently large. That consideration is why new clause 1 would provide parishes with the opportunity to take such powers. Larger parishes may wish to take up those powers, even if the smaller ones do not.

The first part of the new clause would provide parishes with an opportunity to act as agent for other bodies. An important point, however, is that they would also be able to purchase improved services or even, in some cases, to preserve services that might otherwise be stopped because of financial cuts imposed on higher-level authorities.

Subsidiarity is the principle behind the new clause. Liberal Democrats believe that we should not only talk about devolving powers to lower level authorities but implement devolution whenever possible. I congratulate the Government on, to some extent, implementing that objective in the Bill. The principle of subsidiarity, however, should not be half-hearted, or available in some areas and to some authorities but not more generally. If it is true that we should pass down powers from Europe to national Governments, it is equally true that we should pass down powers from national to local authorities and from larger local authorities to smaller ones.

If the Government are genuinely to fulfil their pledge that they believe in subsidiarity, and if the Labour party is to fulfil its similar pledge, I hope that they will accept new clause 1.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I apologise for missing the first minute of the speech of the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel). I assume that he believes, in moving new clause 1, which deals with parish councils, that its provisions should apply equally to community councils in Wales. An argument can certainly be made for certain powers to be given to larger community councils in Wales.

When one thinks of towns such as my home town of Caernarfon and of Colwyn Bay—which have the status of a community council, with very few powers—the need for change to current legislation is apparent. Towns such as Colwyn Bay may exist in a local authority in which the hinterland and the town itself have very different natures. They therefore require the ability to fine-tune policies to respond to the wishes of an urban area, such as Colwyn Bay or Llandudno, for example, as distinct from the wishes of the entire district or county authority in which they are located. I am not certain whether the wording of new clause 1 is appropriate to achieve that aim, although I am sure that the Minister will tell us.

In coming years, there will be a growing tide of pressure from identifiable communities, such as those I have mentioned, to be provided with greater autonomy and to be able to take the decisions that they can take for themselves—which is, after all, the basis of the concept of subsidiarity.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): In principle I support the comments of the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) and new clause 1, and I do so as an honorary vice-president of the National Association of Local Councils—an office which I have held for more than 20 years. I agree with his comment that we should make all levels of local government meaningful. Like him, I also very much commend the Government on the modest initiative that they have shown in the Bill to recognise the role not only of parish councils and—as the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) said—community councils in Wales but of town councils, which, in urban areas, do very much the job of parish councils in the rural areas of the United Kingdom. In principle, I warmly welcome what the hon. Member for Newbury said. I presume that the brevity of his remarks, on which I also commend him, means that the new clause is perhaps a marker, and not something on which he intends to divide the House.

If it is any consolation to the hon. Gentleman, I know that some Conservative Members support the idea behind the new clause, which is to pass greater powers down to parish, town and community councils, to enable them, with their unique knowledge of the areas they serve, to carry out jobs currently carried out either by borough or district councils, perhaps even by county councils, or even, occasionally, by the Government. That work is more appropriately undertaken by those—I hope that they will forgive me for using this phrase—who operate at the grass roots level of local politics.

If, in due course, the concept behind the new clause is taken up and additional powers are granted to parish, town and community councils, perhaps more people will seek to serve in local government—people who have local knowledge and commitment and want to serve those with whom they live. They could bring to that task a unique knowledge of their area. I thus warmly support the new clause.

Mrs. Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough): I shall be brief. I support new clause 1 in principle, but wish to relate it to new clause 3. If we are considering giving new powers to any public organisation, those organisations should be subject to proper scrutiny and public accountability. New clause 3 provides that, if a parish, town or other council is to be given new powers, its accounts should be carefully audited by the district auditor before those powers are granted in order to ensure that it is absolutely appropriate to proceed.

New clause 3 is important because there is a significant difference between a parish council and a local community association. Both can be used for consultative purposes—the consultation role is extremely important—but the power of parish councils derives from their power to levy a precept and manage a budget. That is what makes parish councils different and what makes it important that their public accountability should be stressed in the Bill.

My constituency contains the only parish councils in the city of Sheffield; the rest of Sheffield regards them in a rather bemused way and is unsure about what they are and do. There are three such councils, and each one is very different. One is in a very rural area of scattered communities but does an enormous amount—it manages and maintains the whole public footpath network in part of the Peak park and manages other parks, which it does extremely well. Its budget, however, is only slightly more than £100,000.

[Mrs. Helen Jackson]

The second council serves a larger population but covers an area that is not so rural. It does less but has a much higher local profile and spends more of its budget on its premises. The third is a small town council which is genuinely in a state of confusion about its powers, duties and budget. The district auditor is at the moment trying to clear up some of that confusion. That is one of the reasons why it is important that the Bill sets out more clearly what we intend such councils to do.

7.15 pm

New clause 3 should be accepted because the public and parish councils must be sure and made aware of the fact that their finances are to be presented publicly and be open to scrutiny. "Sleaze" is a nasty word, but sleaze is sleaze is sleaze, whether it is found on the Government Benches or our Benches, on a city, county or parish council, or whether it involves Mr. X the builder whose wife is on the parish council—we all know how local communities work.

I believe that the Audit Commission should be properly consulted about the provisions that it wants included in the Bill if, as I think we should, we pass more power to local level. That would ensure that greater accountability followed that power.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid–Kent): I have to tell my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) that I was part of the original working group that led to the formation of the National Association of Local Councils, and I am delighted to learn that it is in such excellent hands. I am also a vice-president of the Kent Association of Parish Councils.

I congratulate the Government warmly on their efforts to enhance the powers of parish councils, which I believe to be entirely appropriate. It is clear that the pool of people from which parish councillors can be drawn is growing every day as people take earlier retirement, or are even forced to do so. I have great sympathy for the new clause, but, even if it cannot be accepted, I hope and believe that Ministers will agree that parish councils are increasingly demonstrating their capacity to take on more roles. I hope that the move to give them more control over their local communities—communities of which parish council members have great knowledge, on which those members are able to spend much more time and to which they can offer greater personal commitment than is often possible for borough and county councillors—will continue.

Ms Hilary Armstrong (North–West Durham): This is an interesting little debate. I am sure that the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) will not press the new clause, because it would in essence give parish councils a power of general competence, and therefore many more powers than other authorities would have.

Until we properly address the relationship between central and local government and the powers of other authorities, it would be perverse of the House to give parishes powers that other tiers of government cannot exercise. Were we to do that, new legislation would have to be introduced to ensure that parish councils were made accountable for those powers and that all the necessary checks and balances were in place.

I am a fellow vice-president of the National Association of Local Councils and president of the Durham Association of Parish and Town Councils. I greatly support the important role that such councils play in their localities, but I am not convinced at this stage that they want to become county and district councils too. However, I believe that they have an important role to play, together with those authorities, in exercising functions that are currently the responsibility of other tiers of government.

That is why our new clause 4 offers models of partnership on two activities that are identified in the Bill—transport, and crime prevention and community safety. Given the current framework of local government, new clause 4 is by far the best way in which to proceed. We should ensure that there is real partnership between parish councils, town councils and the other tiers of government that have responsibilities in the areas they serve.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mrs. Jackson) referred to new clause 3. If the Government were minded to be sympathetic to new clause 1, new clause 3 would become even more important as an acknowledgement that the auditing of parish and town councils should be far more onerous than it is at present. I thank the Minister for his letter about auditing, which did not arrive until after we had tabled new clause 3; if we had delayed tabling the new clause, it would not have been discussed today. I appreciate that it does not take into account some of the measures that the Minister addressed in his letter.

Those of us who are concerned about probity in public office will be reassured by many of the measures outlined in the letter. I commend my hon. Friend the Member for Hillsborough on her persistence in pursuing the matter and on ensuring that we looked at it in detail in Committee. I felt that it was important to pursue it on the Floor of the House. I hope that the Minister can reassure us that the measures outlined in his letter of 21 January will be implemented swiftly, as the Bill is implemented, so that the new powers in the Bill do not come into effect until those measures come into effect.

New clause 4 deals with the powers relating to transport, and to crime prevention and community safety; it emphasises a partnership approach. The Bill addresses transport and crime prevention, but we believe that it is important to reflect the work going on in local government on the face of the Bill. Local government is committed to seeking to achieve more sustainable patterns of transport use and successful local crime prevention initiatives. Local authorities have extensive responsibilities in both areas, and, in many senses, they are in a prime position to tackle the real problems that local communities face.

We had some interesting and wide-ranging debates in Committee on the problems of transport in rural areas, which local authorities are in a prime position to tackle. By going along with the spirit of new clause 4, the Government would ensure that parish councils were involved with district councils, county councils or metropolitan authorities in ways that would mean that there was a close look at transport needs and what could be done to tackle them.

The Department of Transport is already working with local authority associations to develop further a package approach to transport investment, to ensure that authorities in a local area work out what is needed and to ensure that they target the finance available to tackle those needs. Parish councils have an important role to play in that and we should ensure that they are fully part of any plan that is being made.

I reiterate that we believe that local authorities need to be able to secure improvements in the quality of bus services and the integration of bus services with other forms of transport. Our debate in Committee highlighted the problems of rural areas in that regard and how important it was to take account of them.

It is also important that local authorities retain the ability to influence rail services. That is not as important in rural areas as it once was or as it should be. None the less, it is important that, as part of a wider transport strategy, all the different aspects of public transport come within the partnership approach that we seek to develop through new clause 4.

We want to ensure that the Government establish a policy and a financial framework within which authorities are encouraged to implement innovative transport strategies embracing a package of measures designed to improve the quality of public transport. They should look at car use; I know that the Road Traffic (Reduction) Bill, which is before the House tomorrow, deals with that.

Yesterday, I was in Loughborough looking at what the council has done to enable that small market town to provide pedestrian access, accessibility from the edges of the town and access for the disabled. Those developments have come about because the various authorities in the area have worked together and, despite the financial constraints, have come up with a package that is working for the town. It is our job to provide the framework to encourage and give an incentive to local authorities to work together on such developments.

There are things that can be done and there are things that local authorities are already doing. We believe that the Bill offers an opportunity for the Government to emphasise that parish and town councils play an important part and need to be consulted effectively. More importantly, they should be seen as partners in transport proposals.

The same is true of crime prevention, which is important in rural areas as well as in urban areas. When I was in Loughborough yesterday, I realised the importance of the integrated way in which the authorities had tackled crime prevention and transport in the town centre.

The second part of new clause 4 addresses crime prevention by encouraging concerned people and organisations to work together, each of them playing a vital role. We know very well that, if crime prevention is left to the police and seen as the responsibility of one agency rather than all agencies, adequate solutions simply do not come forward.

I have visited areas where they have spent a year considering crime prevention and bringing together voluntary organisations, different tiers of local government, the police, crime prevention panels, and so on, so that they work in partnership to identify practical ways in which they can deter criminals and find new ways of reassuring local people about security and community safety. Getting local government to take responsibility for ensuring such co-ordination would change things radically.

The recent Audit Commission report on finding ways forward for young offenders, "Misspent Youth", marked a remarkable departure for the Audit Commission, bringing together some of the things that it does best. It made it clear that we can save an enormous amount of money and more effectively tackle the problem of young people committing offences if we take a much more co-ordinated approach and if local government plays a strategic role in ensuring such co-ordination. All our experience points to that approach. New clause 4 would ensure that parish and town councils were in the middle of a partnership approach to the development of a strategy for crime prevention and community safety. The Government ought to listen to such suggestions.

I have re-read what the Minister said the last time we debated crime prevention. He thinks that it is an issue for the police. I was not satisfied with his approach then and remain dissatisfied. The Audit Commission's report identifies other ways of going forward and the new clause would enable the Government to take them up. The new clause is not dictatorial or profess that we know best. It offers local solutions to local problems. It would begin to tackle problems in a way that I know can work. We ought to be pushing to ensure that such an approach works.

7.30 pm

The Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration (Mr. David Curry): If I were to recommend to the House that we vote for new clause 1, there would be a corporate heart attack among parish councillors. They constantly tell us that they want to be consulted and listened to more effectively. There is not an enormous demand for vast new powers. Parish councils range enormously in size, as I am sure the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) would acknowledge. In my constituency, the populations they cover range from 15,000 to covering 150 people. We must be prudent, so that we give them realistic and sensible powers that are relevant to local circumstances.

As the hon. Member for North–West Durham (Ms Armstrong) said, new clause 1—which, to put the record straight, would not cover community councils in Wales—would give more competence to parish councils than district or county councils. Many people think that there are enough tiers of local government. We need to ensure that they work together effectively. I am afraid that I cannot commend the new clause to the House.

I agree with the points made by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mrs. Jackson) about accountancy. As she will know from the letter of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison), we have recently revised accountancy rules. They come into effect on 1 April—before most parts of the Bill come into effect. The rules were revised after consultation with the parish councils, and we should give them a chance to work. We are looking for accountancy with as light a hand as is necessary to provide probity. I know that she will agree with me on that.

I have sympathy with the spirit of new clause 4, and I would like to consider the inclusion of advice on any consultation to which the hon. Member for North–West Durham referred and in any guidance that we give to councils on their use of the new powers. I of course know that, as she says, the Department of Transport is considering what form of advice would be sensible, and is discussing with local authorities what form of advice they would find useful. That is sensible co-operation. The problem of putting that in the Bill is that it would impose a mandatory burden on a council that sought to exercise its powers and involve a new, rather more complicated level of procedure. The new clause is somewhat unclear and vaguely expressed, although I realise that it is rather difficult to put such responsibilities in precise terms. I hope that she finds it sensible to consider practical guidance.

I have reached the same sort of conclusion with regard to crime prevention. I agree with what the hon. Member for North–West Durham is trying to do—sensible people would. She is trying to put into statute what is common sense, but is doing so in statutorily unusable language. I hope that she will therefore agree that it is sensible that local authorities, which know what they are trying to do and have practical experience, deal with the issue pragmatically and sensibly. If they think that we should be able to give guidance, we would of course want to do so. That is the sensible way in which to proceed. I therefore hope that hon. Members do not feel that it is necessary to press the new clause to a Division.

Mr. Rendel: I am very grateful to those who have supported new clause 1. Many more have spoken in support of it than in opposition to it. Perhaps that is yet another example of Conservative and Opposition Back Benchers having rather more sense than the Government.

Two points that have been made could be considered to be in opposition to the new clause. The first is that, if such powers were given to parish councils, district councils should have them also. I entirely agree with that, but do not think that that is a reason why we should not give the powers to parish councils in the first instance. Let us give such powers to parish councils and then go on to give a power of general competence to districts and boroughs as well.

The second point was that the powers might give many parish councillors heart attacks. I do not see how offering parish councillors powers that they may or may not take up, depending on whether they feel that they are able to do so and that the council is a relevant size for the powers to be used effectively, could give any parish councillor a heart attack. I therefore reject that criticism.

I suspect that the new clause would not succeed if I pressed it to a Division. I therefore beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 2

EXEMPTING SHOWHOUSES FROM NON–DOMESTIC RATING

'(1) Part III of the 1988 Act is amended as set out in subsection (2) (which provides for the abolition of liability to non domestic rating in respect of housebuilders showhouses).

(2) In section 66 there shall be inserted:

"(5A) (a) Where property

(i) has been constructed or adapted for use as living accommodation;

(ii) has not since it was constructed or adapted for use as living accommodation been used for that purpose; and it shall be treated as next in use as domestic property for the purposes of subsection (5) above.

(iii) it is used wholly or mainly as a showhouse;

(b) for the purposes of subsection (5A)(a) above property whether furnished or not is used as a showhouse if

(i) it is used by or on behalf of its owner for display to members of the public as an example of other property constructed or to be constructed by him in order to market that other property, and

(ii) that other property is, or will be when constructed, domestic property by virtue of subsection (5) above".'.—[Mrs. Peacock.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mrs. Elizabeth Peacock (Batley and Spen): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

My right hon. Friend the Minister will be aware of my long interest in the provision of housing for purchase and for rent. This is an occasion on which the Government can help reduce the cost of new houses.

My right hon. Friend the Minister will recall that, in a rating tribunal case in 1995—Ideal Homes v. Ian Walker—it was decided that house-builders' show houses were properly subject to uniform business rate, not council tax. That decision followed a long period of uncertainty after the introduction of the UBR, during which some authorities claimed UBR on show houses and others were satisfied to collect council tax. Given that the uncertainty was resolved by the decision, it is understandable that most local authorities started to charge UBR, and that, based on research undertaken by the House-Builders Federation, the charge paid by house-builders paying council tax would be roughly doubled. The federation has always argued that show houses should be subject not to UBR but to council tax, and new clause 2 sets out to achieve that.

I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Minister will be asking himself—and possibly me—about the cost of the proposal. Perhaps I might tell him. The cost of making show houses subject to council tax rather than UBR is—I estimate—about £5 million per annum, based on current levels of house-building activity. That is a small sum in United Kingdom accounting terms, but it is real money that has to be paid by housebuilders at a time of relatively poor trading activity, although recently we are seeing many more house starts and much more activity.

The change in law requested would have no cost to the Government: it would merely switch funds between local authority budgets. Levying UBR on what is housebuilders' stock is an unusually onerous approach and one that breaches the general principle of not taxing stock. The showhouse is an empty, unsold house and should be subject to the appropriate council tax regime, which is intended to provide an incentive to avoid keeping property empty unnecessarily. A showhouse serves the same purpose as a new car in a car showroom—it is there to increase the rate of sale of other stock. A car in a showroom is not taxed until it is sold. That principle is already breached by the levying of council tax at the basic rate.

I appreciate that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State may choose to remind the House that showhouses are sometimes used as sales offices and we must bear that in mind. It is, however, penalising the legitimate use of housing stock to subject it to UBR, which was essentially intended for commercial, retail or industrial property. Moreover, it appears from the original record of debates in Hansard that it was never the intention of Parliament to tax domestic buildings with the commercial rating legislation. A showhouse, like a car in a showroom, is temporarily and briefly used for demonstration purposes before reverting to the residential use for which it was designed and built. It should therefore be taxed only in the manner appropriate to its intended residential use—through the council tax.

The impact of UBR is uneven. Some 50 per cent. of authorities charge UBR and the other 50 per cent. charge council tax. That is clearly unfair, but the removal of the anomaly can be achieved only by increasing costs in a sector in which I imagine the Government wish to see non-inflationary recovery. Any further cost burden will only retard recovery, while its removal would be a small but welcome step forward.

The majority of housebuilders are not large, publicly quoted companies, as we are sometimes told. They fall within the small and medium-sized enterprise sector, which the Government and all of us wish to encourage. Removal of the anomaly and reduction in cost would therefore clarify the tax treatment of an important group of SMEs and, I hope, be reflected in house prices, which would benefit all our constituents.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: I declare my interest as chairman of the Manufacturing and Construction Industries Alliance. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock) on new clause 2 and register strong support for what it seeks to achieve. My hon. Friend advised the House that the cost to the housebuilding industry of making showhouses subject to uniform business rate rather than council tax is estimated to be some £5 million. I am sure the House will agree that that is not a huge sum in the context of the size of that important sector of our economy, but I emphasise that the small to medium-sized building firms and companies are hit disproportionately by the tax, at a time when—as my hon. Friend said—profit margins have been squeezed by the recent severe recession in the housing market for which the industry itself was not to blame in any way.

Newly built showhouses awaiting sale are simply the stock—I emphasise the word "stock"—of the housebuilding industry or, at worst, are unoccupied residential premises. Their prime purpose and their prime use is simply display so that potential purchasers of a new home can see the product that they are considering buying. It is inevitable that in some showhouses there may be a receptionist to greet visitors or perhaps even a salesman or saleswoman available, on a part-time basis or by appointment, to negotiate a sale, but that is not necessarily typical of many of the showhouses on the many small developments where the local building company or firm has neither the resources nor the inclination to maintain the cost of a sales team. We need therefore to assess the tax liability of such premises not on the basis of what minor activities may on occasion be undertaken in showhouses but on the basis of their prime purpose which is, as I have already said, as the stock of the building industry.

Some people have expressed the irrational fear that the new clause's amendment to the local government tax regime would set a precedent for other industries seeking to widen the benefit. I do not accept those arguments. Dentists or pharmacists who use one or two rooms in their home for their practice are using those premises not as stock for sale but as a place of business under the prime purpose criteria. Retailers who live above the shop could not claim the shop as part of their residence because its prime purpose is the conduct of retail trade.

Simply because a housebuilder might on occasion undertake limited secretarial or administrative work in a showhouse—as Members of Parliament sometimes do in their homes—should not mean that suddenly the prime purpose of the premises is considered to be the commercial conduct of secretarial and administrative work. The prime purpose of the property is its sale. If that were not the case, in the interests of justice all right hon. and hon. Members who cannot escape paperwork, correspondence, filing, meetings and even media interviews at home would have to be charged the uniform business rate as well as the council tax.

I sincerely commend the new clause to my right hon. Friend the Minister of State and I hope that he will listen carefully and sympathetically to what has been said tonight and accept that the unjust anomaly should be addressed. I hope that he will undertake to make acceptable proposals of his own for putting the matter right. We have spoken briefly but to the point and I hope that the Government will make proposals to put right the current unjust anomaly.

Mr. Curry: As my hon. Friends will know, we can add to the list of eligible properties and businesses under the order-making powers that are attached to the Bill. We would look to use that mechanism in any additions we made to the Bill and on those grounds I will ask my hon. Friends to withdraw the new clause.

I wish to state clearly, so that there is no misunderstanding, that I am in two minds on the issue. There is a good case on both sides of the argument. As my hon. Friend the Member for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock) said, the land tribunals have defined the problem recently so the legal uncertainty is now at an end. She also admitted that the way some builders use the showhouses has a business element. When showhouses lie empty for a while, we must also take into account the tax treatment of empty properties under the council tax regime.

Equally, I can see that placing show houses on the business rate list—even for a short time—and moving them on to the council tax list once they are sold as dwellings would place an administrative burden on the council tax payer and the Valuation Office. Therefore, on the grounds of deregulation, there is a case to be listened to. I can tell my hon. Friends the Members for Batley and Spen and for Macclesfield that I am ready to listen to that case and I am willing to receive representations to balance the arguments. If they can persuade me that this is the correct move, I will use the order-making powers in the Bill to bring it into effect and I shall do so conterminously with the discussions on the legislation.

Mrs. Peacock: My right hon. Friend the Minister of State has obviously listened to what I and my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield have had to say, and I hope that he will be able to introduce a measure along the lines that we have suggested. I therefore beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 5

EXEMPTION FOR SPORT AND RECREATION CLUBS

'In Schedule 5 to the 1988 Act there is inserted—

"Sport and Recreation Clubs

15A. A hereditament is exempt to the extent that it consists of property used wholly or mainly by a club, society or other organisation not established or conducted for profit for purposes of sport or recreation.".'.—[Mr. Macdonald.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The intention of the new clause is to remove the liability for non-domestic rates from voluntary sports and recreation clubs and associations. The effect of this would be to bring the treatment of clubs in England and Wales into line with the treatment of clubs in Scotland. I hope that the Government will recognise that this is an important issue, and that it is a fair and reasonable proposition to which they should respond positively.

The Government should make a positive response for two reasons; the first being the importance of sport to our national life. The Government have explicitly acknowledged that, and the Prime Minister made his contribution last year in a document called "Raising the Game". The document was all about the need to improve the access of British people—particularly young people—to sporting facilities. We all acknowledge that an important part of that is the role of voluntary clubs and associations, and particularly the role of the thousands of volunteers who devote much of their time trying to involve young people in sport and recreational activities.

The second reason why the Government should accept the fairness and common sense of the new clause is that clause 2 of the Bill aims to correct the anomaly that currently exists between the treatment of sporting rights in England and Wales and the treatment of sporting rights in Scotland. However, I wish to point out to the Minister that a second anomaly—between the treatment of sporting clubs in England and Wales and the treatment of such clubs in Scotland—still exists. That anomaly is no different in principle from that which the Government are trying to tackle in clause 2 affecting sporting rights. If it is right to do away with one of those anomalies, I suggest that—by the same logic—the Government should do away with the other. That is what I am trying to do in new clause 5.

One of the reasons why the Government could not include the measure at the outset was that they were apparently unaware of the existence of the anomaly. Certainly the Minister seemed to be unaware of the matter when I raised it in Committee, although he has since checked and found that it does exist. He wrote to me on the matter and sent copies of the letter to all other members of the Committee. I hope that he is now prepared to take a fresh look.

The question of costs must be addressed, and the Central Council of Physical Recreation—the umbrella body that covers all voluntary clubs and associations—has looked at this. Its most recent study of the effect of the new clause suggested that the cost to the Exchequer would be £14 million a year. That sum, I suggest—although it is not negligible—is relatively modest when compared with the total take of taxation, whether local or national. More relevant, perhaps, is that it is a reasonable sum when compared with the cost of removing the anomaly affecting sporting rights.

The Government estimate that the cost of removing the sporting rights anomaly will be £4 million to £5 million. That anomaly affects only 6,000 holders of sporting rights in England and Wales. By comparison, the sporting clubs anomaly affects over 150,000 clubs and associations—25 times as many clubs—and will affect the 6.5 million people who enjoy and use these clubs. Given that the additional costs of removing the anomaly dealt with by the new clause are only £14 million—compared with the £5 million costs of clause 2—the Government will be getting good value for money.

I represent a Scottish constituency, and I am aware that I am speaking on an issue affecting England and Wales, but that is entirely within the rules of the House. I have tried to be brief, and I shall conclude by quoting briefly some of the clubs and associations that have been in touch with me to allow them to have their say directly—as it were—on the importance of the issue. The National Cricket Association has been in touch with me through the firm of chartered surveyors that acts as rating adviser to the association, and it pointed out that most of the individual members of the association are small voluntary cricket clubs

"who survive purely on the income that can be generated from their individual members. Over the last few years . . . many of the clubs have fallen into severe financial difficulty".

This has occurred as a result of the generally difficult economic background of the past few years. Inevitably, the association said, a number of clubs will not survive.

At the same time, the association said that a "substantial increase in rate liability . . . has fallen on the clubs as a result of the rating revaluations in 1990 and 1995, and the generally unsympathetic attitude of Local Authorities to the applications which have been made for . . . rate relief".

The association's letter continued:

"The first effect of this is usually that the club will halt any expenditure on maintenance or equipment. Club premises fall into disrepair, reducing the attraction of the club to new members. The falling standard of facilities such as nets and practice equipment also deters parents from encouraging their children to participate in the youth activities at clubs which in turn will have a knock-on effect in the next few years on the number of talented youngsters rising to the top level of our—meaning the English—

"national summer game."

Given the state of English cricket today, that seems to be a cry from the heart to which the House should respond. The association then stated:

"A straightforward and very tangible benefit which could be provided for clubs would be mandatory rate relief . . . clubs would undoubtedly view this as a significant encouragement to their activities which would help strengthen the long term future of the game throughout the United Kingdom."

I should like to mention a letter that I received from the secretary of the English Indoor Bowling Association to illustrate the different types of sport that are affected by the rating liability. He pointed out that a lot of capital investment is needed to provide the basic facilities for indoor bowling. The association believes that it has a strong case for arguing that those facilities should benefit from rate relief. He made an important relevant point when he stated:

"Indoor bowls is played by people of all ages, there is no advantage in gender, size, age, and within reason, physical fitness. It is played by many people with disabilities with the majority of clubs providing sessions each week for the blind and partially sighted, wheelchair bound bowlers and other mentally and physically handicapped people . . . the operation of the bowls hall is often left to the clubs themselves and in common with the majority of the members clubs, they are run mainly with voluntary labour since without this they would not be viable."

8 pm

It is useful to compare the services that such associations provide for young people, the handicapped and the old with those provided by the holders of shooting rights, who will enjoy a 100 per cent. exemption under clause 2. That comparison makes clear the case for extending the exemption to voluntary clubs and associations.

The Football Association has told me that many of its members are voluntary clubs, local clubs and associations. It has stated in a letter to me:

"We understand that it is the intention of the Government to introduce measures which will assist financially those business 'sporting rights' owners throughout the UK. In our view, it is equally important that our affiliated voluntary clubs that have to pay the Uniform Business Rate should be afforded equal status".

The FA goes on to point out that it

"is committed to investing in establishing links between clubs and local schools."

It argued that if such clubs were granted relief from rates they could reinvest the finances in youth coaching programmes.

The letters and representations that I have received from different clubs and associations make my case. I hope that the Minister will offer a positive response. I cannot see any reason why the anomaly between England and Scotland in respect of sporting clubs should be allowed to continue if it is the Government's intention to remove the anomaly between England and Scotland in respect of the holders of sporting rights.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. James Clappison): I agree with the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) that sports clubs play an important role in communities across England, Wales and Scotland. I, too, would like to pay tribute to the individuals whose voluntary efforts help to sustain those clubs which play such an important part in the community, especially for young people. It is because of the potential value of sports clubs to the community that they are eligible for 100 per cent. rate relief at the discretion of the local authority.

I believe that it is right that discretion should continue to rest with the local authorities since they are in the best position to decide which club is of genuine benefit to the community. Local authorities will know the needs of the local community and will be able to judge the importance of particular sports clubs in the light of the range of services already on offer. Not all such clubs will be equally deserving. Even those that are not conducted for profit may have constitutions or membership rules that effectively exclude sections of the community. In all the circumstances it is appropriate that relief should be discretionary.

As the hon. Gentleman said, the funding of discretionary relief was discussed in Committee. Local authorities in Scotland can grant discretionary relief to non-profit-making sports clubs in the same way as they can in England and Wales. In England and Wales, however, 25 per cent. of the cost must be met by the local authority, whereas in Scotland the Exchequer meets the full cost. I appreciate that, because of those arrangements, sports clubs in England and Wales may consider that they are at a disadvantage compared with their colleagues north of the border. That is certainly an anomaly and we are as keen as anyone to avoid such anomalies.

Changes to the funding arrangements are a matter for secondary legislation. I and my colleagues at the Welsh Office and Scottish Office propose therefore to undertake a review of how discretionary relief is funded in England, Wales and Scotland with a view to providing consistent treatment for all sports clubs. We will aim to complete that review by the time that the Bill receives Royal Assent. In the meantime, I invite the hon. Gentleman to accept my arguments about why discretionary relief should be awarded. I invite him to accept what I said about the review that we will carry out into the funding of that relief and to withdraw the new clause.

Mr. Nick Ainger (Pembroke): On the anomaly between England and Wales and Scotland, can the Minister assure the House that the review will not have any detrimental effect on Scotland?

Mr. Clappison: I would not like to pre-empt or prejudge how that review will be conducted. We have all accepted that there is a case for such a review and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that our approach to it is constructive.

I should like to share the timely sentiments that the hon. Member for Western Isles expressed about English cricket, although we may diverge on other sports.

Mr. Macdonald: I am grateful to the Minister for his constructive reply.

I am happy to withdraw the new clause on the assumption that the result of the review will not mean that clubs in Scotland end up being liable for rates or that their local authorities will end up losing some of the support that they currently receive. The Minister would not be a popular person if he chose to go down that road. I look forward to seeing the results of the review. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 1

RELIEF FROM NON-DOMESTIC RATES FOR GENERAL STORES ETC. IN RURAL SETTLEMENTS: ENGLAND AND WALES

Ms Armstrong: I beg to move amendment No. 38, in page 20, leave out lines 21 to 23 and insert—

'(a) on the day concerned the hereditament is

(i) within a settlement identified in the billing authority's rural settlement list for the chargeable financial year, or

(ii) is designated by the billing authority as being used for purposes which are of benefit to the local community'.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 29, in page 20, line 29, leave out from beginning to end of line 5 on page 21 and insert

'any conditions prescribed by the Secretary of State by order are satisfied'.

No. 30, in page 21, line 37, leave out '(ii)'.

No. 31, in schedule 2, page 23, leave out lines 2 to 23 and insert

'any conditions prescribed by the Secretary of State by order are satisfied'.

Ms Armstrong: In many senses the amendment brings us back to the debate on the definition of a general store and a post office which kept us busy for some time in Committee. We simply want the Government to think about the matter.

As it stands, the Bill makes it clear that to be eligible for mandatory rate relief a hereditament must fulfil several key conditions. It must be situated in a rural settlement with 3,000 people or fewer; it must be used as a general store or post office; it must be the only general store or post office within the settlement; and it must have a rateable value below an amount prescribed by the Secretary of State by order.

In Committee, we discussed in detail what was a post office or a general store. The argument about that definition relates to where such a facility may be located. We were concerned particularly about urban areas where relative social exclusion and social deprivation have meant that the role of the urban post office or general store is now similar to that of the village post office or village general store. The Government went some way towards trying to meet those concerns in Committee, for which we were, and are, grateful. They made it clear that the Secretary of State intends to designate rural areas even when they may fall within the boundary of a metropolitan district and be on the edge of a much larger conurbation.

In Committee, several of my hon. Friends raised that issue and were grateful for the Government's response. However, there remains the problem of urban estates that may be at the edge of a conurbation, but be isolated because their residents do not move from the estate very much. In Committee the Minister said that that issue could be tackled through the use of the single regeneration budget.

I have been considering the matter and I do not believe that the SRB is designed to help struggling general post offices or general stores in an urban area. The SRB is important in terms of raising an area's economic status and improving it generally. There is no doubt that, if that happens, the ability of the general store or post office to survive will improve, but the size of the SRB fund means that there is no chance of every estate with such a problem being able to use it. In addition, the SRB programme is designed to tackle much more comprehensive situations than the sort of problem that the Bill seeks to resolve.

I understood what the Minister was trying to say, but he did not give an adequate answer. I shall not seek to press the amendment to a vote, but I ask the Minister to recognise that the responses that we have received so far are not sufficient. Problems exist on some bleak and desolate urban estates that are similar to those of a rural village. It is the responsibility of the House not to forget that problem when we tackle similar problems in rural areas. It is in that spirit that I have moved the amendment.

Mr. Rendel: I am delighted to have the opportunity to speak to amendments Nos. 29, 30 and 31, which go to the heart of the decision on how discretionary or mandatory relief should be given to local businesses. I think that all hon. Members are aware of the needs of small businesses in rural areas and of the benefit that the Bill may bring to some of our smaller rural communities, but the way in which that benefit is to be given has to be questioned. The aim of my amendments is to enable all the rate relief to be given on a discretionary basis rather than the mandatory basis contained in the Bill.

One of the most interesting aspects of the Government's decision to make some of the relief mandatory is that, in other areas of their business, they have been keen to try to ensure that where Government money is handed out it is targeted on those who are most in need. That has happened in the past with discretionary rate relief and, more recently, with the Government's benefit legislation. It seems odd that in this instance the Government are moving away from targeting the rate relief on those who are most in need and moving towards a generalised policy of giving rate relief of at least 50 per cent. to certain types of business even if some of them do not need it.

Once again, we come back to the important principle of subsidiarity, which lies at the heart of my amendments. In Committee I said that it was odd that the Government should go for a half-and-half policy; my point was not properly answered. Half the rate relief for post offices and general stores is to be mandatory and the other half is to be discretionary.

8.15 pm

In Committee, the Minister said that it was not a half-and-half policy; he said that businesses that were most important for rural villages would receive mandatory relief, but less important businesses would not, but that was not the half-and-half aspect to which I was referring. I was making the point that the Government cannot make up their mind about the best way to give rate relief, even to those businesses that they consider to be the most important in rural areas—small post offices and general stores. They cannot decide whether rate relief should be given on a mandatory or discretionary basis. I see no logic behind this half-and-half system, where some of the relief can be left up to the discretion of the local authority and some of it has to be decided here in Westminster.

The one criticism of the amendments that has been made, and which may, if not properly understood, concern some smaller local authorities that may benefit from rate relief, is that some of them simply would not have the money to give discretionary relief. It is clear that the Government will set aside the money in their future Budgets as soon as the rate relief system is introduced. That money can be distributed in a number of ways. If the mandatory part of the Bill were removed, it would be possible for the Government to decide, in next year's rate support settlement, that some of that money should be used directly to enhance rate support for those local authorities that are expected to pass on rate relief on a discretionary basis. If that is done, there is no reason to assume that any local authority will be worse off as a result of using discretionary powers. The discretionary powers will be properly available to them, as will the money to use them. Therefore, the small businesses that need the rate relief will receive it.

I firmly believe that local people know best where to spend the money. I was happy to hear that that belief was strongly supported by two Conservative Members who spoke on new clause 1. If councils believe that the right way to use the money that they will have in future is to give discretionary relief to local businesses, they will do so. If they do not believe that, they should have the right to choose how best that money should be spent. Some authorities may have greater needs for the money than rate relief for small businesses. It is their choice; they are in the best position to know. Some local authorities may give much more discretionary relief than the Government currently envisage.

By making part of the rate relief mandatory, the Government are showing that they do not trust local government to support vital rural businesses in the way that all hon. Members would like them to be supported. It is a case of, "We know better than them." The Government are saying that they know better than local authorities where the rate relief is needed, but that is not true, and I was happy to have the support of two Conservative Members on that issue. The amendments provide a touchstone to show the commitment of parties in the House to the principle of subsidiarity, of devolving powers to the lowest level, and of trusting local authorities to take the right decisions for their people because they are in the best position to make the right decisions. Because the amendments go to the very heart of the principle of subsidiarity, I shall do everything I can to force a Division on them tonight.

Mr. Curry: I am grateful to the hon. Member for North–West Durham (Ms Armstrong) for the way in which she introduced her amendment, saying that she wanted to extend further the debate about isolated shops. She was effectively talking about estates that are rather remote from cities.

I hope we agree that, in practice, the relief scheme might be of little assistance in such cases. Generally speaking, in villages, there are unlikely to be a range of social problems affecting the environment in which a shop operates—basically, it is a question of numbers. In urban areas, there are far more likely to be adverse factors arising from the broader environment in which a shop operates. Such factors may include a deficiency in purchasing power, social problems, vandalism and crime—in short, the sort of problems that we have seen in city challenge areas.

Whereas in a village one can address the specific problem of a shop in terms of a deficiency in its financial buoyancy, in urban areas one has to look mainly at the general environment. In such areas, the sort of schemes I spoke about—the single regeneration budget schemes, of which there will shortly be 500 throughout the country—can be of assistance. If the hon. Lady would like to discuss how SRB schemes or other Government programmes can incorporate the sort of problems she raised, I should be happy to oblige her. Such programmes have to be developed, and each succeeding round brings its own lessons. When discussing such issues, I can wear my urban regeneration hat as well.

As for the points raised by the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel), I recall that when I was in the Committee on what became the Housing Act 1996, the Liberal Democrat spokesman spoke at great length about how wicked was our intention to do things by order and through secondary legislation. He said that everything should be on the face of the Bill. The hon. Gentleman is now saying that it is terrible that everything appears on the face of the Bill, and that discretionary powers should be used. That would give my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment gargantuan powers.

The hon. Gentleman overlooks the fact that, under the amendment, the Secretary of State would have to prescribe the conditions that have to be fulfilled before the relief was exercised. I know that my right hon. Friend will be deeply touched by the hon. Gentleman's confidence in him, but, for once, my right hon. Friend believes that this responsibility and power should be expressed clearly and defined by Parliament. The purpose of the Bill is simple, easy to administer, easy to deliver and easy to understand. Local authorities have made it clear that there will be no problem applying it.

The village shop and post office in the circumstances that we have described represent a clear and definable case for assistance. We should extend mandatory assistance to them so that they can be sure they will receive that assistance. The measure is an indication of our willingness to address the real concerns affecting those areas. I am, therefore, not willing to transfer that assistance into a discretionary relief. We have tried to be precise in our intentions, and our action has been welcomed. If we were to accept amendment No. 29, we would remove certainty, clarity and simplicity from the Bill, so I cannot commend it to the House.

Amendment negatived.

GRANTS FOR BUS SERVICES

Mr. Clappison: I beg to move amendment No. 32, in page 15, line 38, leave out 'in the council's area'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 23, in page 15, line 39, after 'area', insert

'or which serves the needs of persons living within the Council's area.

Government amendments Nos. 33 and 24.

Mr. Clappison: Amendments Nos. 32, 33 and 24 fulfil undertakings we gave in Committee, and I believe that they will be widely welcomed. On that basis, I hope that the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) will feel able to withdraw amendment No. 23.

Mr. Rendel: I shall not detain the House long on this amendment. I was delighted to see that one of my amendments had been taken over by the Government, particularly as I had already tabled it for this debate before the Government tabled their amendments. I moved this precise amendment in Committee, when the Minister said that he would look at it again and bring forward a technically proven amendment on Report. I am delighted to hear that my original amendment in Committee and this amendment on Report have now been proved by him to be technically competent.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 33, in page 16, line 4, after 'if' insert—

'(a) the bus service benefits, or appears to the council likely to benefit, persons living in the council's area, and

No. 24, in page 16, leave out lines 8 to 10.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Schedule 3

MINOR AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS

Mr. Clappison: I beg to move amendment No. 35, in page 24, line 9, at end insert—

'Local Government (Financial Provisions etc.) (Scotland) Act 1962 (c.9)

. In section 4 of the Local Government (Financial Provisions etc.) (Scotland) Act 1962 (reduction and remission of rates)—

(a) in subsection (5) for "the following subsection" there is substituted "subsection (6) or, as the case may be, (6A) of this section",

(b) in subsection (6) for "the following subsection" there is substituted "subsection (7) of this section", and

(c) after subsection (6) there is inserted—

"(6A) Without prejudice to subsection (6) of this section, where any reduction or remission of rates is determined under subsection (5) of this section in the first six months of a year, the reduction or remission may be granted—

(a) for the preceding year;

(b) for a specified term of years, not exceeding five, beginning not earlier than the preceding year nor more than twenty four months after the date of the determination;

(c) for an indefinite period beginning not earlier than the preceding year, subject to the exercise by the rating authority of their powers under subsection (7) of this section.".'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendment No. 36.

Mr. Clappison: The purpose of the amendment is to give local authorities greater flexibility at the end of the financial year to deal with certain cases where otherwise injustices would arise as a result of the year coming to an end and not working with council procedures.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 36, in page 27, line 28, at end insert—

'. In section 47(7) (discretionary relief), after "made" there is inserted "more than six months".'.—[Mr. Clappison.]

Order for Third Reading read.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Queen's consent? I shall suspend the sitting for five minutes owing to a technicality.

Sitting suspended.

8.41 pm

On resuming—

Queen's Consent, on behalf of the Crown, and Prince of Wales's Consent, on behalf of the Duchy of Cornwall, signified.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Mr. Rendel: I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak briefly on Third Reading. We discussed subsidiarity earlier this evening, but there is one aspect about which, for various reasons, we have not spoken.

We failed to get across the point about whether discretionary or mandatory relief should be given, and the point about the powers of parish councils. It is sad that the Bill afforded yet another opportunity that was not taken up by the Government: the chance for London boroughs to have parish councils.

Since the matter was raised in Committee, there has been a great increase in interest in whether London boroughs should be allowed to have parish councils. A number of campaigns have begun, and it was reported in the Evening Standard that many Labour councillors in London support the idea, although their party did not support the relevant amendment in Committee.

I hope that the amendment will be moved in the House of Lords, as that is now the only chance of its being including in the Bill. That is a strong possibility. The matter was raised once before in this House—a Bill on London parish councils was introduced about 20 years ago. Its purpose was to make changes in the administration of local government in Greater London by the establishment of London parish councils. The Bill was presented by the then hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam, Mr. Graham Tope, now Lord Tope. Among the Bill's supporters was the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer). I should be interested to know whether he still supports the principle.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

Chesterfield Tribunal Suite

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Ainsworth.]

8.44 pm

Mr. Harry Barnes (North–East Derbyshire): The subject of the debate is the closure of the Chesterfield tribunal suite. In normal circumstances, my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) would be present, as the tribunal is located in his constituency, but he has flu and cannot be with us tonight; my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is present—all three of our constituencies are affected by the closure.

From correspondence that the Minister has sent me, I know that an apology will be made later on certain matters in which he is involved and which affect aspects of the matter under debate.

The Chesterfield tribunal suite operates under the independent tribunal service. It hears about 1,000 cases each year and has a six-month backlog, with 329 cases outstanding on social security matters alone. Throughout the whole of the east midlands last year, 4,591 cases were dealt with, and that figure includes the considerable work load of the Chesterfield tribunal suite.

Five types of case are heard: appeals on social security matters, appeals on disability living allowance and so on, child support appeals, vaccine damage appeals and medical appeals. Sixty per cent. of the Chesterfield tribunal suite's cases are social security appeals, 20 per cent. are disability appeals and 20 per cent. cover the other three types.

The catchment area is wide, covering sections of west Derbyshire from Buxton to Matlock, virtually all the constituencies and districts of Amber Valley, Bolsover, North-East Derbyshire and Chesterfield. As the Mansfield suite was closed in February 1996, cases from Nottinghamshire are also occasionally dealt with in Chesterfield.

In many cases, representatives appear on behalf of the appellant. It is estimated that 50 per cent. of Chesterfield's cases are attended by representatives of various organisations assisting the appellant. That compares with a figure of 25 per cent. nationally and for the east midlands. The Minister may have more accurate information; those figures were supplied by the organisations involved.

The bodies that represent appellants include the welfare rights service of Derbyshire county council, which covers about 60 per cent. of cases. Nottinghamshire county council's similar service is occasionally involved. Representatives of citizens advice bureaux from a wide area attend, including those from Chesterfield, Staveley, North-East Derbyshire, Matlock and Worksop. Trade unions such as Unison, the Amalgamated Engineering and Electrical Union, the GMB and the National Union of Mineworkers, and bodies such as the Chesterfield law centre, the Derbyshire unemployed workers centre, the Chesterfield support network and Incapacity Action are involved. A wide range of organisations, many centred in Chesterfield, are concerned with the well-being of citizens who are dependent on benefits, and who often encounter difficulty in the interpretation of their cases and need assistance.

[Mr. Harry Barnes]

The appeals procedures were changed last year under SI 2540, Social Security (Adjudication) and Child Support Amendment (No. 2) Regulations 1996. I believe that that change affects four of the five areas—vaccine damage is excepted—that I have mentioned. However, the traditional pattern of procedure still operates—I shall describe that which applies in the social security area. Recommendations are issued by the independent tribunal service, which supervises the activities of tribunals, and hearings are held in public unless there are agreed exceptional circumstances. If hearings are to be public, I think that it is more sensible to hold them locally. Any decisions reached by tribunals are likely to have local significance and to affect local organisations, including some of those that I have mentioned. If hearings were held further afield, it would be more difficult to translate the information at a local level.

People have a right to attend appeals hearings and be heard—although it is argued that the statutory instrument to which I referred discourages that practice. It is much easier for people to attend, present their case and be heard if hearings are held locally. People will feel much more comfortable in a local setting. The appeals procedure is traumatic enough without requiring people to travel to distant parts and present their case in unfamiliar surroundings.

The independent tribunal service procedure guidelines state that appellants should be put at ease. That is much more likely to occur—although it will always be difficult to achieve—if hearings are held in familiar surroundings where people may be represented by local bodies with which they are associated. The appeals board is expected to determine the facts by questioning the appellants and their representatives—although the statutory instrument seems to suggest that it should deal with matters of law and that the facts of the case should be resolved at an earlier stage. Nevertheless, the sequence of events is significant.

The results of appeals are very interesting. The Minister provided some figures on 4 November 1996 in answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) about social security appeals and the all work test. They show that 46.2 per cent of appeals were successful. The success rate was roughly the same for cases that were presented by either the appellant or his representative—46.3 per cent. for the appellant and 45.8 per cent for the appellant's representative. However, 67.3 per cent of cases were successful when the appellant and the representative appeared together. When neither the appellant nor his representative attended the hearing, the success rate was only 6.5 per cent.

The results for other tribunals follow a similar pattern, and the pattern in Chesterfield is of that nature: the most successful hearings by far are those where the appellant and his representative appear together, and the least successful are those where no one turns up. If the Chesterfield tribunal suite is closed and people are forced to travel further afield, there is an increased danger that they will fail to attend hearings—or, at best, only the appellant will turn up. That will reduce the appellant's chance of achieving a successful outcome, as the best results are achieved when both the appellant and his representative are in attendance. I cannot stress that point too strongly: the success rate of appeals hearings will suffer if the closure takes place.

Why has the tribunal been threatened with closure? I refer to "The Annual Report of the Council of Tribunals for 1995-96", which was laid before Parliament by the Lord High Chancellor and Lord Advocate pursuant to section 4(7) of the Tribunals and Inquiries Act 1992. It was ordered to be printed by the House of Commons on 17 December 1996. Page 52 states:

"The President"—

the president of the independent tribunal service—

"informed our Chairman in December 1995 that they had appointed an Estates Manager to establish their accommodation policy, and it was hoped that the appointee would be reporting on needs, demands and overall policy, by the autumn 1996. The Estates Manager subsequently explained to our Secretariat that the Independent Tribunal Service were preparing their accommodation plan against a requirement to reduce their accommodation costs by 30 per cent. over three years."

The policy to reduce accommodation costs considerably is affecting the tribunal service. Between January and early November 1996, no fewer than nine venues were closed—at Mansfield, which is near Chesterfield, Bridgend, Merthyr Tydfil, Pontypridd, Gloucester, Yeovil, Huddersfield, Scunthorpe and Paisley. Those closures took place despite the fact that the tribunal's report said that it would move towards considerable cuts late in 1996. Those cuts took place in advance of the schedule set out in the report.

In a written answer that will be a matter of some discussion, in which he was given the information about the nine venues that had closed, my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West was also informed:

"The independent tribunal service has no plans to close any other venues."—[Official Report, 4 November 1996; Vol. 285, c. 386.]

The Minister sent me a letter today, before the debate, in which he pointed out that there were inaccuracies in the previous answer and that it should have been different in the circumstances. People in the area are considerably agitated, because things were said in the House that turned out not to be correct, and the independent tribunal service was moving towards closure programmes, which had been denied in the earlier answer.

On 14 January 1997, it was announced at a meeting of tribunal users that the Chesterfield tribunal suite was to be closed. Furthermore, that announcement is in conflict with letters that Members of Parliament for the area have received. I refer in particular to a letter sent to my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield on 6 January, from the operation manager of the Birmingham region of the independent tribunal service, which said:

"As yet, however, there has been no formal decision about closure. We will continue to consult with all local interested parties and this process will include discussion on whether, having perhaps closed the permanent venue, we can/should identify a suitable casual venue that could be used on an ad-hoc basis. A tribunal user group meeting has been arranged for 14 January and it is hoped that some of the issues raised by local welfare rights groups can be addressed more fully.

I will ensure that all interested parties are notified of any developments in this matter."

However, at the meeting on 14 January, which was attended by 40 people from user groups, and by those who support user groups, it was announced that the venue was to close and that any consultations would be about not the closure of the venue but the mechanism of transformation, or possibly the establishment of a casual venue. That resulted in a powerful reaction in the area, because people expected that the meeting would occur at a stage in the process of consultation on whether the venue would close.

I have given the Minister prior notice of a number of questions so that he can provide answers. I shall elaborate on each question. First, when was the decision made to close the Chesterfield suite? Was it made by 4 November, when the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West was answered in Hansard? Was it made by 6 January, when the letter went to my hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield? Had it been made by 17 January, when early-day motion 354 was submitted, which had the support of my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield and of my hon. Friends the Members for Bolsover and for Mansfield (Mr. Meale)? Exactly when was the decision taken?

Secondly, who was involved in the decision-making process? Had any prior consultation taken place? The letter that the Minister sent to me earlier suggests that there was some consultation, because letters were flowing between Members of Parliament and the industrial tribunal service. To my knowledge, those letters arose because of objections from Members of Parliament, and they received answers. I think that that was the approach with many user organisations as well.

Thirdly, what criterion is used when deciding to close the venue? Is it mainly costs? Is any consideration given to what benefit the tribunal's operations might have to the local community that it serves? There will be financial benefits within that community. Are they assessed in any way against the revenue costs involved, perhaps per case?

Fourthly, what are the accommodation costs of the Chesterfield suite? Is any consideration given to the moneys, for example, that it raises for the local economy? If we had that information, perhaps we could judge the cost criterion among the interested groups, individuals and Members of Parliament.

Fifthly, what other venues are to be closed? In particular, is the Derby venue safe, given the closure in February 1996 of the nearby Mansfield venue? Derby is a single tribunal suite similar to the Chesterfield model. If it were also under threat, there would be no provision in Derbyshire. That is not to say that the maintenance of the Derby suite would be adequate for north Derbyshire, because many cases would be directed to Sheffield rather than to the other end of the county.

Sixthly, are there plans to abolish and replace the independent tribunal service? A number of people have expressed their concerns about that. Seventhly, is the current closure programme due to pressures on the ITS? Has it come up with a programme of reduced costs in response to those pressures?

Eighthly, why was the closure of the Chesterfield suite announced without proper prior consultation with interested parties? Ninthly, is not the decision to close the suite contrary to the written answer that was given to my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West? I suspect that the Minister will say that it was, but that a further answer has been provided, so there has been a retrospective adjustment. I am not sure that retrospective adjustments are acceptable; it is the information in the original answer that has affected the position until now. Only now, in this debate, will the problems be clearly explained to us, and we can respond to that.

My final question is, can the decision to close the Chesterfield suite be withdrawn, at least to allow the promised consultation on its future genuinely to take place? There are strong reasons for holding such consultation, given the written answers in Hansard on 4 November.

A high representational level at Chesterfield would be helpful to the tribunal service. Welfare rights bodies and bodies such as the unemployed workers centre discuss cases, and if they do not stand much of a chance, because the facts of the case do not comply with the regulations, they are weeded out. It is helpful to have well-organised experts who can advise people locally.

If people want me to put a case to the ombudsman, I feel that it is my duty to ensure that they put their case as fully as possible; otherwise, I say to them, "No, this is not a matter for the ombudsman. You would be better going to a solicitor. There are other avenues that you could take first, so that your case is stronger at a later stage." The bodies in the area are as well organised as they can be with limited resources. They have expertise, and can offer this type of assistance.

The alternative to the Chesterfield suite is in Sheffield. It is not in the centre of Sheffield, so some people have to make three or four bus journeys. It has been argued that that is no different from people having to travel from north Derbyshire to Sheffield for social and shopping purposes, but that is not so. As it is not in the centre, people have to travel to Attercliffe. Judge Keith Bassingthwaighte, president of the industrial tribunal service, advanced that argument in a letter which, although it has been circulated quite widely, has not been sent to local Members of Parliament.

Many people in the area are in the poverty trap. They do not have cars, or access to them. People living in areas in my constituency such as Danesmoor and Holmewood would find it very difficult to get to the other side of Sheffield. The Minister may say that the tribunal service can offer alternative facilities, and in some circumstances it is possible to use taxis, but even with the Chesterfield suite it is not easy to establish such an arrangement.

"A Guide to Reviews and Appeals", NI 260, contains a section on taxis and hired cars. Page 89 states:

"You can claim for the hire of a taxi or private car if:

you are unfit to travel by public transport (this could be because of age or infirmity) or public transport is not available at a suitable time.

You will be asked to give a written explanation.

You should get a receipt for expenses. If the DSS agrees that a taxi is necessary and you would like the fare to be paid in advance, arrangements can be made with the taxi company for a bill to be sent direct to the DSS for payment."

That is clear when we study the detail, but the arrangement is not simple or straightforward for those who are trying to deal with officialdom, and to obtain what assistance they can.

Not only appellants but bodies representing them will be affected. In many cases, the further afield they are supposed to be going, the harder they will find it to act on behalf of individuals. The problem will be as bad for them as it is for appellants, if not worse.

It is difficult for people even to use the current provision. In many instances, the pressure of dealing with an alien system full of rules and difficulties puts people off. The Derbyshire unemployed workers centre, operating from Chesterfield, published the case of a Mansfield man who had written to the centre. He had tried to cancel his appeal, and had then refused to attend. He wrote:

"I have been made sick by the trauma which has been put on me and I wish I had never started this nightmare.

The laws and rules are against you before you start anything.

I have not been sleeping at night worrying about the Tribunal. I will stay on my small pension.

It's worse than being tried for murder.

So please do as you like. I can't do anything about it. I am trying to put the nightmare out of my mind. Please, please leave me alone and let me forget this nightmare".

We do not know the details of that case. Perhaps the individual concerned had a particular problem; perhaps a bit of counselling and assistance would have enabled the case to be pursued. It does, however, illustrate the daunting nature of the procedure for many people, and that procedure should not be made even more daunting.

The context of the tribunal procedures has been affected by the statutory instrument to which I referred earlier. Many people feel that they are under pressure to forgo oral hearings. Things will be more difficult in the Chesterfield tribunal, but the move to Sheffield will add to the problems.

I forwarded to the Minister a letter from my constituent, Mr. Marsden-Jones of Holymoorside, who helps at a citizens advice bureau. The Minister replied:

"Mr. Marsden-Jones is concerned with oral hearings, on which there has been a misunderstanding of the effect of the regulations. Articles in the Press have fuelled that misunderstanding. Those opposed to the change have contended that it represents a reduction in an appellant's rights. I can assure you that it does not; the right to an oral hearing remains absolute."

I know that that right remains, but the rest of the Minister's explanation suggests why people might turn to the procedures less and less. He continued:

"Appellants are being asked at the outset if they want to attend the hearing of their appeal and if they do not reply, or say no, arrangements will be made for the appeal to be heard on the papers. Appellants can change their minds at any time up to the issue of the tribunal decision on the case. This change is designed to identify in advance those appellants who will not be attending so that the Independent Tribunal Service can arrange its work more efficiently."

However, that change also means that appellants are more likely to be persuaded by the rules to forgo their right of appearance; they will be encouraged to pursue appeals through written documentation.

"As Mr. Marsden-Jones is aware, some appellants undoubtedly find the prospect of appearing at even an informal hearing daunting. We believe that they would welcome the opportunity to appeal, and still have the opportunity to respond to the adjudication officer's contentions, but not feel obliged to appear in person."

I grant that there is a sense in which that might be true for some people, but the Minister is really saying that the procedure is good because it works in cutting the number of oral cases. I do not think that its operation will benefit the people concerned.

Mr. Marsden-Jones said:

"As a volunteer in the CAB for over nine years my experience is with the 'real world'. The average member of the public cannot be aware of the implications for them of the ever increasing benefit and disability legislation, consequently we only see a very small percentage of those with legitimate claims. It is crucial therefore that these changes do not further prejudice their chances at appeal. I feel strongly that these changes should be challenged and that careful monitoring will prove this to be well founded."

Even if my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover and I persuade the Minister to put off closure of the Chesterfield tribunal suite, many problems will remain for it and its equivalents elsewhere. Certainly, the difficulties increase the further away such services are from centres of population.

Until now, the House has been misled about whether there would be further closures, but I know that that situation will be corrected. Retrospective answers are not entirely satisfactory. That is another reason why the closure statement should be withdrawn. User organisations should be able to enter into proper consultations so that their points can be fully put and weighed.

Today I received a copy of a letter from Philip Robinson, chairman of CHART '99—the Chesterfield area regeneration team—to the president of the independent tribunal service. He states:

"The main purpose of CHART '99 is the economic regeneration of North Derbyshire and most of our activity is directed to the supply side of market activities. We are, as may appear obvious, also concerned with the demand side of economic life in our area though our interventions are typically more problematic and probably have a tendency towards maintaining positions rather than increasing them.

In our area blighted by pit closures and general 'downsizing' in other local industries, too many of our citizens, through no fault of their own, are dependent on welfare benefits. Our task is to reduce their number by creating jobs. However we can only be concerned that, until we have made significant progress in that direction, the legitimate take up of benefits is maximised."

He goes on to say:

"I am led to understand that just one of the Chesterfield based agencies recovered over £250,000 following appeals and £1.3 million totally. In a stressed economy such as ours, that is not an insignificant sum to place in jeopardy.

I am sure my Board would support me in appealing that you reconsider your decision to remove tribunal facilities in Chesterfield."

There is therefore widespread feeling against closing the suite among trade unions and organisations in the Chesterfield area—such as CHART '99, for example. They are very concerned about the matter and urge the Government to ensure that the doors are not closed and that a consultation exercise—which they had expected to occur—is undertaken. They understand that the ITS is involved in a rationalisation programme, but believe that there should first be consultation. I ask that we first fully consider all the factors, so that perhaps some of the heat that has built up on the issue in the Chesterfield area can be diffused.

9.21 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for North–East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) for stepping in for me last week on a point of order on this matter to Madam Speaker. He asked her whether she could intervene in the issue, and she very kindly told him that he should use his ways and means to try to raise it in the House, and that he might be allowed 15 minutes to do so. Today, the net result has been that he has been able to speak on it at much greater length than we had expected, because the House finished its business early.

I also compliment my hon. Friend on his chronology of events leading up to the meeting with Mr. Coulthard, the regional director of the independent tribunal service. Last week, in Chesterfield, Mr. Coulthard met my friends and other people's friends, who thought that they were going to meet him for consultation on the proposed closure of the Chesterfield tribunal suite.

Those people thought that the meeting would allow them an opportunity to make a case against the closure, but, lo and behold, it turned out to be a completely different type of meeting. Contrary to what we have been told by the Tory Minister, who said that consultation was on the way, the director told them, "There ain't any consultation; we've come here to sound a death knell," such as has been sounded over factories and pits across Britain, especially in our area.

For some years before I was elected as a Member of Parliament, I represented many people—mostly miners with whom I worked in the coalfield—at tribunals. It was not unusual for me to go to places such as Sutton in Ashfield, which is in a neighbouring constituency, to Chesterfield, to Mansfield or to a medical appeal tribunal in Nottingham to represent disabled people. Although we occasionally fought other cases, by and large we made representations on behalf of people who worked in the coal mining industry who would be gasping for breath when we met them on the stairs. They were casualties of the coal mining industry and people who needed help, and we operated with that in mind.

My job as those people's representative was to make a case on their behalf and say, "Look here, you got it wrong. This person should have the special hardship allowance." The Government changed the hardship allowance to the reduced earnings allowance, and then reduced the reduced earnings allowance from about £40 to about £9 a week. The people represented at last week's meeting are the same type of casualties who want to appeal against what they regard as harsh decisions. As my hon. Friend pointed out, other groups now need to be represented, some of whose appeals relate to disablement benefits. However, in the main, it is still the same kind of operation with which I was involved.

Recently—since I came to the House—the Sutton in Ashfield venue was closed, and then the Mansfield venue closed. That meant more people having to go to the Chesterfield tribunal to have their cases heard. As my hon. Friend asked, is it any wonder that Chesterfield not only has to deal with more than 1,000 cases a year but has a backlog of more than 300, according to the local social security office? They are not our figures—we have not culled them from a Marxist periodical—but the Government's figures.

We fervently believed that our friends were going to take part in a consultation to try to convince the regional director of the need to keep the Chesterfield venue open. Parts of a total of six constituencies are affected. The total area covered includes High Peak and Buxton and extends to west Derbyshire. Much of the area is rural and descends into Bolsover, which is nearly 30 miles long and contains 20-odd villages. My hon. Friend's constituency probably also has 20 villages.

Bus services in those areas are poor, and the people affected by the closure are the very ones who had difficulty getting even to Chesterfield, but are now being required to make the long trek not just to Sheffield but to the far side of Sheffield. We have calculated that, in future, some people going to appeal against decisions will have one train ride and two or three bus rides—in some cases, four.

In the past few years, some of us—my hon. Friend in particular—have been fighting for equal rights for disabled people. We have been told time without number that the Government are anxious to help the disabled and give them equal rights, so they introduced a Bill—it was a tinpot Bill and not what we wanted, but the Government claimed that it was going to provide some form of equality.

I have to say that one cannot provide equality to disabled people by closing appeal venues and calling on those people to go to Chesterfield station, down the steep hill—it is not on the flat—get off the train at Sheffield and find their way to the other side of the city. And all for what? Presumably the aim is to save money.

The people affected live in an area where there used to be 30-odd coal mines and some factories associated with the mining industry. They have all been closed; not a single pit remains—but the casualties are still there.

Surveys carried out in my constituency and that of my hon. Friend found that, in some areas, unemployment is more than 50 per cent. Of course, not all the unemployed get unemployment benefit. Some get the benefits to which my hon. Friend referred—that is the nature of things. The unemployment figures are phoney. We are dealing not with the same work force that we once had but with people who probably need benefits of one kind or another, and need to appeal against decisions on those benefits to a greater extent than was the case when all the pits were open.

The area is generally rural. If it was a chunk of a city, I could understand some civil servants sitting in their room and charting out a little place for a tribunal venue. We are talking, however, about all or part of six constituencies; we are talking about a population of well over 300,000. All those involved are having to tramp up and down to get their cases heard.

We are not talking about golden handshakes, are we? There is a world of difference between somebody receiving a golden handshake and somebody appealing at the Chesterfield tribunal for a benefit of the kind that my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Derbyshire described. We are talking about a few pounds a week in some cases, not about the golden handshakes that are handed out to the fat cats in the City. Is it any wonder that, when the consultations took place last week, there were 30-odd representatives from the unemployed workers centre, from every local authority, from all the unions concerned and from the citizens advice bureau, whose workers do their jobs on a voluntary basis?

It was not just Labour people who attended the meeting; there were people from other political parties. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Derbyshire referred to Mr. Robinson. He is part of a well-known Tory family in Chesterfield; there are not many left. He is head of some quango, as one would expect, but even he has put his name alongside the names of those who want the Chesterfield tribunal to remain in operation.

[Mr. Dennis Skinner]

This is a class issue; I know that this is only an Adjournment debate, but it is a class issue. There are people who can make money when they leave their jobs, but we are talking about people who are scratching about for a few pounds a week, and who are being told that they have got to go to Sheffield.

The net result—they probably know this—is that the Government will save a bit of money because some people will not be able to make the journey. Everyone knows that disabled people have to weigh up the consequences of marching here, there and everywhere. For disabled people, it is a matter not just of sitting on a bus, but of the problem of having to go through a bit of exercise. The time they will have to spend is also a problem. Some of them want to be at home; they do not want to travel for more than two hours to Sheffield, attend the tribunal and then have a journey of more than two hours back home.

The Government should play the game. The answers that I and my hon. Friends received led us to believe that there would be a nice little consultation and that we could rely on the people from the local authorities and the others to put forward such a sterling case that the tribunal would be able to survive. That did not happen, and it is unfair.

On that count alone, the Minister should say, "Let's turn the clock back. A wrong has been done." The Minister gave me a parliamentary answer that turned out not to be true. We think that he will admit that tonight; he has already done so in a letter to my hon. Friend the Member for North–East Derbyshire. A mistake has been made. As the Minister has made a mistake—he may have done so inadvertently, but a mistake has been made, and somebody has been led up the garden path—he should do the decent thing and say that the Department will start all over again. We are not talking about £60 million for a royal yacht. I only say that en passant, but I am trying to make a comparison. We are talking about a small amount.

The Minister should be big enough to say, "Yes, a wrong has been done. I made a false statement. I didn't realise that the information I received was wrong, and I passed it on to the House. I am sorry. As there has been a mistake, we are going to start the process again."

I have a suggestion for the Minister—my hon. Friend has more or less put it to him as well. Let us not close the door today. Let us have a meeting between Members of Parliament, to which we will bring some of the representatives who were at the meeting last week, so that the case can be put again and they will know that at least some consultation has taken place. If the Minister agrees to that, they will be able to convince him—perhaps more effectively than myself and my hon. Friend—why it is necessary to keep the place open.

Some people say that the Chesterfield tribunal suite is going to close because of the cost. I should tell the Minister, in case he does not know, that the lease for the suite includes other rooms—some of which are unoccupied. That is not the fault of the representatives who go there to put cases on behalf of their clients from the unemployed workers centre, welfare rights groups or citizens advice bureau. It is part of the Government's philosophy to keep such rooms empty. The Government should not blame the representatives for part of the block not being let, or say that the costs are so extreme because of it.

The Minister should not tell us, either—I do not think that he will, although my hon. Friend and I suspect that it is true—that the service is being shifted to Sheffield because his Department has some spare space up there as well. The disabled people who are going to be plodding down the hill to Chesterfield station, plodding back up the other one in Sheffield—another hilly city—and then getting on a bus will have to suffer just because the Minister's Department has not been able to deal with things that are out of other people's control and ensure that the leases get full value for money. That responsibility should belong with the Government.

I could draw a comparison with the Department of Trade and Industry. I have been walking up Victoria street for the past 20-odd years, and over the past five or six, I have been passing closed DTI offices. That closure has cost a small fortune; a third of Victoria street has not been let. It belongs to the Government and has been paid for by the taxpayer. Now, it has opened again. How much has that cost?

We are talking about a little place, where a few representatives go along to meet the chairman of the tribunal, someone from one side of industry and someone from the other to hear the case of someone who has come up the stairs coughing their lungs up, or someone who has a leg missing, or someone who does not have two ha'pennies to rub together. That is a far cry from all the money that has been spent on the DTI offices just up the road.

I could cite many more examples of how the Government have wasted money, such as £6 million on refurbishing the Tea Rooms and other facilities in this place during the long recess. Our friends up in north-east Derbyshire, Bolsover and Chesterfield read the papers, and they cannot understand why they have been picked on in such a fashion. First their jobs have been taken away from them, and then, when they have to appeal to get a few benefits, they are kicked in the gutter.

Judge Bassingthwaighte has told us that his information is that there was a noisy meeting last week with our friends the representatives. They were bound to be noisy. Such was the nature of the response, there were not enough seats. It is very rare to get representatives of every local authority and welfare rights group together in one fell swoop. They had to sit and listen to this fellow say, "There is no consultation. I have come to tell you that the place is going to close."

I am told that, at one point in the meeting, there was a little chink of light, when it was indicated that there might be an opportunity to use another Chesterfield venue on occasions. I do not know whether the Minister knows that.

I have another proposition to put to the Minister, apart from suggesting another meeting. We have a place called the miners' offices, which have a lot of space—after all, there are only a few miners left. If there are cost problems at the Chesterfield suite, the Minister should try the miners' offices—they will come a lot cheaper. Those offices would be ideal, and they are in a good situation in the middle of Chesterfield.

There is a case to be made. The Government's parliamentary answer was not correct: people were led up the garden path. People also felt that that they had a raw deal from consultation. Somebody has to climb down and give those people a second chance to ensure that their cases are put. We are ready and willing—myself, my hon.

Friend the Member for North–East Derbyshire and my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), when he has got over the flu—to meet the Minister.

The Minister or some of his civil servants should go and look at the place. They should visit a few villages. As I said earlier, the tribunal area starts at the bottom of my constituency, including Pinxton and South Normanton, and it extends way out to West Derbyshire and up to Buxton. The Minister or his civil servants should go and see those pretty villages which are all part of that hinterland. Chesterfield and Staveley are highly populated, but the rest are old-fashioned pit villages or farming areas. The area is too big for the tribunal to be moved to Sheffield. The Minister should have a site visit, and take a fresh look before the matter is closed for good.

The issue will not benefit my hon. Friend the Member for North–East Derbyshire and me. I do not suppose that we would be inconvenienced if the suite closed. We would feel guilty about it, but the issue is not about us. It is about disabled people, because most of those people who use that place in order to appeal against threatened reductions in benefits have been damaged in some way, either by their work or in other ways. In many cases, mother nature has not has been as kind to those people as she has to my hon. Friend, the Minister and me. Some of them have been born with disabilities, and are constantly fighting against the system. Instead of telling them that they must travel another 20 or 30 miles to make their appeal, a decent society should enable those people to go round the corner to their village hall or local town council.

The case has been made by my hon. Friend the Member for North–East Derbyshire, and I am here to help him to ask the Minister not to close the book. Give us a another chance to ensure that the Chesterfield tribunal suite, or some other place in Chesterfield, remains open for those people, many of whom are disabled.

9.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under–Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Roger Evans): It is one of the glories of the House of Commons that hon. Members can raise serious constituency interests at length, as has been done this evening. We have listened to two very powerful speeches. I am especially grateful to the hon. Member for North–East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) for writing to me today and setting out a list of his queries. He outlined those queries in his speech, but I have had the courtesy of notice from him and I hope to answer as many of his questions as possible.

I shall begin with the matter of a parliamentary answer, which has been mentioned several times. I gave a written answer to a question tabled by the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn):

"To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which venues have ceased to be used by social security appeals tribunals since January 1996; and which venues it is proposed to cease using."

I answered by listing the nine venues referred to by the hon. Member for North–East Derbyshire, and I will not delay the House by repeating them. I then added:

"The independent tribunal service has no plans to close any other venues".—[Official Report, 4 November 1996; Vol. 285, c. 386.]

I will explain what happened in detail, and then explain why, in my view in retrospect, that was not a satisfactory answer. I shall also apologise. From the point of order raised by the hon. Member for North–East Derbyshire on 15 January, I was aware that the answer had been queried. Since then, I have asked for a number of inquiries to discover precisely what happened.

When a parliamentary question is asked about the activities of the ITS—which is an independent service—information is requested by my officials from the ITS. Officials of the ITS and my Department then liaise on the reply. It is done in this way to be as helpful as possible to parliamentary colleagues and to avoid having to refer them directly to the ITS. At the time that I approved the draft answer submitted to me, I believed that the reply was correct. After the point of order was raised, I ordered a thorough investigation to be made into the circumstances surrounding the preparation of the answer.

What had happened was that the parliamentary question was faxed to an official of the ITS, and a reply was given by telephone. I do not have a written answer from the ITS or a note of that telephone conversation, but it seems reasonable to say that there was a misunderstanding between the two people who dealt with this as to the extent and nature of the question and the reply. When I answered that there were the language was too simple for what was at stake. Does "plan" mean a settled and determined course that has been finally decided? Does it mean a mere proposal? Is it a promise—as the hon. Member for North–East Derbyshire believed—that nothing will happen in the future? That kind of ambiguity should have been resolved by a more detailed wording to explain the background. My view, in retrospect, is that the answer should have stated that the ITS constantly reviews its running costs—of which accommodation forms a large part—and that the ITS was considering the continued usage of a number of tribunal venues. The answer should have stated that liaison with local users was also taking place.

"no plans to close any other venues"

The hon. Member for Bolsover told us this evening—although I was unaware of it at the time of the answer—that he and other parliamentary colleagues had corresponded with the ITS on the Chesterfield situation. Open correspondence concerning Chesterfield had been raised as early as March 1996, and continued with various local interested parties for the rest of the year. But I stress that no firm decision had been made at the time I gave the answer on 4 November.

After making further inquiries, I have been informed that it was not until 17 December 1996 at a management meeting that a provisional conclusion about the viability of the venue was reached. That provisional conclusion remained such so that a meeting could be held with local users on 14 January 1997 where arguments in favour of keeping the venue open could be considered. It is clear from everything that I have read—and from what I have been told this evening—that the meeting of 14 January was, if I can use the most neutral language, not a happy occasion.

The intention of ITS was that arguments could be listened to, and that the decision would be made afterwards. The ITS took the view that no persuasive arguments were raised at that meeting and the decision was made, I am told, the next day—15 January—when it began to be circulated. I apologise unreservedly, as I should have been aware of more of that detail. I should have made further inquiries. Unhappily, I did not, and I gave a simple answer to what was clearly a complex history and background of which, at that time, I was unaware.

I should like to deal with the serious, immediate and practical issues involved, particularly those raised by the hon. Member for North–East Derbyshire about where do we go from here. The hon. Member for Bolsover made a powerful peroration to the effect, "Would the Minister do that and would the Minister do this?" I shall specifically answer his questions in a moment, but the position is not quite as simple as his speech might have suggested.

The independent tribunal service is by statute just that. The responsibility for running the ITS rests with its president, his honour Judge Keith Bassingthwaighte, who is appointed by the Lord Chancellor in accordance with the Social Security Administration Act 1992. He is both the judicial and—this is the unusual feature—the administrative head of the ITS. He is responsible for providing the forum to hear appeals against decisions of adjudicating officers. It is a matter of statute that decisions about tribunal venues, for example—the material matter which we are considering this evening—are a matter for him.

I cannot think of another parallel in Government or in the judicial system in which a judge is responsible by law for administrative matters. It is one of the oddities or unusual features of the ITS. That is one of the very matters considered in the consultation paper on improving decision making and appeals in social security which was mentioned by the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire. It is a matter which the Government are considering now. In due course decisions will be made and subsequently announced.

That is the background to the debate. I should now like to consider the 10 specific questions that the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire asked me. First, he asked when the decision was made to close the Chesterfield tribunal suite. A number of different dates were put to me.

I am advised by the ITS that the final firm decision was made on 15 January 1997 following the unhappy meeting the day before on the 14th. That news was communicated in a press release on 15 January and in a subsequent letter on 20 January from the president to interested parties, including some hon. Members who attended the meeting.

Mr. Barnes: The Minister mentioned a meeting on 17 December 1996 at which a provisional proposal for closure was put forward. It was then made the subject of consultation at the meeting on 14 January. There are clear differences of perception about what occurred at the meeting on 14 January. The ITS is treating it as a consultation meeting at which the user organisations would not focus on the issue. They went away on 15 January and finally made their decision. That is not the perception of the user organisations, which all argue that its representatives were told from the start that the venue was to be closed and that they were only there to be consulted about the method of closure. There is a case to look again more closely at what happened on 14 January because it affects the procedures involved. Although it was not satisfactory to have consultation on the 14th and the decision made on the 15th, with hardly any time to mull things over, it was procedurally permissible because it represented a certain order of things. Did the process occur like that? If not, there is a good case for going back to the beginning of the process.

Mr. Evans: I hear what the hon. Gentleman has said, and I will outline what we should do next when I have finished answering his 10 questions. The hon. Gentleman is saying quite clearly that there is a conflict of view about exactly what happened at the meeting on 14 January. One party appears to take the view that it was a fait accompli and that it was just a question of the mechanics. I readily concede that that is not a proper consultation. The other view, which I gave on instruction, was that the meeting was a consultation.

In fairness, I was not there any more than you were, Mr. Deputy Speaker—all that we can do is rely on those who were and their recollections. His Honour Judge Bassingthwaighte wrote a letter to the various interested parties on 20 January. I imagine that the hon. Gentleman may have seen it. I shall quote from the letter because it is important that both views of the meeting are given. He said:

"I directed that tribunal user groups should be set up throughout the ITS because I wanted to build a better relationship between the ITS and those who use the facilities which we provide. I did so expecting to provide a forum for rational and considered discussion by people who are willing at least to accept that different viewpoints exist, whether or not those viewpoints are ones upon which agreement can be reached. Such meetings have been held widely throughout the ITS during 1996 and have generally been successful, ordered and well received.

I am saddened to hear that the meeting on 14 January was ill-tempered"— the judge was not there; he was reporting what his officials had told him—

"and at times abusive and that a group of representatives left the meeting in a demonstration of dissent. Such behaviour does not augur well for future such meetings."

Neither I nor the judge was there. There are conflicting reports of what happened, but I think that I can describe that meeting with fair accuracy as not a happy one.

Mr. Skinner: The judge does not know any more than us, does he? Many of the people who went to Chesterfield had been to Mansfield earlier in 1996 when it was proposed that Mansfield should close. They did not view the matter with the same importance and they took part in the consultation, which seemed to be at a different level. Many of those who went to Chesterfield were at Mansfield, where there was no animosity, nobody got terribly excited and the decision was finally accepted. The reason why there was such ill-feeling and rancour at the Chesterfield meeting was simply that, having arrived in a crowded room where there were not enough chairs for everyone, people were told, "What's the point of you being here? We're going to close it."

Mr. Evans: I was not present and I cannot helpfully comment on that account, but I readily agree that if that is what happened, it was not a happy way to spend the evening and it was not a constructive consultation exercise.

I was asked who was involved in the decision-making process. I understand that the final decision was taken by the president after consultation with senior and local managers. I was asked what criteria are used when deciding to close a venue. That is a difficult question to answer helpfully. I am advised that the broad principles taken into account include accessibility, suitability, usage of venues and value for money. Having regard to those principles, the ITS decided that Chesterfield did not meet the criteria for remaining open. I was asked what that meant; I was asked what the accommodation costs were at Chesterfield.

I am instructed that the ITS is liable for £128,000 a year in respect of rent and rates and for certain maintenance and utility costs of another £3,500. The point made by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is correct: the ITS occupies only a portion of the building and pays about £28,000 of the rental costs. The ITS is responsible, on its budget, for the balance. Of the ITS budget, £7 million is spent on accommodation; if £100,000 is spent on unutilised accommodation—however it has arisen and whatever the circumstances—that is a sufficiently large sum for concern.

I was asked, not merely to correct the position in respect of Chesterfield, but about what other venues were to be closed. Understandably, the hon. Member for Bolsover asked me specifically about Derby. Let me bring the picture up to date. I stress that it is a matter for the ITS, but I am advised that Derby remains a core area for the maintenance of a tribunal venue for the foreseeable future.

In fairness to other hon. Members, having asked further inquiries to be made, I shall give the picture for other parts of the country. Consideration is being given to a new venue at Chelmsford that would replace the current leased venue at Colchester and poor-quality, casually hired venues in Essex. In Newport, Isle of Wight, consideration is being given to replacing a leased venue with casually hired premises. Bury St. Edmunds cases have been transferred to Ipswich. There is some rationalisation of casually hired venues in London. Barking and Walthamstow appeals are being heard in central London at Whittington house. Discussions are taking place on future plans for Edmonton. On the other hand, new premises have been opened in Blackburn and further new premises are planned for Motherwell.

I was asked specifically whether all that was due to pressure relating to the future of ITS—is it all about abolition? The answer is simply no. Decisions on venues are a matter for ITS. Decisions on the future of the appeals process are elaborately discussed in the document that was mentioned earlier. As I have indicated, the Government are considering the consultation and will make decisions and announce them in due course.

ITS has responsibility for its budget and it has to deal with the problems facing it. It is important that I stress the problems—

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Timothy Wood.]

Mr. Evans: There are serious problems facing ITS. The figures that the hon. Member for Bolsover quoted do not come from Marxist comics; they are, in part, the Department's figures. The striking figure was the six-month wait to get an appeal heard, as mentioned by the hon. Member for North–East Derbyshire, which is typical throughout the country. It is too long and is especially unfortunate because, generally speaking, no benefit is received without the appeal being heard. Cases such as we have discussed should be tried more quickly.

What has happened is that the numbers of appeals have been rising dramatically in recent years. That is partly due to the introduction of incapacity benefit, but there are several other factors. The appeals intake in 1993-94 was 198,000, in the next year, it was 210,000, in 1995-96 it was 236,000, in 1996-97 it was 291,000 and it is anticipated to reach 334,000 in 1997-98. ITS has had the resources to match that. Strikingly, in 1994-95 there was actually an underspend of £5 million and the money was returned to the Department. There was a £2.3 million underspend in 1995 on a budget of £52 million. In 1996, the budget was increased to £54 million and it is not expected that there will be an underspend, but it is intended—this was part of the changed programme of economy measures—that somehow administration costs must be reduced. For 1997-98, the budget in the books is £49 million.

The effect of all that is that while in 1993-94 there were 35,000 sessions a year, that figure will rise to 68,000 in 1996-97. In other words, ITS has almost doubled the number of cases that it is hearing. That is extremely important in the interests of the public and Ministers are greatly concerned that that progress be maintained.

Mr. Skinner: It sounds to me as if, instead of closing the suites, the Government should be turning their attention to opening more. Here we have a massive backlog of cases and a rising number of people who are appealing—mainly, as the Minister said, for incapacity benefit, because about 4 million people have no job. Instead of closing the Chesterfield suite, the Government should open a few more.

Mr. Evans: Would that it was quite as easy as that. The problem is how to use such resources as are at ITS's disposal in the most effective way. I am not making this point in respect of Chesterfield, but, in the past, ITS venues have grown up haphazardly over a large number of years.

The hon. Member for North–East Derbyshire talked about the problem of oral hearings—indeed, one of his concerns was that, for several reasons, fewer people would attend, which argument he developed powerfully in connection with Chesterfield. Our change to the appeals regulations in asking people to request an oral hearing was made because, quite often, people filled in the form saying that they wanted to appeal, but did not explain what the issue was all about and then never turned up. If six cases are listed for a hearing before an appeals tribunal in a morning or an afternoon and one, two or three people whose appearance was expected and awaited and provided for then fail to turn up—often they never had any intention of turning up—it causes massive dislocation. It is an inefficient deployment of resources and forces other people to wait.

The Government have looked at that problem, which is why we have tried to improve the adjudication regulations. It is really a matter of domestic housekeeping to try to make the system work more smoothly and increase throughput. I stress that it is not a case of deterring people from appealing, nor of hoping, as the hon. Member for Bolsover suggested in one of his more rhetorical passages, that we would save programme expenditure, as we are processing nearly twice as many appeals. We are trying to get the system moving more quickly because we are faced with a large caseload.

Mr. Barnes: I presume that people's failure to turn up for oral hearings and the problems that that creates for the ITS would be a smaller issue in Chesterfield than in many other areas. My argument was that in 50 per cent. of cases people were represented but only 25 per cent. of people were represented nationally. The strong organisations that exist in the area are feeding people through and sorting out some of the problems. They are ensuring that the cases are not simply speculative with no information behind them. It can therefore be said that Chesterfield is doing the type of job that many other bodies should be doing.

Mr. Evans: I heard what the hon. Gentleman said and, in my judgment, it was a striking feature of his speech that he made that point. I am not trying to argue—I would not dream of doing so—that, if the appellant and the person representing him are there, they will not do better. The hon. Member for Bolsover has represented people before such tribunals, and I did not practise at the Bar for more than 20 years without appreciating that advocacy occasionally produces results. We all know from our constituency surgeries, when we help people, that if one is there to help and advise, the chances are that one will identify the problem at least and point people in the right direction. If people go along to argue, that is better. I shall certainly draw Judge Bassingthwaighte's attention to that matter.

The next issue that I was asked was why the closure of the Chesterfield suite was announced without proper prior consultation with the relevant interests, a promise having been made in a letter to the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) on 6 January 1997. Let me say straight away that there is clearly a conflict about the history of what actually happened, and I shall come to what we shall do about that in a moment.

The next question that I was asked—realistically, this is the most important question—was whether Chesterfield's closure could be withdrawn at least to allow the promised consultation about its future to take place on a genuine basis. The hon. Member for Bolsover ended his speech on a very powerful note. I respectfully say that I was moved by it. He said, "A mistake has been made; do the decent thing and start all over again." Indeed, he asked me personally to do that.

I have a genuine difficulty: I cannot say that we shall start again because that is a decision for the judge, not for me. However, I can certainly say, and I will if it is desired by either of the hon. Gentlemen or their colleagues, that if they want to discuss the matter my door is open and I shall happily see them. It may be more constructive and helpful for them to meet representatives of the ITS because I think that what they really want to do is persuade the ITS that it should give the matter another thorough examination with an open mind. I cannot direct that such a meeting take place but I have heard the arguments—

Mr. Skinner: You can give them a nudge though, can you not?

Mr. Evans: I shall send the ITS a copy of Hansard, including the powerful speech of the hon. Member for Bolsover and that of the hon. Member for North–East Derbyshire on the matter. It makes one unhappy when one has the sense that what has happened was not fair. That is not satisfactory.

Let us be practical for a moment. There are real problems with the present premises for a variety of reasons, of which I suspect the £100,000-worth of vacant space is the greatest. I surmise that it would be more practical to come up with some other venue in Chesterfield. The hon. Member for Bolsover made a specific proposal, but I will not play estate agent with him. I will communicate it to the independent tribunal service. It may be a helpful suggestion, which I will be happy to discuss with the hon. Gentleman later. It may be appropriate for the owners of the building to make a formal proposal in writing.

To sum up, there has been an unhappy clash over the past couple of weeks and an unhappy meeting on 14 January. A reorganisation may be necessary, and the ITS considers that there are compelling reasons to leave the present accommodation.

With regard to the inconvenience that would be caused to the hon. Gentleman's constituents if they had to travel to Sheffield, I am not familiar with the geography of the area.

The hon. Member for North–East Derbyshire referred once or twice to the industrial tribunals service—an easy slip of the tongue, but an entirely different organisation.

The independent tribunal service was said to be limited and daunting, but one of its striking features is its offer to pay for public transport or taxis to bring people to a hearing, and there are occasions when tribunals can be convened in people's homes. People who claim to have been unfairly dismissed would not get such treatment, but those who are unable to move might get it. It is a matter for the independent tribunal service. I shall re-examine the guidance. If there are difficulties in the way in which it is drawn and it puts people off, we will see whether anything more can be done.

Mr. Barnes: The Minister's contribution has been helpful. He has not opened the door in the way that we requested—he said that he could not do so, and that it was a matter for the Independent Tribunal Service—but he has not closed the door on us. He has given us some hope, and will pass on some material to the ITS. We might then have an opportunity to meet that body and, if necessary, the Minister.

Mr. Evans: I stress that I cannot open the door, as it is not my door, but that of the Independent Tribunal Service. I will meet the hon. Gentlemen and commend to the ITS the desirability of an early meeting. If the hon. Gentleman could put together alternative proposals for Chesterfield as quickly as possible, that would be helpful.

This has been an unfortunate matter as far as I am concerned, which began with the answer to a parliamentary question. I did not dream of the complications that lay beneath what appeared to be a simple matter to answer. Now that I have been informed of the facts, it is clear that there was more to it. I repeat the apology that I made earlier to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twelve minutes past Ten o'clock.

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Orders of the Day

Confiscation of Alcohol (Young Persons) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

9.34 am

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The raft of law and order measures brought forward by the Government and by various hon. Members through private Members' legislation sends a clear message to the country that this Government are determined to protect innocent people, and to make our streets safer. The Bill will help to do that. It complements the excellent anti-drugs measures promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South–West (Mr. Legg) last week, because alcohol abuse often leads to drug abuse. Indeed, the culture and loss of judgment that young people experience when drinking alcohol is often a factor in their first and subsequent use of drugs. The evidence to support that is legion.

I want to tell the House about the wonderful, caring "Bar'n'bus" Christian outreach project, which tries to help young people in south Essex.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Blackpool, South): My hon. Friend has pointed out that his Bill is valuable and important. Is it not surprising that the Opposition Benches contain only one Labour Member, a Front Bencher, and one Liberal Democrat Member? The remaining Opposition Members are absent. Does not that show, once again, what little interest the Opposition have in valuable law and order measures? We cannot trust Labour or the Liberal Democrats on anything to do with law and order.

Dr. Spink: My hon. Friend makes an important point, but I will not follow his line, because my Bill has all-party support. I do not want to put that in jeopardy, because this is an important measure that will help to make the streets safer.

Ian King is one of the key organisers of the Barnabus Christian outreach project. He is closer to the sharp end of the problem on the streets than almost anyone else in this country. He says that the Bill is very much needed and that it will make an important—perhaps the most important—contribution to solving the general malaise that faces our young people on the streets today.

My constituency-wide surveys, through the Castle Point Westminster report, reveal that law and order and safer streets are the top concerns among my constituents. I listened to them and have acted for them in bringing forward this Bill. It will tackle the problem of young people drinking alcohol in public. It will make a real difference to the quality of life for people throughout the country. It will make our streets safer.

At the moment, because of the way that the Licensing Act 1964 is framed, the police may see a group of young people tanking up on cans of lager or bottles of whisky, but there is nothing they can do to prevent it. I am sure that the House will agree that that is complete nonsense. The Bill will give the police the power to stop such drinking. They will be able to step in and confiscate the alcohol before it becomes a cause of trouble, both for the public and for the youngsters. It is a common-sense approach.

The Bill will not turn young people into criminals; it will not give them a record that might blight their future careers—it will simply allow the police to impose a bit of good, old-fashioned discipline to prevent the mischief at source, and to inform the potential miscreants' parents so that they can apply the necessary control.

This Bill is the sort of measure for which the country is yearning. I am sure that it will make a real difference to the health and safety of the young people concerned. Indeed, it will help to keep them out of the criminal justice system. This is a rare opportunity for the House to enact a preventive measure that will, at the same time, strengthen families by putting the control and guidance of young people back where that should be—with their parents and family groups.

I do not suppose that, when the licensing laws were drawn up in 1964, the legislators thought that young people might be able to obtain cans of beer and then hang around in bus shelters or recreation grounds and get drunk. In 1964, young people went to coffee bars. At that time, legislators would have thought that the measures to prevent young people drinking were tight enough. The 1964 Act prohibits young people from drinking in licensed premises and from buying alcoholic drinks, but it does not prohibit them from drinking alcohol in public. Sadly, as we all know, that has become a real problem.

Parents rather than the police should exert control and give guidance to their teenage children, but sometimes they fail to do so. Some youngsters have a drink problem even before they are old enough legally to buy drink—but they are a small minority. The media image of young people is negative, because they are too often portrayed as inconsiderate thugs. But that is certainly not the case in south Essex. The great majority of young people are good, caring, enthusiastic, thoughtful and courageous. Of course, they are at times boisterous, and that is natural. Their energies need to be properly channelled, and I shall address that later.

When youngsters get hold of alcohol, they get drunk, and they can make people's lives a misery. They also damage their own lives and commit offences when drunk that they would not dream of committing when sober. They can be drawn into vandalism, and may engage in all sorts of petty crime. They can be abusive to passers-by; a drunken 14 or 15-year-old can be just as intimidating as an older person, particularly to elderly constituents.

[Dr. Spink]

Drunken youngsters can be a danger to themselves as well as to other people. They may get into fights and become involved in serious crime and fall prey to criminals. Some of them steal cars and engage in so-called joy riding, which can endanger their own lives and those of others. As we all know, that results in deaths every year. In my constituency, some youngsters indulge in bad behaviour as a result of drinking alcohol in public. They have terrorised some neighbourhoods, and the police have been able only to move them on to new areas, where they continue to be a nuisance.

Such young people cause problems for our churches, add costs to business, and cause misery to those who experience their inconsiderate and sometimes criminal behaviour. I shall give some examples. On 3 January, the Evening Echo (Southend and Basildon) stated:

"Under age drinkers in South East Essex are turning to the strongest alcohol they can get for an instant hit . . . P. C. Michael Grout, Southend's Licensing Officer, said 'We have had a number of children taken to hospital to have their stomachs pumped.'"

Constable Andy Ford of Basildon's licensing office, who is greatly supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess), who backs my Bill, reported a similar situation when he said that under-age drinking was an increasing problem.

On 9 January, the Evening Echo (Southend and Basildon) performed a public service by highlighting the fact that a quarter of 13 to 17-year-olds get into arguments or fights after drinking. That is an important statistic. The newspaper reported two incidents on 14 January in Rayleigh which the police believe were related to under-age drinking. In the first incident, a 17-year-old student was slashed across the back of the head with a beer bottle and needed 25 stitches. At the same time, a second teenager, 16-year-old student, had two of his front teeth smashed and his nose broken. There have been even worse examples of violence in Essex.

Under-age drinking is a problem not just in Essex but throughout the country, and many of my hon. Friends will speak about what happens in their constituencies, because they care enough to be present for the debate and to support me. My hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins) mentioned that. I thank in particular my right hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt) for his support for the Bill. He has made me aware of evidence from Merseyside police, who have found a clear link between under-age drinking and youth disorder, both of which they say are on the increase in Merseyside as elsewhere.

In West Yorkshire, Divisional Commander Med Hughes spelled out the problem when he said:

"Drinking alcohol under age leads to all sorts of problems . . . a minority are getting alcohol . . . and are behaving in an appalling manner which often leads to violence and vandalism . . . young people who have been drinking are vulnerable. They are at risk of being involved in road accidents, or falling prey to criminals."

While I am dealing with West Yorkshire, I should like to congratulate the Keighley News on its magnificent campaign to protect the community and help its young people, particularly to avoid drug and alcohol abuse. I know that many local newspapers follow the fine example that has been set by the Keighley News in its action of community spirit.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Does my hon. Friend agree that many elderly people out in the early evening or at night feel intimidated by large groups of young people, and that that problem is greatly exacerbated when the young people have been drinking? Elderly people are fearful of going anywhere near them.

Dr. Spink: My hon. Friend makes an important point, which I shall expand by giving another example of the intimidation that he has highlighted and about which all hon. Members get letters.

Inspector Martin Stephen has talked about such intimidation in Eastbourne and has run several police operations to combat under-age drinking, because that sort of behaviour has resulted in a flood of complaints, not just from elderly residents but from holidaymakers. They have complained about young people drinking and causing trouble on the seafront, where people like to promenade and enjoy themselves.

The Eastbourne Gazette reported that a number of juveniles have already been arrested, and there have also been incidents of vandalism, theft and harassment, and of young people hurling abuse at passers-by. No doubt much such abuse was directed at the elderly. As my hon. Friend the Member for hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) has said, the elderly feel especially vulnerable.

My Bill seeks to address the problem of youngsters who are under the influence of alcohol in a public place. Inspector Stephen also said:

"We are not being killjoys, but there is a big problem with young people drinking and breaking the law."

In a letter to me on 16 December, Inspector Stephens stated:

"Over the years I have run several Police operations to combat this problem which is most relevant in this area during the summer months, along the seafront promenades. These efforts have been hampered by the lack of legislation to support positive Police action. Your bill in my opinion will go a long way in tackling this area of public concern."

We must listen to the police officers who have to deal with the problem on the streets on behalf of society at large.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend on his most important Bill. Does he agree that another group of people feel vulnerable when faced with these drunken louts? I refer to women travelling alone on trains. I have felt intimidated by bunches of raucous young people boarding the train, swilling their drink and throwing it across the floor. I hope that police powers will extend to trains.

Dr. Spink: My hon. Friend makes an important point. Police powers will extend to public transport. In south-east Essex, people using public transport have suffered precisely the problem that my hon. Friend highlights.

Some people say that we should use the model byelaw which has been taken up by about 40 councils, which prohibits the consumption of alcohol in public by anyone of any age. I am sorry to say that that law would be inappropriate in seaside areas such as Eastbourne. In any event, the problem is specifically associated with under-age drinking in public. Those who are over the age of 18 can drink in pubs, and hon. Members will be delighted to hear that I am not planning to legislate against that.

Lloyd Girling of Burkhill is one of many who have written to me in support of the measure. His letter states:

"The relationship between alcohol misuse in young people and crime is well documented and although the cost to the nation is considerable, the cost, however, to young people themselves, their families and their communities is incalculable."

Those are wise words. Mr. Girling goes on to speak about the negative impact of under-age drinking on the fabric of our society, and states that children as young as 11 are involved. I have a surprise for him. Children even younger than 11 are involved. The House must act now to protect those young children by supporting the Bill.

On 17 December 1996, commenting in The Daily Telegraph on schoolboys and girls indulging in drinking binges, Sergeant Geoff Elms of Cleveland police said:

"The girls tended to be about 14 and just hanging around darkened corners they are making themselves vulnerable.

The fact that they are drinking means they will not be fully in control and therefore at even greater risk.

In one instance we found nearly 80 youngsters in a school field drinking. The youngest boy we came across was just nine."

Nine years old, and this little boy was legally drinking alcohol in public. Clearly we must now act to stop such nonsense.

My final example, and one of the most important, takes me to Dorset. In promoting the Bill, I have been particularly influenced by Weymouth police's excellent and pioneering initiative, which is supported by the Dorset Evening Echo and is known as the "Do you know where your children are?" campaign. It was initiated by Sergeant Bernie Macey, whom I congratulate, and has been successful and well received, locally and nationally. The Home Secretary, who helped last year to launch the Bill for me, visited the campaign and gives it his support.

Of the 139 children who were apprehended last year, only eight came to the police's attention on a second occasion. That tells us something. It shows clearly that, after their parents had been informed, they dealt with the situation. That shows that parents do care and will act to control their children—or, at least, most do—and I welcome that fact. That is why it is right that the Bill should include the provision for police to take names and addresses of under-age drinkers and to report the matter directly to a youngster's parents. That brings me to the Bill's provisions.

The Bill gives police the power to confiscate alcohol or a drink that appears to be alcohol, where there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person is under the age of 18, and is in a public place or a place to which he has unlawfully gained access. Police would therefore be able to use the power if a group of youngsters were trespassing on private property such as school grounds, empty derelict property or any place to which the public or any section of the public had access at the material time, on payment or otherwise, either by way of right, or by virtue of express or implied permission.

The police will also have the power to confiscate alcohol from people who are aged 18 or over in such a place, if there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person has made alcohol available to someone in his company who is under the age of 18 or is likely to do so.

The Bill also gives the police the power to require the person in possession of the alcohol to state his name and address. That person's refusal either to surrender the alcohol or to provide the police with his name and address is an arrestable offence, punishable by a fine not exceeding level 2 on the standard scale, which I believe is currently £500.

The Bill applies to England and Wales but not to Scotland, where a similar measure is included in the Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Bill, or Northern Ireland, although we are considering that matter carefully. It may be appropriate to extend the Bill to Northern Ireland, which could be achieved by an amendment in Committee or in another place.

Before the Bill was drawn up, the Home Office consulted interested parties on the measures. They included the police, health organisations and interest groups, the licensed trade and local councils. As one might expect, the proposals received widespread support, including from the Association of Chief Police Officers, the Police Federation, the British Medical Association and Alcohol Concern, which do such good work. Local councils came out heavily in favour of proposals. It was interesting to note that the Federation of Licensed Victuallers Associations and the Society of Independent Brewers made no objections.

Practical difficulties that the Bill will impose on the police are not now, I trust, a cause for great concern. For many years, the police and society have had to deal with the difficulty of judging whether someone is 18. It has not caused any overriding problem. In any event, in mixed age groups where alcohol might be shared, all that alcohol will be liable to be confiscated.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North–West): As my hon. Friend will appreciate, my life has been based on being somewhat vertically challenged. I have no doubt that, in any such mixed group, until I was about the age of 25, if not later, I would have been regarded by the police as probably under 18. Is he sure that, in those circumstances, we wish to introduce a power to enable the police to judge purely by external appearance whether they should remove private property from someone?

Dr. Spink: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me the opportunity to go further into this problem. Of course, I would advise him to take up the Portman Group's "proof of age" identity card scheme for young persons over the age of 18. I personally want an identity card system, either voluntary or otherwise, which would be a good measure.

In any event, the police we are talking about are generally police on the street. They know who their youngsters are. They meet them and come across them regularly. They know who is abusing alcohol and who is getting up to a little mischief here and there. They are sensible and streetwise, not unwise and sitting behind desks. They have their ways and means of deciding how old someone is. If they make a mistake, it errs on the safe side. It prevents that youngster—perhaps my hon. Friend—from drinking alcohol when the policeman has gone, getting into trouble and ending up with a criminal record, which would have barred my hon. Friend from coming to this place.

The fact that the Bill does not give the power of search on the street is a great strength. It is right not to give the police such a power in these circumstances, because it could cause unseemly confrontations if youngsters decided, as they sometimes might, to act up in front of their friends. We have widened the Bill to enable non-uniformed officers to use its powers, and we have taken trouble to define a public place carefully, so that problems such as those raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) are avoided.

Those questions are important, but the benefits offered by the Bill far outweigh the slight practical difficulties. The Portman Group, which represents the drinks industry, said:

"Abuse of alcohol by under-18s can lead to problems at home and school and to threatening behaviour in public. It can also lead to health problems for young people.

But whilst the law bans the sale of alcohol to under-18s, there is clearly a minority that misuses it, often with distressing results."

The Portman Group's particular concern, expressed to me, was to stress that no single measure would, like a panacea, remove all alcohol abuse problems in society. Of course I and all of us here accept that. It is simply common sense. Crime, alcohol abuse and other problems associated with youths must be tackled in a variety of ways. For instance, we need more closed circuit television and better controls at the point of sale of alcohol. The Portman Group's "proof of age" identity card scheme has helped in that respect. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) will consider it.

In the seven years since it was introduced, the card has been issued to about 250,000 people over the age of 18. I congratulate the Portman Group on that scheme, and I hope that ways can be found to promote its more widespread use. One way would be to consider the example given by licensing authorities in Glasgow, which makes it compulsory for retailers who want a licence to take up the scheme. That has been successful. There has been a 600 per cent. increase in the scheme's take-up by young persons. All licensing authorities should consider doing that, although, if they did, the Portman Group might be looking for sources of funding to finance it. No doubt we will hear from it about that.

We need more street policing. I have yet to see a replacement for the bobby on the beat. My Bill will help to make him more effective. We need to support and promote parental control, and my Bill will help to achieve that as well. Those are active, interventionist measures, but there are other passive measures that society could and should take.

We should provide better education for our children, and, indeed, their parents, on the use of alcohol. Children's knowledge of alcohol should be developed in the family setting, as it is in France and other Mediterranean countries. That would help to avoid the problem of children suddenly bingeing behind the bicycle shed or in the recreation park when they get to a certain age. We should tackle truancy. We need better lighting targeted at streets and public areas, including the darkened street corners, where, as Sergeant Elms of Cleveland police said, 14-year-old girls stand drinking. We must remove graffiti immediately.

A more responsible attitude should be taken by brewers and advertisers who try to sell our children alcopops and other superficially nice but fundamentally nasty substances. They are obviously targeted at our young people. Alcopops include alcoholic lemonade and colas, as well as the infamous home brew kits. The industry must tackle that nasty trade, or the House will introduce strict regulations to protect young people. I trust that the industry will take that warning seriously.

Mr. Nigel Evans: Has my hon. Friend seen the reports in this morning's newspapers about three particular drinks that may attract youngsters? The makers of those drinks are violating a voluntary code. I shall just mention two of the names—Purple Passion and TNT Liquid Dynamite. Their very packaging and the advertisements for them may attract young people to experiment with those alcoholic drinks.

Dr. Spink: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. A selling point of the one that he did not mention is the claim that the drink is "dangerously drinkable". We do not want dangerously drinkable substances to be pushed at our children through marketing and clever packaging. The House will have to act if the industry does not get its act together.

Even more important than all the measures in the Bill, we need to provide better youth facilities—alternatives that are exciting and available to all youngsters. That means alternatives which are not school-based. Such facilities should include sports centres, bowling alleys, cinemas, youth clubs and dance venues.

We must recognise and promote the excellent work that is already carried out by many adults who give up their time to help our youth at sports clubs and football clubs as well as through uniformed organisations such as the Air Training Corps, the scouts and the sea cadets. We need to provide more recreational sports and social activities for our youngsters. They must offer a real challenge to them. In the meantime, we need to protect our children as best we can, and that is why the Bill must be introduced without delay.

In Castle Point, a former mayor, Peggy Grant, helped to establish a youth forum of which she is now president to promote more facilities for our young people. I congratulate Peggy and subsequent mayors of Castle Point on continuing that initiative and providing more youth facilities. So far, Canvey Island has benefited and the council now needs to deliver facilities for Benfleet and Hadleigh. It has my entire support.

Nationally, the Prime Minister has promoted a new youth honours system to provide encouragement and reward for our youngsters. I also welcome the possibility of expanding the scope of the cadet forces scheme. That gives youngsters respect and responsibility, as well as fostering discipline and self-confidence. I pay tribute to the excellent cadet forces in Castle Point, Basildon, Southend, West and other areas of Essex—they do an excellent job.

We must not forget the contribution of the national lottery, which is providing massive funding for young people. I shall cite just two of the many examples of the help it has provided in Castle Point. It has given £46,364 for the Castle Point brass band and £200,000 for the Deanes sports hall. Those are just two examples of what has been achieved as a result of successful Conservative policy, which was opposed by the socialists. It is, however, delivering real benefits for Castle Point's youngsters and many other people as well.

I congratulate the Government on providing two new sixth forms for Castle Point. Education facilities are the most important facilities that we can provide for our youngsters. They are much more important than drop-in centres, bowling alleys or anything else. All the more shameful, then, that local Labour councillors in Castle Point tried to stop the provision of those new facilities for our youngsters.

For the past five years, I made the provision of such facilities for my youngsters a personal crusade. Hon. Members are fed up of hearing me talk about the new sixth forms for Benfleet and Canvey Island. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not at all."] I am grateful to my right hon. and hon. Friends for their encouragement. I assure them that I will not have to crack on about those facilities in the future, because the Government have now made them available, despite the opposition of Labour local councillors.

Overall, I believe that the measures in the Bill will provide a strong disincentive to youngsters to start drinking in public, because they will know that they will not get away with it. They will know that, if they do drink in public, they will be wasting their money. As one 14-year-old young man told me on the streets of Benfleet at 10.30 last Friday night, if his dad found out he had been drinking, severe action would follow to control his behaviour. Make no mistake, under my Bill his dad would find out, and that 14-year-old youngster and many more constituents might be saved a lot of trouble as a result.

This is not a killjoy Bill. I enjoy the occasional glass of wine. It is a discretionary measure. I emphasise that it will not be the duty of the police to confiscate alcohol in any circumstances. Police officers would not be expected to seize alcohol from a family having a picnic if a youngster had a sip of alcohol from one of the glasses.

The Bill is a measure that the police can use with common sense, integrity and good will, and within the guidelines, to prevent under-age drinking when it seems set to become a problem. Its effect is therefore preventative, because it gives the police the power to remove the offending alcohol before youths come under its influence, make misjudgments and put themselves and the public at risk. It is an absurdity that the police cannot act now to do that, in order to cut crime and help our communities and our children.

The fact that the police will generally be expected to take the names and addresses of young people drinking alcohol in public and subsequently write to their parents about that is a great strength of the Bill. It puts control and the guidance of teenagers back where it belongs, with families, not with the police.

Mr. Hartley Booth (Finchley): My hon. Friend refers to the guidelines, but they are not mentioned in the Bill. Does he expect the Home Office to issue guidelines at some point?

Dr. Spink: Those guidelines will be explained in detail in Committee. They are basically those that I have set out, which my hon. Friend the Minister will outline. They will be fully explained in Committee, which is one reason why my Bill will go to Committee—which I am sure you, Madam Deputy Speaker, will be pleased to hear.

If the alcohol drunk by young people is not given up when they are questioned by the police or false details are given, the police will have the power to arrest without warrant. They will take those youngsters to the police station. In those circumstances, they usually become very sensible very quickly, especially when their dads turn up to collect them. That power will avoid any street confrontation between youths and the police. We are all in favour of that.

This common-sense Bill will help to make our streets safer for young and old alike. It will keep teenagers out of trouble, and will therefore save the police and the courts time and money. It will reinforce parental responsibility. That is why the Bill has all-party support, which I greatly welcome, and why it would be unthinkable for anyone to oppose it. I commend it to the House.

10.8 am

Mr. David Hunt (Wirral, West): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink), not only on introducing a much-needed Bill, but on making one of the best speeches that I have heard in a Second Reading debate on a private Member's Bill. He has put his case clearly, simply, and cogently, and he has comprehensively covered the reasons why the Bill is needed. I have no doubt that today marks a very important stage in the partnership between Parliament and the police.

I am also grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point for responding to a problem in my own constituency, about which the police wrote to me just before the ballot on private Members' Bills. In my 20 years in the House, I cannot recall an occasion on which a senior police officer has written to me to ask me to introduce legislation. In November, however, Chief Inspector Garnett, the operations manager of Merseyside police, based in Wallasey, wrote to me. He said:

"Dear Mr. Hunt,

You may be aware that I am researching problems associated with drinking in public places, particularly amongst the young people on Wirral. The recent coverage given to this subject by the Wirral News Group and in the National Press has highlighted that it exists, not only on Wirral, but elsewhere in the Country . . .

My purpose in writing to you is to seek your views on whether you would be prepared to sponsor a Bill and monitor it through Parliament . . . it would go some considerable way in helping to solve some of the Youth Disorder incidents now faced by many Police Forces".

As it was the first occasion on which I was able to enter the ballot for many years, the House can imagine my disappointment when the ballot was held for private Members' Bills and I lost. However, in the ballot, I noticed that my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point had come in fourth, and I immediately made approaches to him on the matter. To my delight, he took up the cudgels on behalf of my local police, and I cannot thank him enough for enabling me to respond so positively to their concerns.

The background to the matter goes much wider than that, however, because we have had a series of meetings in Wirral, which have been conducted by the Merseyside police authority. On 15 May 1996, we had one such meeting—at the Holy Trinity school, in Hoylake—with the Wallasey and Hoylake police and community forum. The minutes of the meeting show that it was dominated by the issue of youth disorder, and particularly by disorder associated with under-age drinking. Problems were experienced in the Kings Gap, which is just round the corner from my home, in Kale close, and in other key areas, including West Kirby. The extent of the problem demonstrates the need to pass new measures, such as those in the Bill.

Action is required elsewhere in Wirral. My good friend and colleague Les Byrom—the Conservative prospective parliamentary candidate in the Wirral, South by-election, who I hope will soon be joining us on the Government Benches—shares my belief that the problem of under-age drinking in public places is one of several law-and-order issues on which action must be taken, and that a closer, stronger and more positive partnership is required between the public, police and Parliament. Les Byrom has already told me how delighted he is that the Bill is receiving such strong support, not only across the political spectrum but from many people across Wirral.

The problem of under-age drinking has become very serious in the Woodchurch estate in my constituency. I became aware of the problem in August, through correspondence with my constituents in The Meadow, which is part of the estate. One local resident wrote of "the numerous problems we are having regarding the youths who congregate on The Meadow.

The youths who are aged between 13-18 use the area adjacent to my property as a local meeting area for drinking and"— sadly—

"drug abuse."

Soon after I received that letter, I was able to attend a meeting of all interested parties on the estate—including the excellent staff of the Woodchurch Young Persons project, other local representatives and police—and I was asked to approach the local authority to discover whether a byelaw banning under-age drinking could be introduced. After I approached the Home Secretary and my local council, however, I became aware that we required more than a byelaw, as a byelaw cannot identify a particular age group but must apply to all local people. It therefore could not single out those under 18. That limitation has reinforced my view—which is shared by the Woodchurch Residents and Tenants Association and the Woodchurch Community Association—that primary legislation is required.

Fridays in the House are always interesting, because we often deal with private Members' Bills that express good notions which one should like to support, although there is often very little time to make progress on them. I could not be more delighted that today we will deal with two Bills—this Bill and the Road Traffic Reduction Bill; the first two Bills on today's Order Paper—that I very strongly support. However, I believe that this Bill is more immediately relevant to our problems. Road traffic reduction is a more difficult problem and will require much more time to deal with, whereas the problem of under-age drinking can be dealt with immediately.

I again congratulate my hon. Friend on his marvellous speech. Until I became aware this year of the extent of the problems in my constituency, I had not realised—which is my fault—that it is not an offence under current legislation for a person under 18 to drink alcohol, whether in public or in private, or for an adult to buy alcohol for someone under 18 to drink away from unlicensed premises. The gap in the law is another good reason why we so strongly support the efforts of my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point.

My hon. Friend has told us that the Bill's purpose is to introduce preventive measures, which is what the issue is all about. I especially support him on his point about reinforcing parental responsibility. The Conservative party is all about opportunity and choice, particularly for parents, whereas from other parties we hear too much about rights and too little about responsibilities.

The Bill gives us an opportunity to remind parents that they have considerable responsibilities for their children and teenagers. It is a common-sense measure that will not only help to make our streets safer for young and old people alike, but will keep teenagers out of trouble by placing the primary emphasis on alerting parents to the problem.

The Bill will permit police to confiscate alcohol held in public for use by young persons, and establishes the right to take names and addresses so that police can write to young people's parents, thereby placing control and guidance of teenagers where it belongs—with families and parents—and not with police. Particularly in key areas of our constituencies, police have enough to do without having to tackle the problem of under-age drinking. Parents have the primary duty and responsibility of dealing with the problem.

The Bill also contains no powers of search on the street, which I welcome. The absence of such powers could be controversial, but I believe that the way in which my hon. Friend explained the matter makes it clear that it is right and appropriate not to have them. If a power to search were in the Bill, unseemly confrontations could develop between police and youngsters who like to show off in front of their peers.

Under the Bill, if the alcohol is not given up, or if false details are given, the police will have the power of arrest without warrant and can take the youngsters straight to the police station—where, as my hon. Friend pointed out, they usually become sensible very quickly, especially when their parents turn up. I hope that that power, together with the increasing community dimension to policing, means that we will be able to tackle the problem positively.

I greatly welcome the way in which the police are becoming more involved in their local communities. In many parts of my constituency, we are at last seeing more police on the beat, which I also welcome. For too long, we have been denied more policing in Wirral because of the over-emphasis on policing Liverpool, especially the inner-city areas. However, I know that the chief constable is aware, from what fellow Wirral Members of Parliament and I have told him, that there is a need for more bobbies on the beat.

I am arguing that the police funding formula needs to be improved to enable more resources to be channelled into the Merseyside police force. I realise that that is a debate for another day, but I flag it up to show that it is a matter of serious concern to Merseyside Members. Provided we have adequate resources, there is no substitute for police being able to get involved in their local communities. I welcome not only the police and community forum in my constituency but the extent to which our local community police are getting involved in local community organisations. That can only be for the good.

The Bill is much needed, and I wish it a speedy passage. It will do a great deal to improve co-operation between the police and the public. It has identified a problem and will enable it to be dealt with quickly. I cannot thank my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point enough for the speed with which he is attempting to tackle that problem.

Mr. Chris Davies (Littleborough and Saddleworth): I congratulate the hon. Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) on introducing the Bill, which I welcome. It is clearly well intentioned.

Like every Member of Parliament, I hear complaints from constituents about the behaviour of youths, often associated with drinking. I am thinking especially of the complaints made by pensioners in the village of Uppermill about youths who drink on the George V playing fields, but similar problems arise elsewhere in my constituency and across the country.

Youth behaviour is known to be one of the biggest causes of complaints to the police from the public. Raucous, drunken behaviour by groups of youths increases the fear of crime experienced by many of our constituents, and, of course, the fact that alcohol is often involved increases the likelihood that there will be a propensity to violence or to destructive acts.

It is clearly illogical that it should be an offence for someone under the age of 18 to purchase alcohol but not for him to drink it in public. I therefore welcome the Bill. Having said that, however, I must issue words of caution. The Bill should bear the health warning "Handle with care".

We have heard much about alcohol misuse by young people. I am pleased that hon. Members set the right moral tone. Of course no hon. Member speaking in this debate ever drank before he was 18—except me. Like almost every young person, I admit to having been intoxicated a number of times before my 18th birthday, although, in my defence, not at the age of nine—which was the case in one incident that we heard about today—but 16, and not, I think, in public but in the safety of private homes on a Saturday night.

Mr. Stern: The Bill would not affect a person's right to drink in a private place under the age of 18.

Mr. Davies: I accept that, but someone—perhaps me in the case to which I was referring—presumably committed an illegal act in procuring the alcohol, knowing that it was to be consumed by someone under 18. If I have misunderstood, I shall no doubt be corrected.

For many young people, drinking alcohol is one of the rites of passage on the way to adulthood. All aspects of adolescence are difficult. Every parent knows that, and I would not wish to be an adolescent again for love or money. Adolescents are too old to go to organised youth clubs—if there are any—but too young to go to the pub, especially if, like the hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern), one looks too young even at 20 or 21 to go into one without clasping a birth certificate as a safety precaution.

Where are young people supposed to go? How are they supposed to enjoy themselves? We are not providing any real solutions, but the Bill states what they must not do, which is disrupt the lives of other citizens by raucous or drunken behaviour in public.

We expect the police to deal with any problems. One of the most interesting aspects of my work since being elected to the House is my involvement with the police in my community and the knowledge that I have gained of the way in which they operate. I have come to admire them hugely at all levels.

It is important that we recognise that, to most ordinary people, the role of the police is not simply to curb crime but to maintain order and tranquillity. I pay tribute to one area constable, Jim Hodgkinson, in Milnrow and Newhey in the borough of Rochdale, who has worked hard with young people, some of whom were getting into trouble and giving rise to complaints from local residents. He helped them set up a youth council, which is now working to establish a drop-in centre.

It is certainly a contrast to some recent debates on the Crime (Sentences) Bill, when so much attention was devoted to the need for harsher sentences, to find that much ordinary police work in fact involves setting up youth councils rather than catching criminals, who are the demon figures most often portrayed in the House.

In public places, it is the police who most often interact with young people. The ordinary peaceful citizen may cross the road or take a different route to avoid passing a gathering of youths. The police's task is bound to be immensely difficult. Meeting public concerns without alienating the young people whose adolescent behaviour may be poor but who are basically good is the challenge facing the police. There is a danger that, in the hands of the wrong sort of policeman—perhaps an inexperienced officer or someone who comes from a different area and does not know the locality or the kids involved—the powers provided in the Bill might make things worse. The reality is that they will more often be ignored than acted on.

After all, what is a police officer supposed to do if he approaches a group of 10 lads sitting on a park bench? Perhaps they have been drinking double-strength cider which they purchased from the local supermarket. They have probably had a few drinks already, and the bottles and cans might be scattered around them. Will the officer have the power to get the lads to clean up the mess which, the following morning, is as much a cause of complaint as the drinking itself? That power is not included in the Bill, and he will not have evidence of any one individual being responsible for the mess. Will he have the power to force the young people to put the bottles and cans in the bin? I do not see that provision in the Bill, either.

What, then, is the officer to do? Does he get the 10 youngsters to hand over the bottles? Does he put his fingers in the top of the bottles and set off to look for a litter bin, with the bottles hanging from his fingers like a bunch of bananas? I can almost hear the raucous jeers behind him as he does so. Of course he will not put himself in that situation; it would compromise his dignity and lessen the sense of authority that he conveys. What if he cannot find a litter bin? Is he to walk up the high street clutching those bottles in front of the rest of the citizenry?

I suggest to the House that that the police officer will not do any of those things. In reality, he is much more likely to go up and say, "Lads, we've had some complaints about you. I am going to walk away now. I'm going to come back in five minutes and I don't expect to find you here—and get rid of the bottles on the way." He will not use the powers that would be available to him in the Bill because it would simply make him look ridiculous and would undermine the authority of the police. He might take the names and addresses of those involved, which is a very effective way of dealing with such situations. In Oldham, that is already standard practice, so I assume that the police have the moral authority—if they do not have the legal powers—that seems to ensure that names and addresses are handed over freely by the young people involved.

During the campaign for the by-election that brought me to the House, one gentleman said to me, "I'll vote for you, Mr. Davies, if you can do something about the youths who are causing such a mess in the park every night." I replied, "If someone introduces a Bill that will put an end to yobbish behaviour, I'll vote for it." Sadly, life is not that easy.

The Bill attempts to curb aspects of yobbish behaviour, and I welcome it for its intention. I support it because it gives an extra bit of armoury to the police, a bit of extra legal authority, although that authority is rarely likely to be used. In practice, however, I do not believe that the Bill will do much more than good policing already does, and we should not pretend it will.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Blackpool, South): I am very pleased and proud to have the opportunity for the second Friday morning in a row to congratulate one of my hon. Friends on introducing an enormously important law and order measure. On this occasion, I most warmly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) on this exceptionally important measure.

Last week, we were dealing with the misuse of drugs in places with public entertainment licences; this week, we are dealing with under-age drinking on the streets, and I shall concentrate this morning on the success of clamp-down campaigns. Even before this most important Bill was introduced, local authorities have taken steps to control this difficult social problem.

I spent the first few years of my professional career as a practising barrister in the midlands. There was no doubt that the misuse of both alcohol and drugs, especially by young men and young women, was one of the most serious social problems. It provided a very large part of the enormous increase in the workload of the courts, and the strains on the police and the prisons.

More recently, some local authorities, as my hon. Friend briefly mentioned in his excellent opening speech, have taken steps to try to control drinking in public places. I think that the first city to pioneer this in a major way was Coventry. It so happens that, during my early years practising at the Bar, I lived in Coventry, and I saw the extent of the problem that much of the drinking in the streets of the city centre was causing.

Coventry suffered enormously from bombing by the Luftwaffe during the war. When the city authorities rebuilt the city centre, they provided very large pedestrianised areas, which were, of course, extremely attractive for shoppers. Coventry city centre was regarded in the 1950s and 1960s as a showplace, but, with so many pedestrianised areas, drinking in the streets was becoming an exceptionally serious social problem. When the byelaw was introduced, the citizens of Coventry noticed a huge difference. That byelaw, as my hon. Friend mentioned, has since been copied by many other towns throughout the land. Unfortunately, the police had no legal powers to confiscate the alcohol that was being consumed by those under 18. My hon. Friend's Bill will correct that tremendously difficult lacuna in the law.

I am well aware of the serious problem in parts of the country of the lack of facilities for under-18s. I warmly congratulate some of our big national companies that have been willing to support, sometimes in quite substantial financial sums, efforts by local communities to provide facilities for the under 18s. The hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Davies) said that he would not like to be an adolescent again, because people under the age of 18 sometimes regard themselves as too old for organised youth clubs, if there are any, but too young to go lawfully into a pub.

I recently worked with Councillor John Saunders and a number of other concerned people, and we received support from Shell, one of the major oil companies, in the provision of a new youth club to correct a particular problem whereby young people were hanging about the streets, with not enough to do, with the potential for noise and damage. I have no doubt that under-age drinking played a part in that.

It is important that all of us in the House who care about this problem should praise the major companies that are prepared to work with local communities and the police to provide facilities. There is no doubt that the police, as my hon. Friend rightly pointed out, very much welcome the proposals in the Bill. I should like in particular to expand on the point mentioned by my hon. Friend about the campaign that began in Weymouth: "Do you know where your children are?" I would encourage every police force in the country to go forward from the provisions in the Bill and have a similar campaign in every area.

It seems that, with every week that passes, yet another tragic youngster is headline news—on the television, the radio and in the newspapers—and that another youngster has disappeared. Sometimes they are as young as eight, but their parents just allowed them to wander off from home. Sometimes they have gone to the chip shop. Sometimes they have gone to buy a newspaper. Sometimes, I am sad to say, they have gone out to join up with other groups of youngsters, to hang around on street corners and drink. In any event, they are the vulnerable ones, because their parents do not look after them, or, if they are unfortunate enough to be in local authority care, because the care homes do not have a proper curfew system.

In my constituency, I have had considerable problems with a care home in a residential area. Local residents had their lives constantly disrupted by the bad behaviour of youngsters who were simply allowed to roam the streets because there was no proper curfew system. There was vandalism and criminal damage right across the area. The police were being called to the street where the residential care home is situated, sometimes several times in a single night.

On another occasion, because of the disruptive behaviour of children from that care home who had been allowed out on the streets, the fire brigade was summoned three times in one night. That is not behaviour that law-abiding citizens should have to put up with. I am sure that my hon. Friend's Bill will play a significant part in enabling the police to take corrective action to ensure that the alcohol is confiscated as soon as a problem arises.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) mentioned the significant threat to women on the streets or travelling on public transport. That is a particularly significant matter, which the House has attempted, through other Bills—particularly those on stalking—to deal with recently. Once again, my hon. Friend's Bill will be enormously important in that regard. There is no doubt that much of the threat caused to women who are travelling, simply walking their dogs, or whatever, is caused by young men who have consumed too much drink, illegal drugs, or both.

All these social problems are linked. They come back to the fact that, in far too many cases, parents are simply not aware of what their youngsters are doing. As my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point has rightly said, responsible parents always ensure that their children are at home and properly looked after. The best local authority care homes have proper curfew systems, but, sadly, a minority of parents are prepared to allow children as young as eight to roam the streets. They are vulnerable to becoming victims of serious crime; they are also, in many cases, those who cause serious crime. I hope that, as a result of this important Bill, far more parents are encouraged to take active steps to check where their children are in the evening.

If, as my hon. Friend rightly says, the guidelines that result from the Bill ensure that police officers, when they have confiscated alcohol, also have the power to take the names and addresses of the youngsters and to see the parents, those youngsters will not get into trouble again. Once the parents are brought up short by a visit from a police officer, pointing out that their son or daughter has been found drinking late at night, they will take preventive action—at least, one hopes that any responsible parent would take such action.

I am a parent of one teenaged child and two somewhat younger children. As I drive round different parts of the country, I am constantly horrified to see how many groups of young people are out late at night, especially in the winter months, when it gets dark as early as 5.30. Despite that, groups of youngsters are often out until 10, 10.30 or 11, with, as the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Davies) said, nothing serious to do. That is how mischief occurs, especially when drink plays a part.

We have seen a huge increase in crime since 1951. Just over a week ago, in a debate on BBC radio, the distinguished journalist John Torode pointed out that, although we have seen a welcome fall in crime in the past few years as a result of the important measures introduced by this Government and the big increase in the number of police officers on the beat, to which I had the opportunity to draw attention at Home Office questions yesterday, one needs to look at the whole period since 1951. In 1951, there were only 500,000 crimes; we are now talking about 5 million and more.

The main reason why there has been a huge expansion in crime is the relaxed social attitudes which began in the late 1950s and continued through the 1960s, and the fashionable liberal ideas that have been so championed by members of the Labour and Liberal Democrat parties over the years. It is interesting that, in a profile in The Independent this week, the journalist Polly Toynbee said that she trusted the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) as the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman. The main reason why this party—this Government—will be triumphantly elected in a few weeks' time is that the majority of people do not trust the hon. Member for Blackburn.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): If it is the Opposition's fault that crime has increased so much, why has crime more than doubled while this Government have been in office, whereas the number of cases that result in a conviction is only one in 50? Convictions are down and crime is up. How can that be our fault?

Mr. Hawkins: The hon. Gentleman has failed to realise that, in the past three years, there has been a significant drop in crime as a result of this Government's policies finally working. Whenever a Conservative Government have sought to introduce tough law and order measures, the Labour party has either opposed them or abstained.

Labour has not supported the increase in tough law and order measures. The acres of empty green leather behind the hon. Gentleman are, once again, proof positive that the Labour party simply does not care. Many of my hon. Friends are here supporting my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point because this is the party of law and order. Every step of the way, Opposition Members have derided the Government's policy.

Even at Home Office questions yesterday, we once again had implicit support for the legalisation of soft drugs, to which the Under–Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville), drew attention. At every step of the way, this is the party of law and order, and that is the party of apologists for crime.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman really should not be free and easy with the facts. The Labour party's position, as the Under–Secretary of State for the Home Department, his hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North–East (Mr. Kirkhope) will confirm, has been consistent. I have been responsible for it for the past couple of years. We are opposed to either the legalisation or the decriminalisation of any form of currently illegal substance. That is the Labour party's policy, and that is what we shall take forward to the electorate. There is nothing between the Government and ourselves on the matter. We have worked hard to establish a bipartisan position on it, and we will maintain that position.

Mr. Hawkins: The hon. Gentleman is giving the Front-Bench position. He ignores the fact that, as recently as last year, about 30 of his colleagues signed an early-day motion, once again calling for the legalisation of soft drugs. The Labour party has never had a consistent position.

Mr. Howarth: If the hon. Gentleman wants to cite individual Back-Bench Labour Members, he might take the trouble to read the book written by his hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan), a senior member of his party, in which he called for the legalisation—

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): Senior?

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton is the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the chairman of the Conservative party, and he called for the legalisation even of hard drugs. Will the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins) condemn him?

Mr. Hawkins: I condemn any call for the legalisation of any illegal drugs. However, the hon. Gentleman cannot get away from the fact that, as recently as last year, about 30 of his colleagues called for the legalisation of soft drugs. There will not, of course, be any mention of that in the Labour manifesto. The Liberal Democrat conference has more than once passed motions calling for the legalisation of soft drugs.

Mr. Chris Davies: The Liberal Democrat conference has done no such thing. It has passed a resolution calling for a royal commission to look at all aspects of the matter. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] Conservative Members should read the motion we passed rather than their own propaganda.

Will the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins) accept from me that, whatever the views of some Back-Bench Labour Members, some hon. Members believe that a different strategy needs to be examined if we are to deal with the menace of drugs, and that some of us believe that the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) is burying his head in the sand?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. Before the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins) continues his speech, I must tell the House that, although the Second Reading debate on this Bill can be fairly wide, it is not all-encompassing. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman addresses his remarks more closely to the text of the Bill.

Mr. Hawkins: I am delighted to do so, Madam Deputy Speaker. However, what we have seen in the past few minutes is a case of Opposition Members trying to defend the indefensible. The electorate will give their judgment on law and order matters at the election in a few months' time.

The Bill is exceptionally important. My hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point has drawn attention to the welcome his proposals have already received from police officers. I can tell him that police officers in the world capital of clubland—Blackpool—will also welcome it.

It is important to note, as my hon. Friend has stressed, that the Bill is not a killjoy measure. None of us wishes to damage young people's opportunity to go out and have a good time. The Portman Group has made a proposal, to which my hon. Friend has drawn attention, that young people should be able to carry proof of age on a voluntary basis. My hon. Friend and I would both support the introduction of identity cards, which would make a scheme such as the Portman Group's entirely unnecessary. I hope that, in due course, the Government will be able to pursue that matter.

It is important that, when young people go out to enjoy themselves, they should do so without disrupting the lives of law-abiding citizens. The Bill will help to give the police the powers they need to deal with the serious problem of under-age drinking. The Government have rightly increased the number of police constables on the beat. In 1979, when this Government came to power, the police were 8,000 under strength. Police morale was so low as a result of a perceived lack of support from the then Labour Government that there were even threats of a police strike.

By contrast, this Government have increased the number of police constables by 16,000. There will be further increases in the number of police officers on the beat. As a result of this important Bill, when it becomes an Act, the police will have the powers they need to confiscate alcohol and to prevent drinking by under-age drinkers.

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) on introducing the Bill. If he does nothing more during his time in the House, he will have achieved a great deal by this measure. My noble Friend Lord Braine of Wheatley represented Castle Point for 40 years and was the Father of the House. I know that he would strongly support the Bill.

It is all very well to have the slogan, "Tough on crime, tough on the causes of crime", but we need to demonstrate that toughness on crime. This morning, my hon. Friend has received tremendous support from Conservative Members, many of whom are present in the Chamber. I hope that people outside the House will draw their own conclusions from that.

The danger for me in supporting the Bill is that it will be perceived as an Essex problem. Although my constituency and the constituency to which I aspire adjoin that of my hon. Friend, I am convinced that the problem exists throughout the country.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham): My hon. Friend is quite right to say that the problem is not confined to Essex. My constituency is in the north-east of England, which, sadly, is second in the league table for offences of drunkenness—followed by Merseyside and ahead of London. There is a real problem in the north of England.

Mr. Amess: My hon. Friend the Member for Hexham reminds us that there is also a problem in the north of England.

My hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point made a splendid speech that leaves his supporters with little more to add. I am proud to be one of the sponsors of his Bill, and I shall mention just a few specific points.

My hon. Friend mentioned the yobbish tendency that we sometimes experience on public transport. Last night, I travelled with my right hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Sir M. Fox) and Mr. Ken Hargreaves, a former Member, on the newly privatised Fenchurch Street line, which is now run by Prism. We enjoyed a most comfortable journey. According to the passengers we met, the service has improved tremendously. We witnessed no yobbish behaviour, and my colleagues were extremely well behaved.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North–West (Mr. Stern) referred to his own stature. I join my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point in supporting the proposal by the Portland Group.

Some years ago, I successfully introduced a ten-minute Bill on identity cards. I am still at a loss to understand how it is that we have to register our births and deaths, but the time between remains unregistered. I hope that the Government will produce plans to introduce identity cards.

I know that my hon. Friend is keen that there should be a wide range of facilities for young people, particularly those in Essex. We have both been privileged to have been associated with the "Bar'n'bus" project. This time last week the Under–Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) joined us in Leigh-on-Sea. The bus was brought to the wharf at the end of old Leigh, and we saw at first hand the marvellous achievements of the project. The organisers recognised that meetings in halls are not always successful, so a roving bus visits various parts of Essex. There are facilities for coffee, tea and entertainment, and the project has proved most successful.

We had the opportunity to speak to a number of youngsters, many of whom were victims of drug and alcohol abuse. We also saw a video that had been made on Southend sea front. It contained some pretty appalling scenes. They did not involve residents of Southend, which is famous for attracting holidaymakers, but very young people, who were clearly under age and who were swigging from various bottles. The interviews they were prepared to give on video showed the scale of the problem.

I know that my hon. Friend is keen that we should provide as many local facilities as possible for young people in Essex. I am heartened by the fact that the scouts, the guides, various youth clubs, the cadets, the St. John's Ambulance and a whole range of activities seem to be increasing in popularity, but there is no substitute for parents taking the trouble to spend much more time with their children to set them on the right road in life. That is the key to success.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer increased duty on alcopops by between 7p and 8p. The drinks are marketed to youngsters and are deceptively alcoholic. Many teenagers are well aware of the alcohol content of various drinks and go for the strongest available. I certainly support the points that my hon. Friends have made on the issue.

My hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point referred to the Evening Echo, which supports his campaign. According to a recent article, £20 million a year is spent on advertising alcohol. However, I am not sure whether it is fully understood that, every year, alcohol kills thousands more people than all the illegal drugs put together. Some 90 per cent. of the population drink alcohol as a normal activity, and I am among them. However, about 25 per cent. of 13 to 17-year-olds get into arguments and fights as a result of drinking alcohol. The heaviest drinkers in the United Kingdom are 18 to 24-year-olds, and nearly 90 per cent. of boys in England have tried alcohol by the age of 13. It must be a matter of national concern.

Mr. Chris Davies: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, every day, some 75 people die prematurely as a result of alcohol consumption? Does he agree that there is a good case for making it illegal?

Mr. Amess: I do not underestimate the seriousness of the problem, but I do not share the intention of the hon. Gentleman or his party to introduce legislation to make alcohol illegal. That would certainly be a retrograde step, which would gain very little support in the country. We are discussing the abuse of alcohol by under-age drinkers.

Dr. Spink: As a parry to the lunatic argument that we have just heard from the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Davies), does my hon. Friend agree that alcohol can help to save lives? It is a healthy activity provided that it is undertaken sensibly and the correct number of units are not exceeded each day, particularly if it is taken by a gentleman of my age.

Mr. Amess: My hon. Friend is very young, so I do not know what he meant by that remark. However, he is right to say that there is considerable medical evidence that a glass of red wine or whisky does no harm whatsoever. However, alcohol reaches the brain within five minutes of being swallowed.

Sergeant Michael Grout, Southend's licensing officer has done a great deal of work with young people. He said:

"In the past, under-age drinkers were given a ticking-off and sent on their way.

Now we are trying to get the message over that these youngsters are committing an offence and will be cautioned.

Officers from the unit have given talks in schools about the dangers of drinking, but also told them that they are committing an offence that will be prosecuted . . .

A group of five youngsters were cautioned for drinking in a town centre pub recently, as were a group of five youths in another pub . . .

Then in 1994 a report by youth workers nationally highlighted the growing problem of under-age drinking, and the unit began to combat this.

Groups of youths were gathering on the seafront"—

as I have already described—

"and High Street and causing a nuisance and fights."

Sergeant Grout said that such groups have diminished since they embarked on the project,

"but a more worrying trend of 12 to 16-year-olds drinking the strongest alcohol available has emerged."

I very much hope that the Bill will address that problem.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point has received support for his Bill from all parts of the country. I was sent a copy of a letter he received, in which a gentleman wrote:

"Much loutish behaviour is caused or made worse by alcohol, and at the moment I understand that the Police have no powers to confiscate it from young persons in public places, thus denying them a substantial weapon in enforcing the peace."

The gentleman referred to an article in The Daily Telegraph, that reports, as we have heard, a superintendent in Northumbria attributing the success of his force in reducing crime to

"putting the fear back into the villains."

The gentleman's letter concludes that

"only by restoring in young people a proper fear and respect for authority and an understanding that authority has power to impose its will if they step out of line, will it be possible to prevent the loutishness of today becoming the villainy of tomorrow."

I wholeheartedly support this very serious and important Bill. All of us who have children know how vulnerable and easily led they can be. None of us knows when tragedy can befall our family. Many hon. Members have done their best to bring up their children, but their children have been misled by others. I very much hope that the House will unite in supporting the Bill, and that it will quickly become law.

11.2 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Timothy Kirkhope): I am grateful—all of us should be—to my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) for introducing the Bill. Like others, I congratulate him very much on an excellent Second Reading speech. Like him, I believe that the Bill can make a real difference to many people's quality of life.

The House is not known by the public for its aversion to alcoholic beverages. Although many hon. Members who are present—including, by his own admission, my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point—may on occasion call into the Smoking Room for a small refreshment to help them unwind after a particularly stressful day, I think that the whole House shares my aversion to the spectacle of groups of teenagers involved in a heavy drinking session in a bus shelter or park or on a shopping parade.

Sadly, such drinking has become a problem in many of our towns and cities, including my city of Leeds and, indeed, my constituency of Leeds, North-East, where shopkeepers and members of the public have been irritated and caused deep concern by such activities on shopping parades. The problem certainly does not exist only in Essex; as my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) has reminded us, it occurs throughout the country.

There is a loophole in the law. The Licensing Act 1964 prohibits young people under the age of 18 from purchasing alcohol on licensed premises and prohibits adults from buying alcohol to give to young people to drink on licensed premises, but it does not prohibit young people from consuming alcohol in any place other than licensed premises. Although the police take enforcement of the legislation very seriously, what they can do if they see young people knocking back lager, cider or even stronger drinks in a public place is none the less very restricted, because the young people and any adults with them are not committing an offence.

The Government take their responsibilities on alcohol very seriously. I remind the House that their health policy on drinking is clearly set out in the "Sensible Drinking Report", which was published in December 1995. That said that young people need to be aware of the specific risks of excessive drinking that relate to their life style and of the need to minimise such risks to prevent harm to themselves and others. The Department of Health has also produced health education materials.

Some local initiatives have already been introduced to combat under-age drinking. My hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point mentioned the one that was started by police in Weymouth, which was a response to the problem of under-age drinking in public areas. It involved videoing children drinking alcohol and taking them back to their parents, who were shown the video. The initiative has received considerable media coverage in local papers and on television, and encourages parents to take responsibility for their children. I echo the remarks of some of my hon. Friends in saying that parental responsibility is of course the key to anything concerning young people. It is sad that not enough parents are obliged to take responsibility for the actions of their children.

Mr. Ian Bruce: My hon. Friend has kindly referred to my constituency and the excellent work done by the police in the "Do you know where your children are?" campaign, which arose to a certain extent as a result of an earlier ground-breaking scheme in Weymouth. Everybody knows that the area leads the way in such crime control measures. A group of concerned Christian adults set up a night bus, where children could be sheltered, especially if they were feeling the worse for alcohol. Such concern about people drinking alcohol in public drew the matter to the attention of the police. The Bill will take the initiative we need to solve the problem.

Mr. Kirkhope: Indeed. My hon. Friend and I had a dialogue about the success of the schemes in Dorset. I very much commend them and agree that they are an example of how local initiatives can succeed in helping young people. The police believe that the initiative in Weymouth has been very beneficial to prevention of under-age drinking. Indeed, the campaign proved such a success that, as my hon. Friend will know, the police decided to tackle all the other problems relating to youths in the same way, and with the assistance of voluntary agencies.

The Confiscation of Alcohol (Young Persons) Bill provides a quick, on-the-spot solution. Once enacted, it will be available to an officer throughout England and Wales. Any officer who is concerned by a group of youngsters who are drinking will be able to act immediately to solve the problem. It is important to remember that, although the occasional glass of cider or wine may do youngsters no harm, if taken as part of a family celebration such as a wedding or birthday or at Christmas, regular drinking by young people poses a real threat to their health and could lead to dependence on alcohol in years to come.

Equally seriously, regular drinking can lead young people to become involved in crime. The police are able to point to the fact that many offences are committed when under the influence of alcohol. Young people when drunk can do things that they may deeply regret. They can be tempted to inflict criminal damage; many fights are alcohol-related; and if youngsters are tempted to take a car, they can be a grave danger to themselves and others.

Apart from the danger that young people might be drawn to crime, many members of the public find the sight of youngsters who are the worse for drink very disturbing. Such youngsters can be loud, loutish and offensive. They may be all those things without realising that they are causing offence. If nothing happens when youngsters behave in that way, it can add to the impression that the police are not in control, and that can increase the general fear of crime. The public may, not unreasonably, fear that, if the police are unable to control drunken youngsters, they may not be able to take action against real offenders.

Before the Bill was introduced, a consultation exercise was undertaken. As my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point mentioned, we wrote to many members of the licensed trade, many interest groups and the police associations. In case there is any doubt, I wish to make it plain that my hon. Friend has full support for his measure from representatives of all police interests, including the Association of Chief Police Officers, the Police Superintendents Association and the Police Federation. Some concerns were expressed, of course, by some respondents, but the results were overwhelmingly favourable.

For instance, the British Retail Consortium said that it supported the proposals and that

"This action in itself could help to dissuade some youngsters from breaking the law in attempting to buy alcoholic drinks."

Alcohol Concern supported the proposals and said:

"We share the Home Office's view that additional steps are needed to meet concerns about young people's drinking and that it is preferable for the police to be in a position to take action before any damage occurs rather than once the law has been broken . . . Alcohol Concern supports the proposals to give the police discretion to take alcohol away from under 18s drinking in public."

The British Medical Association also supported the measures and said:

"We would support confiscation of alcohol as a measure to prevent underage drinking. It seems sensible that this will be implemented as a discretionary power . . . to avoid an additional burden on the courts."

The consultation paper also asked whether there would be merit in clarifying the law on test purchases. Test purchases are not included in the Bill, but the consultation pointed out that test purchases by those under age had proved a valuable means of enforcing the prohibition of sale to children and young people of various items, including cigarettes, tobacco, fireworks and videos, in addition to alcohol. There have been recent suggestions that test purchases of alcohol involve the commission of an offence under the Licensing Act 1964.

The Government are not persuaded that that is necessarily correct, but we believe that it is unsatisfactory that the law is in doubt, and that the law should be clarified as soon as there is a suitable legislative opportunity. In discussions with my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point, we came to the conclusion that his Bill was not the right legislative vehicle.

The Bill will give the police the power they need to deal with a particular problem. The provisions will give the police a power to confiscate alcoholic drinks or those that appear to be alcoholic from any person under the age of 18 in a public place or any other place to which such a person has unlawfully gained access. It will also give the power to confiscate alcohol from anybody who has reached the age of 18 or over if that person is in a public place or a place to which such a person has unlawfully gained access if the police have reasonable grounds to consider that that person will give alcohol to a young person in his or her company. That is an important part of the measure, and we believe that it will be effective.

The Bill will give the power of confiscation to any police officer. Before the Bill was drawn up, we consulted widely—as I have said—and the consultation paper originally suggested that the police officer should be in uniform. The Association of Chief Police Officers regarded that as a problem, because it considered that there might be times when a plain-clothes officer might wish to make use of the power. The Bill has been drawn up so that the power applies to any officer.

The police will also be given the power to confiscate anything that is, or that the constable reasonably believes to be, intoxicating liquor. That is so that there can be no argument about whether a drink is alcoholic. We do not need to have an over-active imagination to conjure up the sort of confrontations that might otherwise take place—"No, officer, you are mistaken, this is not alcohol. I always keep my lemonade in a lager can." We might think that that would not be a convincing argument, but it might be irrefutable without analysis.

Imagine what would happen if the youngster had actually put lemonade in the lager can and the officer had confiscated it. If the power of confiscation were limited to intoxicating liquor, the police officer could have been accused of acting unlawfully, but that will not be a problem, I am glad to say, because the Bill will give the police the power to confiscate any drink that appears to be alcoholic. Any officer will be in his rights to confiscate not only a can of lager from someone who appears to be under the age of 18, but to confiscate a bottle labelled "lemon squash" if he has reason to suppose that something stronger is contained in the bottle.

Mr. Stern: That point gives rise to an interesting speculation. If a bottle of lemon squash is confiscated by an officer because he believes it to contain alcohol, will he be obliged to submit it for analysis, or will he be able simply to pour it away? In the former case, if the bottle is subsequently found to contain lemon squash, the officer could be liable because he has confiscated property unnecessarily.

Mr. Kirkhope: I do not want to get into a long legal discussion about the issue, but the Bill makes it plain that officers will have to act reasonably. If they can show that they have done so, they will be protected. I thank my hon. Friend for raising an interesting point that may be gone into in further detail in Committee.

Alcopops have been mentioned in the debate. I have had some dealings with the Portman Group over some time and I am pleased that there is such a group. I am also pleased that it has set up a new independent panel under the chairmanship of Laurence Shurman, the former banking ombudsman, to take a close look at the marketing of such products. I welcome that and the present voluntary code, which seems to be working to some degree.

Having said that, I personally have deep concerns about alcopops. Whatever is said by the manufacturers, the mere wording of some of the titles of the products can appeal to young people. We should be careful about anything that, even covertly, encourages young people to drink alcohol. I know that I am a bit old-fashioned, but my connections with the brewing industry have taught me the care and professionalism that go into the production of beer. I find a fruit drink injected with chemical alcohol to be an aberration and I am not keen on those products or the way in which they are marketed.

However, we have a voluntary code, and the Government are undertaking careful monitoring of its success or otherwise. I hope that the monitoring will be active, and that, if we find that those products continue to blossom in number and in the luridness of their titles and appeal to young people, we will be prepared to take action against them. That is an important issue that concerns many people.

The Bill will also give the police power to confiscate alcohol in any public place. My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) was right to refer to trains, because some people are concerned about drinking on public transport and in stations. I can assure the House that the provision is widely drawn and I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point wishes it to apply to such areas.

The police will have the powers available to them whether the youngsters are in a park, sitting on a bench in the street, congregating around a bus station, a fish and chip shop, a shopping mall or even a cinema, or if they are trespassing in someone's garden or on school grounds at times when they should not be there. The police, as my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point has explained, will also have the power to confiscate alcohol from those who are over 18 if it is likely that the adult will give the alcohol to a young person in his or her company. That will prevent police powers from being frustrated. One can imagine that, without such a power, a mixed group of teenagers would quickly pass any alcohol that they were drinking to the oldest member of the group—who might be 18 or above—to keep until the police had gone away. The provision enabling the police to confiscate alcohol from those aged over 18 takes care of such mischief.

The power to demand the name and address of any person from whom the police confiscate alcohol is an important ingredient in a common-sense measure. We know from the initiatives in Weymouth—to which my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) and I have referred—that many parents are appalled to learn that their children are experimenting with alcohol, and this provision will allow the police to draw the matter to their attention. It is an offence under the Bill to refuse either to hand over the alcohol or to give one's name and address when requested to do so. This offence is subject to a level 2 fine—currently £500. The Bill also gives the police a power of arrest. That should ensure that youngsters do not refuse to hand over the alcoholic drink. Without that power, the police could be placed in the difficult situation of trying to remove alcohol from youngsters, which could degenerate into an unseemly tussle.

Although the Bill rightly backs the provision with an offence so that the law can be enforced, the whole object of the Bill is to avoid making young people into criminals. Even the best of youngsters can act unwisely—perhaps many hon. Members occasionally acted unwisely in their younger days. I am sure that few of the hon. Members here today are at present acting unwisely—although perhaps the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Davies) was slightly unwise to suggest that the doom-and-gloom merchants would prevail.

The Liberal Democrats try to have things all ways. On the one hand, the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth says that he will support the measure, but on the other hand, he wrings his hands and says that it will not work because the police will not want to know about it. We want to take a more optimistic approach to the legislation. It may be refined further in Committee, but I believe that it will work and that my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point has done the nation a great service by introducing the Bill.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I accept that the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Davies) has said that the motion to legalise drugs at the Liberal Democrat conference was aimed at setting up a commission, but the speeches made at that conference were wholly different. Indeed, a Liberal Democrat council leader and several of his colleagues went to the press to say that they thought legalising of drugs might well be the right way forward—at the same time as that council was attempting to persuade people not to go down that route by spending money on life education caravans and things of that nature. Frankly, the Liberal Democrats cannot have it both ways. They give mixed messages to teenagers.

Mr. Kirkhope: Perhaps those remarks were on a Monday; it is now Friday. I cannot explain it further than that.

I have mentioned that youngsters can act unwisely, but I should put that in context. The vast majority of our young people are law-abiding, conscientious and public and community-spirited, and we are lucky to have such young people. I do not want anybody to think that, in proposing the Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point is in some way generalising about the behaviour of young people. We are talking about a small number who are disruptive and a nuisance, and they do nothing to give credit to their contemporaries. I hope that the Bill may lead to fewer young people coming before the courts, because youngsters will not go on to commit other offences when drunk. They should quickly learn that they are not going to be permitted to drink in public in future, and this tough line is a good thing in my view.

The Bill is drawn in general terms and, as has been pointed out, would in theory enable a police officer to confiscate a bottle of wine from a family who were picnicking if it appeared likely that one of the children was to have a sip. My hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point has said, and I reiterate, that that is not the intention. The purpose of the Bill is to prevent troublesome behaviour, and the police are expected to use their discretion when they use the measure. There is no duty on them to enforce the provisions, and there will be times when it will be sensible for the police to turn a blind eye to youngsters having the occasional drink—that could be for a number of reasons—but the power must be available when needed.

Of course, it is not only youngsters who have alcohol problems; many adults do as well, and it can lead them into trouble also. It might be thought that the police should have the power to confiscate alcohol from any person who is drinking in a public place. I can fully understand the reasons people have for that view, but the difference between adult drinking and juvenile drinking is that adult drinking normally takes place either in licensed premises or in one's own home. A licence holder may refuse to admit, or may expel from his or her premises, anyone who is drunk, violent, quarrelsome or disorderly.

Lady Olga Maitland: My hon. Friend is touching on an important point about adult drinking in a public place. He rightly says that most adult drinking is done in the privacy of one's own home, but the public are molested by drunkards who walk around carrying cans near Westminster and in Trafalgar square. I hope that he will review the situation and give the police the power to confiscate those drinks.

Mr. Kirkhope: I do not want to be tempted down the route that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office, has attempted to tackle. It is important to note that there are many provisions and byelaws available to deal with adults in these circumstances, and I want to contain my remarks to young people.

As well as the byelaws in relation to adults, there is also a model byelaw, designed by the Home Office, to assist local authorities to make it an offence to continue to drink alcohol in designated public places after being asked to stop by a police officer. We have agreed 42 applications for the model byelaw, and others are under consideration. The byelaw has been effective in preventing public drunkenness and misbehaviour in certain city centres. Byelaws must apply to those of all ages, and it would be difficult for them to apply only to those under 18.

I conclude by repeating my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point on proposing an excellent piece of legislation. It is comparatively simple, and has only two clauses, but Bills of only two clauses often have an enormous impact on our society. The Bill will have an enormous impact—not only in its direct effect but in the clear message that it will send to young and old people alike that certain things are no longer tolerable. We must allow the police the necessary powers to prevent those things happening. I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): I join in the congratulations to the hon. Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink)—first, on his good luck in drawing a high enough ballot place to introduce the Bill, and secondly, on his choice of topic. However, he should have struck a slightly less aggressive tone in his speech, particularly as he is aware that the Opposition support the Bill. He might also have acknowledged that Labour-controlled authorities in Coventry and Glasgow forged new ground by introducing bans on drinking in public for all age groups—something that covers the earlier intervention by the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland). In local government and in the House, Labour has given support to the points that the hon. Gentleman has made.

I was going to make some observations on the speech by the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins) but, unfortunately, he made his speech—in which he commented on the fact that there were not many Labour Members present—and has not been seen since. I thought it worth mentioning his speech only because he had little to say about the Bill, but a great deal to say about law and order issues and the Government's record. So confident is he of defending that record to the people of Blackpool, South that he has taken himself off and found another constituency, but he can defend his observations in due course, I am sure.

In congratulating the hon. Member for Castle Point and supporting the Bill, I must point out that considerable evidence is available on the subject—some over a long period—which supports the need for something to be done about young people and alcohol. In a report in 1994, the Government's chief medical officer observed:

"From a very early age, young people develop a sophisticated awareness of alcohol and drinking behaviour. It appears that regular drinking, that is at least once a week, often begins at an early age and that weekly consumption in 14-15-year-olds is increasing. Recent surveys show that 20 per cent. of 9-15-year-olds have had their first alcoholic drink by the age of 8 and 89 per cent. by 13 years. Twelve per cent. of 11-15-year-olds are regular drinkers, and young people are also at risk for drunkenness offences and related criminal behaviour."

Clearly, we have known for a few years of the scale of the problem across an alarming age group.

Similarly, a report from the Home Office working group on young people and alcohol as early as 1987 commented—this is particularly important, because it is a comment on urban areas:

"Studies in several city centres in England and Wales have shown that almost half of the incidents of disorderly behaviour dealt with by the police occur shortly after the end of permitted drinking hours, particularly on Friday and Saturday nights, and often involve young men."

Therefore, the Home Office acknowledged as early as 1987 that there was a problem in city centres.

Another Home Office research study in 1989, "Drinking and Disorder: A Study of Non-Metropolitan Violence", stated:

"Inevitably, some of the lads (many of whom are very young) are over-excited or have drunk too much. Then an incident happens. Drunks stumble against each other, or insults are passed. Perhaps the proprietor of the local take-away feels he has to call the police. Then siren-cars draw up screaming—or perhaps some foot-patrol officers appear quickly. Whatever it is, the appearance of the police becomes part of the entertainment. There is something to watch. The crowds get more excited, jeer and taunt the police. Perhaps the whole incident calms down and the lads disappear . . . Perhaps it escalates".

The problems are well documented and have been studied in great detail, so it is timely that we now try to deal with them.

One can draw a number of clear conclusions from the available information. First, there is a growing problem of under-age drinking. Worryingly, as the hon. Member for Castle Point described, ever younger children are drinking. Secondly, the mixture of young people and alcohol is often volatile. Disorderly behaviour, which even in its mildest forms can be intimidating for elderly people and women, is a case in point.

The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam referred to her experiences on trains. Many women feel very intimidated, whether in the streets, on public transport or in other public places. Elderly people certainly find it frightening when large numbers of young people congregate, either drinking or under the influence of drink, and they have to confront them. It is unacceptable if all those public places are not free for everyone to use and to feel safe and free in.

Sadly, drink and incidents of violence in young people often go hand in hand. Indeed, the Royal College of Physicians has estimated that one quarter of 14-year-olds become violent after consuming alcohol. There are probably well-publicised incidents of a violent kind every week in every major town and city involving young people. If we can remove the source of the violence—that is, alcohol—by the measures contained in the Bill, all to the good.

The hon. Member for Castle Point and the Minister cited the Portman Group and some of the excellent work that it has done. I also want to place on record the Opposition's appreciation of the important work that the group carries out. The Minister also mentioned the problem of so-called alcopops. The most worrying feature is the cynical way in which some manufacturers market those products. They are not designed for the mass market or for middle-aged people such as myself or other right hon. and hon. Members. They are tightly targeted to attract very young people into believing that they are taking something that is essentially a lemonade-style product, but which has some alcohol in it. The naming of the drinks and the way in which they are advertised are tightly targeted at young people.

I join the Minister in deploring those products and the way in which they are marketed. It is fair to give the industry warning that, if it does not clean up its act, legislation may soon become necessary to force it to do so. The jury is out, but the matter is in the industry's hands. If it does not act voluntarily, we shall need statutory control.

Dr. Spink: Will the hon. Gentleman join me in welcoming the adjudication of the Portman Group on the three cases this morning, which lays down a marker for the industry?

Mr. Howarth: I do indeed, and I have commented on the work of that group and the work that it plans for the future.

The hon. Member for Castle Point also called for increases in youth facilities and I agree, but we must give much more thought to what sort of facilities young people want in the world that we now live in. In my teenage years in the 1960s, our needs were far more simple. I was happy to attend the local church youth club once or twice a week, where a few records were played and there was a snooker table, of which I made full use. That was about the extent of our ambitions.

Although sporting activities rightly figure prominently among the needs of young people—my children are involved in a wide variety of sporting activities, including soccer—the style and presentation of youth facilities has changed since my day and it is a far more sophisticated area. I do not want to labour that point, but we must give it much more thought.

My borough of Knowsley has given a great deal of time and thought to how to package sporting facilities in a way that is more attractive to young people. For example, on a Saturday night, my daughter uses the leisure centre in Huyton, which offers the use of all the facilities in one evening for a limited entrance fee. Some young people find such an offer much more attractive than just paying for a swim, some weight training or whatever.

A lot of work is being done to make such activities more attractive, but the hon. Member for Castle Point is right to say that, in the absence of other things to do, young people are drawn to street corners. In that setting, they often learn the sort of behaviour that leads to excessive drinking, vandalism and other forms of minor street crime, which can turn into more serious crime in later years. It is right to acknowledge that problem, although it forms no part of the Bill.

The hon. Member for Castle Point mentioned the importance of the family in forming people's drinking habits, and referred to the more continental style of introduction to drink. As a parent, I agree. It is important for young people to be introduced to alcohol in a home setting and in a way that does not encourage binge drinking: perhaps a drink with a meal, or the occasional glass or bottle—or can, as that is what young people seem to prefer—of beer. An ethos of small-scale, enjoyable, controlled drinking in a family setting should be established. That is the approach that I take, and I am sure that the same goes for many other hon. Members.

The right hon. Member for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt), who I gather was something of an inspiration for the Bill, spoke of his experience in his constituency, and expressed support for the Bill on behalf of the Conservative candidate in Wirral, South. He would not expect me to allow that to go without comment: as I have taken pains to find out, the excellent Labour candidate for that seat, Ben Chapman, also supports the legislation, and he has asked me to convey his welcome for it. However, he expressed some serious concerns and praised the intelligent way in which the Merseyside police deal with the problem.

Drinking out of doors, as I have seen in my constituency, happens more in the summer months. In the hot summer of 1995, there was an eruption of the problem in the parks in Kirkby. The police made the observation that people who were illegally importing drink—mostly lager—from the continent would pull up their transit vans at places where they knew that young people congregated, and target them specifically. That is a matter to which we must give some attention in the future, although the Bill will be a help.

The Bill is a good start, although it will not solve all the problems. The Home Office has model byelaws in place to deal with the wider problem, and I would encourage local authorities to take them up. The Bill is worth while, and we support it. I wish the hon. Member for Castle Point well as it proceeds through its later stages.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North–West): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) on introducing the Bill, which is thoroughly welcome, although I intend to comment on some of the details of its provisions. I am thoroughly envious of my hon. Friend's success in the ballot; after 14 years, I am still waiting to succeed, but I shall carry on trying.

The Bill is designed to fulfil a great need, which I can see in my constituency, especially around the small suburban shops, such as those in Station road, Henbury; Okebourne road, Brentry; Filton avenue; Gloucester road; and Conygre road. Groups of young people visit the shops, acquire alcohol by one means or another—no mention has yet been made of the phenomenon of young people outside supermarkets approaching strangers and providing them with money to go in and buy drinks for them—and congregate outside in a way that can be regarded only as intimidating by the elderly people who live nearby.

If the young people concerned are encouraged to move on, or decide for themselves to do so, too often it is to an adjoining piece of private land, which they use for an impromptu party. I am glad to see that that point is in part covered in the Bill, which refers not only to public places but to illegally occupied private places. I welcome that, and I believe that the Bill can go some way towards aiding the police, by giving them a power to deal in the most effective way with what is clearly a nuisance to the public.

As my hon. Friend will know, the devil is often in the detail, and I hope that he will take my various criticisms, comments and queries in the context of my welcoming the Bill and wanting to see it enacted in this Parliament. We shall need to examine various aspects in Committee.

The Bill refers to young people drinking in a private place to which they have unlawfully gained access. My constituency, along with many other urban, suburban or semi-urban constituencies, suffers regularly during the summer months from illegal occupations of pieces of ground—usually public ground—by groups of travellers who arrive, stay until they are moved on, and then depart for another similar piece of ground. There is a continual battle between the local authority and me about whether it is using adequately the powers that the Government have given it, to move on as quickly as possible what is undoubtedly a public nuisance.

I do not expect either my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point or the Minister to answer this query today, but I hope that it will be considered in Committee: will the Bill give the police powers to follow young people on to those illegally occupied pieces of ground, in order to confiscate the alcohol that they have purchased from local shops? My local police would welcome such a power, as an effective way—in spite of the local authority—of putting further pressure on groups of travellers to end their illegal occupation.

I am a little concerned by the power in the Bill for the police to confiscate alcohol from a person aged 18 or over if that person is suspected of being likely to pass the alcohol to someone under the age of 16. I entirely understand the need for that power, but I am concerned that it could allow over-active policing: if an adult, of any age, is seen coming out of a shop with a couple of bottles of Hooch or Bacardi Breezer, the implication could be that the drink is for consumption by a young person, because all the marketing of such drinks is aimed at the young. I would not wish store detectives, especially in large supermarkets, to be forced to note the adults who regularly purchase such drinks, in case the police needed to investigate because of the clear implication of a potential offence.

I come now to an aspect of the Bill that I find rather worrying—the power of arrest given to the police when a young person found with alcohol refuses to give his or her name and address. My hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point and other colleagues have said that they would give general support to a future Government Bill to introduce identity cards. They will be aware that that support is not universally shared on the Conservative Benches. I am one of those who have expressed considerable doubt about compulsory identity cards.

It appears to me that the wording in the Bill is framed as if identity cards were already in existence. An officer on the streets in my constituency may see a young person apparently consuming alcohol under age and ask him for his name and address. I accept that in many cases that young person will already be known to the police. However, if the young lad concerned says, "My name is Michael Stern and I live at 131 Westbury road," I would hope that the local police would know that he was giving a false name and address, although I cannot be sure of that. If the young lad is careful and says, "My name is John Smith and I live in Station road," the police officer would be placed in an invidious position. The young lad would be given an obvious way out, simply by claiming a false identity and also claiming that he was unable to prove his identity. Without a compulsory identity card, I am not sure how we can get around a problem that is posed by the Bill because it gives that power of arrest.

A number of other provisions in the Bill concern me and I wonder whether adequate consideration has been given to the drafting of a measure which, after all, gives considerable additional powers to the police. For example, I wonder whether a level 2 fine is an appropriate penalty for an offence under the Bill. Clearly, the Bill is aimed at persuading young people not to drink in public places. It gives police the power to confiscate, using reasonable force, when the young person concerned will not stop drinking in a public place. I hope that it would be seen as a total failure of policing if such a case actually reached the juvenile courts and the youngster concerned was subject to a fine on the scale outlined in the Bill. Therefore, I wonder whether it is wise to include such a fine in the Bill, as it might tempt the police to use it.

I have another point, which I do not expect my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point to deal with today, but which I hope can be dealt with in Committee. Why does not the Bill extend to Northern Ireland, in the way that so much of our legislation now rightly does?

I am concerned about the general power of disposal of seized alcohol that is given to the police in the Bill. My hon. Friends will know that on a number of occasions I have spoken in the House about the similar power available to Customs and Excise when it seizes bootlegged alcohol. It is a continuing problem for Customs and Excise. I hope that the Bill would encourage, if no more than that, the disposal of any alcohol seized down the nearest drain, rather than being carried back as an exhibit to the local police mess. As I said in an intervention earlier, the police would be well advised to dispose of seized alcohol down the nearest drain as quickly as possible, to avoid any challenges over whether it was indeed alcohol.

I am conscious that other hon. Members wish to speak and that we are short of time. It is a good, worthwhile and necessary Bill. The police undoubtedly need the sort of powers proposed in the Bill. However, I fear that there is still a great deal of work to be done in Committee.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham): My hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) is to be congratulated on being lucky in the ballot. I was lucky a couple of years ago, so I know that from the moment a Member of Parliament scores a low number in the ballot, every pressure group in the United Kingdom is on his doorstep trying to persuade him to adopt its Bill. It is to the great credit of my hon. Friend that he chose this Bill, which I wholeheartedly support. It is a valuable Bill that will give the police an important new weapon in their armoury to deal with the problem of under-age drinking in public places.

It is important to recognise what the Bill is not—it is not an answer to the ills of alcohol and under-age drinking. In fact, the Bill is an assault on yobbery, which is why I support it. Although yobbery may not come high up the scale of criminal offences, its effects are widespread and distressing for many people. My hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) told us how people are intimidated by gangs of under-age youths drinking in bus shelters and other such places. I know that in my constituency many people—not just elderly people—are frightened to go into the centre of the market town of Hexham at night because of gangs of youths with drink. It even affects villages in the Tyne valley. The village of Wylan—which my hon. Friend the Minister knows well—has recently suffered from visitations by youths from surrounding areas, causing problems for local people. These are quality-of-life crimes, which people are increasingly coming to understand are very important.

Fear of crime is often far worse than the crime itself—that is certainly the case for many elderly people. One of the causes of that fear is the yobbish behaviour of groups of irresponsible young men. Indeed, the vandalism and criminal damage that result from that bring down a neighbourhood. The pride of the neighbourhood goes when trees newly planted by the local authority are broken, litter is left lying around and graffiti are sprayed about. Therefore, I am especially grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point for introducing the Bill.

What has surprised me—I think that it is a misunderstanding of what the Bill is about—is that interested groups, such as the Portman Group, oppose the Bill. In its submission, it said that the Bill "strikes us as excessive and an undesirable precedent to create a blanket power of confiscation from people where there is no suspicion that disorder or nuisance might occur."

That group misunderstands the Bill. It is not a Bill designed to solve the problems of drunkenness—it is intended to stamp out a particular form of drunkenness.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North–West (Mr. Stern) may be too legalistic in his attitude. When I spoke to my local police about the Bill, they said that it was a great idea. They said, "We won't be using it to its limits. However, when we see young men in the streets with cans or bottles of drink in their hands, we can tell them to pour it down the drain or we shall nick them." The police want the Bill so that they can remove the problem before it arises. Currently, they can move young people on, but they cannot make them dispose of the alcohol. I understand my hon. Friend's concerns, but with some legislation we simply have to launch it and hope that the good sense of the police will make it work properly. I am confident that it will work properly.

At the risk of being out of order, may I say that the Northumbria police have had a successful five years in the fight against crime? A few days ago, they announced for last year a further 15 per cent. fall in crime. That is one of the biggest drops that the force has had in a year and it has resulted in a 30 per cent. drop in crime in Northumbria over the past five years. Northumbria started off badly, with many problems, one of which is that, compared with other parts of the country, there is a high conviction rate for drunkenness. Merseyside normally has the worst rate and Northumbria is usually second. It is a sad record that neither region appreciates. We have a higher rate of drunkenness per 100,000 people than that in even the Metropolitan police area.

The police in Northumbria have been tackling the issue in various ways. They were successful in reducing under-age drinking in Wallsend near Newcastle where, along with the local authority, they have clamped down especially on licensees who sell drink to those who are under age. Some licences have been withdrawn from off-licences, and that should set an example. In Gateshead, the police reduced street vandalism and youth disorder by 20 per cent. in a month through a drive to tackle those problems.

The national figures on drunkenness are encouraging, in that they have been falling for the past 10 years. An important aspect of the matter is the age of those who are convicted of drunkenness. Those convicted of that offence used to be aged 20 to 21, but the age has slowly been reducing and the average has recently moved from 19 to 18. There have also been convictions of people aged from 14 to 16, and with the average age down to 18, there will be many problems with people younger than that.

The 1994 figures show a sad number of convictions for drunkenness. I am talking not about bad behaviour, but of people being sufficiently drunk to be arrested. The figures show that people aged from 14 to 17 have been convicted. They also show a few under the age of 14 who are not usually included in the figures. There is a growing problem with young drinkers, and I am grateful for the opportunity to support a Bill that will address that.

I have a technical point for the Minister. Like me, my right hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt) was surprised to learn about the existing licensing and drink laws. Until I made some inquiries, I did not know that it is perfectly legal to give drink in a private or public place to anyone over the age of five. That is extraordinary. Anyone caught giving drink to a child under the age of five would be caught by the Children and Young Persons Act 1933.

Curiously, it is perfectly proper for me to take a child or my daughter or son—perhaps at the age of 14—to a public park on a Sunday and give them beer, for a picnic. Under clause 1 of the Bill, the police would have the power to arrest me for doing that. As I say, I was surprised to learn of those provisions. No doubt they will form a suitable subject for my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North–West to add to his list for debate in Committee, and I shall not have to add them to mine.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point on his Bill. I welcome it and hope that it will have support. I apologise to the House in advance if I am not here for the end of the debate, as I have to leave shortly to return to my constituency.

Mr. Hartley Booth (Finchley): The Bill has been fulsomely praised and welcomed, but that need not stop because I shall add to it by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) on his judicious choice of subject.

I should like to deal with juvenile crime and its link to alcohol. Juvenile crime is demonstrated by the criminal statistics. The peak age for a criminal offence is between 14 and 16. For females, the age is 14 to 15, while it is 15 to 16 for males. It is important to discover what is helping to cause crimes that are committed at those ages. Hon. Members have already mentioned the importance of looking at the causes of crime. At the heart of them is substance and alcohol abuse at an early age. At the heart of the mosaic that we are dealing with is this little piece—alcohol. It is perhaps important to deal not only with the detail, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North–West (Mr. Stern) did, but with the wider links with that piece of mosaic. For instance, the culture and peer pressure help to stimulate crime by young people.

Last week in this place, I talked to a great gentleman called Lei Lei, a famous artist from China, whose paintings have already sold for great pric. He explained how, as a young man in China—he described himself as a peasant—he was poverty-stricken. He said that young people in Britain were spoilt because they were given too much—perhaps not a thought that is often expressed by Labour Members in praise of our education system. He added that, when he was young during the cultural revolution in China, he had one pen a year. There was no paper; he could draw only on newspapers. My hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point was right to address what it is in the culture that leads to the problems and to say that alcohol is part of the culture of young people.

As some colleagues may know, I too have studied alcohol and drug abuse for many years. I did some research asking people what started them off on alcohol and drug abuse. I spoke to one individual who gave me seminal evidence on the subject. He explained that, when he was nine years old, at Sunday lunch, he was given a glass of alcohol—cider—and that that set him off. It gave him a buzz. He stole alcohol all through his childhood, and he soon got on to drugs.

In the process that follows the Bill, we need to consider whether five, 10, 15 or 20 per cent. of people are predisposed to addiction and are addictive personalties. It is perhaps partly a mental problem. I hope that we will consider that in future years, and that that piece of mosaic will be part of a serious analysis. We therefore need to do much more.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): My hon. Friend has talked about the need to look to the future. Does he agree that perhaps some local authorities could do what Glasgow has done and introduce byelaws that ban the drinking of alcohol by everyone in public places? Does he further agree that, in parts of the London borough of Barnet, for example, people drink alcohol in public places, take drugs and intimidate law-abiding citizens?

Mr. Booth: I take that point. During the debate, there has been reference to the importance of byelaws. To be fair, the Labour spokesman, the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth)—I see him nodding—referred to it.

Hon. Member after hon. Member has said that there is a vast amount of evidence on the link between alcohol and crime by young people. I should like to give my own. I was a barrister too, and saw the link many times. I found out about the tragic offence, not yet known to the criminal calendar, called "bottling". One does not need to explain exactly what it is—it explains itself.

Before I entered Parliament, I studied these matters and tried to help behind the scenes in the Home Office and the Cabinet Office. In the mid-1980s, we had appalling trouble with young people drinking alcohol on the terraces of football pitches. Hon. Members who were in the House at the time know that legislation was speedily introduced in three months to ban alcohol on the terraces. It is fair to say that, during our research leading to the legislation, I and others telephoned the Scottish Office because such legislation had been introduced in Scotland in 1981.

Mr. John Marshall: In Glasgow.

Mr. Booth: My hon. Friend refers to Glasgow. Scotland had introduced the legislation in 1981. The Scottish Office said that, once that legislation banning alcohol on the terraces was in place, families came back to football. Those responsible for the policy in Scotland also reported that, as a result of the ban on alcohol, attendances at football matches had risen greatly, and crime was down.

The Conservative Government brought in similar legislation for England and Wales in 1985, and a year later statistics revealed that the number of crimes committed at football matches had dropped by 36 per cent. In all fairness, the anti-alcohol legislation was not solely responsible for that change, because the introduction of closed circuit television also had an effect. Those two principal changes were equally important. The ban on alcohol, however, was the only material change made to the law. It demonstrably proved that alcohol had been a major factor influencing crime on the terraces, and it helped to alter behaviour at football matches. There is bags of evidence to prove a link between alcohol and crime in addition to that already cited.

Since Victorian times it has been possible for licensed premises to ban children from buying alcohol, but the Bill neatly fills in a gap identified by the police and Home Office research. I praise it for doing so.

I hope that the Bill will be part of wider work on the young, and, in particular, on the attention deficit disorder, which is another major factor in bad behaviour. I hope that those at the Home Office and perhaps in the Opposition home affairs team will consider conducting research on ADD. It is another piece of the mosaic which must studied as we attempt to deal with crime in the future.

I disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West because I believe that the level 2 fine is appropriate. We should not presume that the police will always impose it—in any event, the Crown Prosecution Service would suggest the appropriate fine to the court, not the police.

In Committee, I hope that we will be told that special constables and the transport police will also have recourse to the Bill.

Clause 1(1)(b) should be analysed in Committee because I believe that evidence showing that someone intended another person to drink alcohol would necessarily be tenuous. It would be extremely difficult to prove that in a court of law.

The Government have a fine record on dealing with the problem of alcohol misuse. In the 1980s, they established an interdepartmental committee under the chairmanship of John, now Lord, Wakeham to investigate each Department's approach to the problem. I gather from the gesture from my hon. Friend the Minister that that committee is still at work—I hope so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point and the Government hold the problem of alcohol misuse to their heart, and I praise them for what they have done. We have heard excellent references today to the work of the police, parents and those in the voluntary sector. I commend the Bill. I hope that it will foster other work in the everlasting research and effort to ensure that our young people grow up honestly and soberly.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) on promoting the Bill. As he is not in the Chamber, however, I shall reserve my remarks on his speech until the end of mine.

What a relief it is for me—taking off my party political and parliamentarian hats and going out as an ordinary member of the public—to find that a major loophole in the law is being dealt with. It is deeply frustrating to walk in high streets and other public places, or to use public transportation, and to find oneself harassed, pushed around and feeling threatened—I may not have been in danger in the example I gave in my earlier intervention, but I thought I was—and to believe that nothing is being done about the problem. This Bill would give police real powers to take clear and positive action to change the landscape, particularly in town centres, by removing the item that makes a young person misbehave.

The problem is much wider, however, than young people drinking in public. We must ask why they are drinking so much, and, more importantly, why they are out so late at night. What are their parents doing, and why cannot parents control their children and keep them at home? I do not accept the argument that young people have nothing to do, because that is nonsense; there is plenty for young people to do.

Perhaps the problem is moral poverty, listlessness and no sense of direction. Perhaps society has a role to play in helping to build more cohesive families and in promoting the traditional family structure of two parents—a man and wife committed to each other and to rearing their children in harmony. Children are far less likely to be lounging on street corners causing problems if they live in a traditional family environment.

The problem affects not only deprived inner-city areas but the entire country, and all social groups. My constituency of Sutton is a very pleasant suburban area and has many trees. People there live well. They have jobs, and they are proud—

Mr. John Marshall: They also have excellent Members of Parliament.

Lady Olga Maitland: I thank my hon. Friend.

People in Sutton are proud, dignified and hard-working. Even in our own high street, however, we have the problem of under-age drinking. The problem has been exacerbated because, in their wisdom, Liberal Democrats in the town hall gave planning permission for the opening of new nightclubs and pubs. Sutton residents knew that such permission would bring only trouble to the high street, and that is what has happened.

We sent petitions and warned the council, and we demonstrated on the issue, but it would not listen. I have spoken to the local police, and they have shrugged their shoulders and admitted that their representations to the council were not properly heard. At long last, the police may be given those vital powers.

Sutton police have also told me of their intense frustration. Currently, all they can do when they find under-age young people helpless with drink in the high street is to bundle them into a car and return them to their parents. Often, parents are shocked and horrified to discover that their child has been out, and the child's bravado drops like a stone. There is good reason to believe that parental involvement will be a key factor in achieving the Bill's intentions.

We should deal with another aspect of the problem—the marketing of those somewhat off-beat drinks, the alcopops. I have long admired Dr. John Rae, the director of the Portman Group, and congratulate him on working with drinks manufacturers to create a voluntary code. Although the code is working, it has not solved the problem. There is no point in having a voluntary code to control the marketing of such drinks if it ultimately has no bite or sanctions to force changes in marketing practice.

I read in The Daily Telegraph today that there has been a degree of success in that the Portman Group upheld some complaints about particularly aggressive advertising of drinks with names such as Purple Passion, TNT Liquid Dynamite and a beer called—I do not think that I can mention its name publicly as it is just too awful. [HON. MEMBERS: "Go on."] No, I will not.

Such drinks are being marketed aggressively for a host of reasons. One is to make young people feel big and brave. Others are to imply that a youngster drinking these products will be more attractive to women or that drinking them is safe because they are really nothing but soft drinks with a little lift. Such insidious marketing is very dangerous. We should go beyond merely upholding complaints and consider how to impose sanctions on manufacturers who use unsuitable advertising which incites young people to drink and thus causes serious problems.

The number of young people taking to drink has rocketed. Some surveys have been carried out of the numbers involved. For example, Edinburgh university conducted a survey of 7,500 pupils in England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. It is worrying that it found that 94 per cent. of those pupils had consumed alcohol.

Young people drink alcohol because they believe it to be an easy option with no dangers. They want to be seen as grown up and want to show off to their friends, but they have no idea how to handle alcohol or of its effects, and their behaviour is causing them untold harm. One of the dangers is that alcohol makes them lose their sense of control and reason. Unfortunately, that leads to unprotected sex and we see teenage mothers coming on stream. This is the reality; what I am saying is not anecdotal.

A teenage mother came to see me, bouncing her baby on her knee. I asked her how she came to be pregnant—I was rather severe with her and imagined being her mother. She replied, "Oh, one too many drinks at Christmas." I said that I hoped the father was going to support the child but she said that he could not because he was still at school—she was, too. The problems caused by drinking are so serious that the Bill is more important than we perhaps realise.

We must also bear it in mind that some young people who drink alcohol because it gives them a buzz and a lift might, in their vulnerable state, try soft drugs and then hard drugs. That can lead to a life of crime to support the purchase of those drugs or more alcohol. The Bill will therefore be far more effective than we have perhaps given it credit for.

It is interesting to note what has happened when local authorities have tried to control drinking in public places by invoking byelaws, which have some merit.

Byelaws have been invoked in many towns in Scotland, and we have also heard about Coventry, Merseyside and Northumbria. However, the difficulty with byelaws is that they do not give the police the power to confiscate the drink—the police can say only that drinking in a public place is banned. That is fine but it does not go far enough or have enough "crunch" to it.

What the police can do, however, is get tough with off-licences. Indeed, in many cases, they monitored off-licences to see whether they were illegally selling drink to young people, or aiding and abetting people who could lawfully buy drink but who then handed it to their younger brothers and sisters.

Byelaws can be effective, as we have seen throughout the country. Indeed, I was talking to the local police for Whitby Bay about how effective byelaws have been in bringing under-age drinking under control. It is interesting that, in Northumbria, crime dropped by 50 per cent. when they were introduced, because, when people are not drunk, they are less likely to misbehave, and there is less likely to be vandalism, theft, burglary and other socially unacceptable behaviour.

My hon. Friend's Bill is enormously important—I am glad to see that he has returned. With this Bill, he is leading and the world is following. Many people will follow the Bill's progress with enormous interest. When it becomes an Act, it will undoubtedly change our social landscape, and will place greater emphasis on parental power and responsibility. Parents must be accountable not only to their children but to the law. Perhaps, at a later stage, we will hold parents accountable—even have them up in court and fine them—if their children are persistent drinkers.

The debate has been enormously successful. This is a very welcome Bill. I congratulate my hon. Friend on his choice.

Dr. Spink: I am grateful to all hon. Members for supporting this important Bill. By their actions, everyone will see that we in the House intend to make the streets safer for young and old people alike. I particularly thank my hon. Friend the Minister and the Home Office for their kind help.

We have had a constructive debate, in the best traditions of the House. My right hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt) made a powerful speech, and brought to the debate the experience of his local police. He spoke most eloquently, and I am deeply indebted to him for his encouragement to me to take up the Bill in the first instance, and for his subsequent advice.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff), who has given his full support to the Bill and does such excellent work in his constituency in fighting this problem.

My hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins) was right to focus on the support for the Bill from the police,, who, after all, have to deal with these problems on the streets at the sharp end.

My hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) made a most important point about the provision of youth facilities. The Bill in itself will not be a panacea. It will not solve all the problems. We need to provide alternative and challenging facilities for young people.

I am particularly grateful to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth), the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman, for his positive approach to this measure. He rightly drew attention to the simple formula: drink plus youths equals trouble, and too often violence, so we must act now. He made an excellent speech. I am sorry if he thought me a little critical. It was not directed to him personally. I am very grateful for his support.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) made her usual fearless injunctions on behalf of the family. She is unequalled in her support for the family, and we all enjoyed her speech.

The Portman Group believes in targeted rather than blanket solutions. It says:

> "Problems such as drink-driving, late-night disorder and excessive or 'binge' drinking are best solved by a combination of balanced legislation, high quality staff training for alcohol retailers and credible research-based education about what constitutes 'sensible' drinking."

My Bill will play an important legislative part. Although mention has been made of the Portman Group's opposition to the Bill, it has told me that, providing that it is just one measure in a whole series of measures, and that it takes into account the various practical difficulties that I addressed in my speech, it is happy to see the Bill go forward. I am grateful to the Portman Group for its support, even though it is a little lukewarm.

The Portman Group's code of practice on the naming, packaging and merchandising of alcoholic drinks has been supported by the vast majority of companies that manufacture and sell alcohol in the UK. The code represents agreement within the industry that no alcoholic drink should appeal overtly to under-18s. It is a voluntary code; I hope that it works, and I congratulate the Portman Group on its finding in the three cases this morning. The industry must, however, realise that, if the voluntary code does not work, the matter will be taken up by the House, and we shall enforce tighter restrictions.

A number of detailed questions on the guidelines and on unlawful access have been raised by my hon. Friends the Members for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) and for Finchley (Mr. Booth), and especially by my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North–West (Mr. Stern). The latter is absolutely right to put the Bill under the most careful scrutiny, and I welcome that. Those questions will be dealt with in Committee; I shall not deal with them now, because I want to give as much time as possible to the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) to ensure that the Road Traffic Reduction Bill can get the same fair and full Second Reading that my Bill has been afforded by the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second Time, and committed to a Standing Committee, pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

Road Traffic Reduction Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

12.30 pm

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) on the success of the Confiscation of Alcohol (Young Persons) Bill. It is an important measure and it has my party's support.

I also thank the hon. Gentleman for his courtesy in ensuring that there is an opportunity today to have an important discussion on the Road Traffic Reduction Bill. Having thanked one hon. Member, I also thank the many hon. Members on both sides of the House who have announced their support for the Bill. I thank in particular the hon. Members who have agreed to act as sponsors of the Bill—again, they are from both sides of the House. They support the Bill because, like me, they are concerned about the significant problems created by the excessive amount of traffic on our roads. Like me, they believe that something needs to be done urgently; this is therefore a Bill whose time has come.

That view is widely shared outside the Chamber, and I pay tribute to the many organisations, especially Friends of the Earth, that have played such a key part in preparing the Bill. I also pay tribute to earlier attempts to deal with the problem, not least those led by the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Dafis), which have helped in the preparation of the Bill. I pay tribute to many other organisations including, for example, the townswomen's guilds. Many councils, which will have additional duties placed on them if the Bill is enacted, have nevertheless recognised its importance and have shown their support for it.

Hundreds and thousands of individual members of the public have become involved. I have had more than 1,000 letters in support of the Bill and a petition in support of it now has more than 350,000 signatures from every part of the country. I thank all those people for their support and encouragement.

I single out one other person—the Minister. As soon as I had the opportunity to introduce a Bill and selected the Road Traffic Reduction Bill, the Minister was courteous enough to afford me the opportunity to meet him and then to have discussions with his officials. Those discussions have been extremely helpful and constructive, and I pay tribute to the Minister and his colleagues for their support and assistance. I shall refer to one or two of the Minister's further suggestions later in my speech.

Hundreds of thousands of people recognise that Britain is facing significant problems as a result of excessive traffic.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): It is a pleasure to be one of the sponsors of the Bill. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the choice facing the British people is simple: increased gridlock or very much better public transport?

Mr. Foster: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman and I thank him for his support in sponsoring the Bill. It is critical that we find ways of improving public transport so that it is sufficiently attractive to convince people to leave their cars and use it. However, the Bill goes further and proposes important measures to tackle the problem.

We are all well aware of the problems, and I shall not read out a comprehensive list. However, it is worth reflecting that figures supported by the Confederation of British Industry show that road congestion costs British businesses a staggering £19 billion a year. In addition, the problems created by lost days at work because of traffic accidents cost industry another £6.5 billion a year.

Excess traffic also creates problems for the health of the nation. One in seven young people already suffer from asthma, which is exacerbated by air pollution caused by traffic fumes. A study by Lancaster university shows that some 15 million people—a staggering number—suffer ill health as a result of traffic fumes. Sadly, the research shows that there are some 10,000 premature deaths each year because of traffic pollution.

There are wider environmental problems. There is evidence that, each night, 63 per cent. of the British population live with noise levels above the upper limit set by the World Health Organisation. It is difficult to calculate the cost to the nation of health problems caused by road traffic, but independent estimates vary widely between £4.5 billion a year and £12.5 billion a year.

We are all aware of the other environmental problems. We are all concerned about global warming, and the Government have taken action to tackle the problem. The causes of global warming include carbon dioxide emissions; vehicles account for 22 per cent. of those emissions.

Traffic problems represent a major contribution to acid rain—a major environmental problem. It is estimated that some 700 sites of special scientific interest are likely to be seriously damaged by acid rain, to which air pollution from car fumes is a major contributory factor.

We should also be concerned about energy consumption. In Britain, transport accounts for 33 per cent. of energy consumption and 80 per cent. of that is used by road transport. If we could address those problems, we could save lives, improve the environment and save the nation billions of pounds.

The problems are already bad; the real concern for the House and the nation is that there are currently 25 million vehicles on our roads. All reasonable estimates suggest that the number will double in 25 to 30 years. Given that the problems are bad now, we should think how serious they will be in 25 years' time if we do not take action to tackle them.

The Bill's measures do not pretend to provide all the solutions to the problems. As the hon. Member for Castle Point pointed out in the previous debate, his Confiscation of Alcohol (Young Persons) Bill is part of the solution to a very serious problem. If it becomes law, my Bill will be part of the solution. It provides the mechanisms by which many of the sensible suggestions and solutions that have already been identified may more easily be put into practice. It also identifies how new solutions may undergo trials and, if successful, be put into practice.

Many councils have already worked hard to identify ways in which they can begin to tackle the excess traffic in their areas. I hope that the Bill will ensure that all councils have to consider such measures, share examples of good practice and develop new, imaginative solutions.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Am I right in assuming that clause 4 would allow the Secretary of State for Scotland to draw up guidelines for councils in advance of the drawing up of local plans so that, among other things, any incompatibility between neighbouring councils may be avoided?

Mr. Foster: The hon. Gentleman raises a very important point. If appropriate measures were not included in the Bill, it would be possible for councils to develop plans that might cause problems for neighbouring councils. A good example of that concerns crime watch provisions. We are all in favour of crime watch schemes, but if all they do is divert criminal activity to a neighbouring area, problems arise. Provision for the Minister to ensure, for example, development at a regional level, the creation of opportunities to co-ordinate different proposals and the giving of guidance in advance to councils on the sort of action that he would like taken is a vital part of the Bill.

One statistic always worth reflection by those who say that nothing can be done—it is one of many that I could cite and a staggering thought—is that, in London, one in eight car journeys are under 1,000 m. If we cannot do something about such short car journeys, we shall have a real problem in future.

Clause 2 places a duty on councils to draw up local traffic reduction plans, set targets for reducing or curtailing the growth of different types of traffic in their area by 2005 and 2010 and set out measures that, in their opinion, are necessary to achieve those targets. The Bill would also expect them to provide an estimate of the cost of the measures, an assessment of the effect of each of them on the reduction in road traffic and an assessment of the likely reduction in carbon dioxide, nitrogen dioxide, volatile organic compounds and PM10 emissions—particles of less than 10 microns—in the atmosphere.

The Bill does not, of course, limit what might appear in such plans. It contains a number of measures that might be included in them. Examples are given that will, I hope, be the basis for the sharing of good practice. They could include encouragement of cycling or walking, alteration of planning policy to reduce the need for travel, provision of more and better public transport—as the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) said—reductions in the speed of road traffic by traffic-calming measures and the creation of pedestrian-only or restricted traffic zones, backed by effective park-and-ride schemes such as those in my constituency. They could also include provision of more information to people about the alternatives available and work with businesses in the locality to promote, for example, car-sharing schemes.

I pay tribute to BAA, which has organised a computerised system at Heathrow so that all its employees can have an access to an effective database to see if anybody is travelling to work from their area with whom they can link up. I also congratulate Nottingham council which has worked with local businesses, especially Boots the Chemist, to develop schemes that will reduce road traffic use by their employees.

I pay tribute also to the Confederation of British Industry. The Minister, I know, has some reservations about targets that might be set by the Government or anybody else. Interestingly, the CBI, which some might suggest is not the most radical of organisations on environmental issues, suggests in its latest publication "All Aboard" that individual companies should set targets for the reduction of mileage travelled by employees. The CBI's target is much tougher than any that have been suggested for the Bill. The CBI suggests a > "10 per cent. reduction in mileage travelled by employees using a car in the course of work over the next twelve months."

I hope that local councils, when developing their plans, will consult businesses and many other organisations.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I support the Bill, but will the hon. Gentleman admit that increased car numbers and usage will cause tremendous pressure in the future, irrespective of what we do—although, of course, we must carry on with the battle? The duty on local authorities to consider ways to reduce car usage should not distract them from considering how useful bypasses can be in certain areas where traffic has already built up and is intolerable, such as in Read, Simonstone and Gisburn in my local area, where the local residents are in favour of a bypass. Yes, we need to reduce traffic, but we should not forget the usefulness of bypasses.

Mr. Foster: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's intervention, because some hon. Members and people outside the House have suggested that the Bill is in some way an anti-car Bill. It is not: it is an anti-excess-traffic Bill. The hon. Gentleman gave one example of the measures that need to be taken, but the Bill focuses on reducing the amount of traffic on the roads, because that is one of the best ways to reduce congestion and the need for additional roads.

The other clauses will give opportunities to the Secretary of State to give reasonable priority to the measures contained in the plans drawn up by local councils, including an opportunity for the allocation of central Government funds to local councils to give high priority to the traffic reduction measures proposed in their plans. Under the Bill, the Secretary of State will report to the House every two years on the success of such measures in the reduction of traffic.

As the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) mentioned, clause 4 refers to an opportunity for the Secretary of State, should he so decide, to consider ways to composite some of the individual local plans into regional plans and also, if he so chooses, to develop regional targets. As I said earlier, I have had constructive discussions with the Minister and I thank him for those. Since those discussions, the Minister has rightly pointed to small technical amendments that would make the Bill even more effective. I am grateful that he has agreed to have discussions, if the Bill is given a Second Reading, and to make those changes before the Committee stage.

The broad principles of the Bill are designed to ensure that we get effective value for the money spent by Government on transport policies and, especially, that we increasingly direct valuable and scarce resources towards tackling the problems created by excess traffic rather than simply trying to accommodate them. This is a Bill whose time has come.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): I congratulate the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) on his good fortune in winning such a high place in the ballot, which has given him the chance to introduce the

[Mr. Nigel Forman]

Bill. I can well understand—not only from his record, but from what I know of the beautiful city of Bath—why it makes good sense from his point of view to propose such a measure. I have known Bath well for many years and, in my humble opinion, the city is sometimes brought near to ruin by traffic congestion, which does considerable damage to the soft limestone of many of the buildings and creates other difficulties. Almost the worst problem of this nature in Bath is the surfeit of tourist coaches—a subject to which I wish to return.

I should like to place it on record that—unusually for my speeches in the House—I feel reasonably well qualified to speak on this matter, because I have not owned a motor car since 1976. That is not to say that I do not drive or that I am incapable of driving, but I make the minimum necessary use of the motor car. I am a fairly keen cyclist when I find the time and opportunity and when the weather is kind, and I make extensive use of public transport. My habitual mode of transport when going to and from my constituency is the train.

Two of my constituents took part in the lobby in support of the Bill on Wednesday. Alas, I was not able to meet them—although I would have liked to meet them—as I was busy with other parliamentary duties. However, I should place it on record that the Bill has the enthusiastic support of Edwin C. Carr of 6 Reynolds close, Carshalton, and of Robert Steel of 14 Palmerston road, Carshalton. That shows the good sense of my constituents on this matter.

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): And other matters.

Mr. Forman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

The Bill has various merits—one is that it is brief, and another is that it is couched in general terms. The hon. Member for Bath touched on the latter advantage, and said that one does not want to be too prescriptive when circumstances can change as a result of technological or scientific breakthroughs, changes in the planning laws and other factors.

The most important part of the Bill—although not its only important part—is clause 2(6), where the hon. Member for Bath sets out guidance for local authorities on how they might go about implementing the measure if the Bill becomes law. I commend him on that, and on the fact that he makes it a permissive, rather than mandatory, list.

I wish to divide my remaining remarks into two sections. The first will be a brief analysis from my point of view of some of the problems touched on by the hon. Member for Bath, and the second will be one or two suggestions of ways forward.

First, real problems are caused to many of our constituents by congestion, and there are also considerable economic costs. The hon. Member for Bath mentioned the best estimate from the CBI, and many other estimates have been made to support the argument. It is clearly a difficult calculation, as one never knows what might have happened in the absence of vehicles in certain circumstances. Nevertheless, the general drift of the argument is right. Congestion is costly and involves not only straight economic costs but opportunity costs—an important concept in these calculations.

It is also worth putting on record the lamentable fact that, although this country has fewer cars per head or per family than many countries of comparable wealth and income, we make greater use of the cars we have. There are more journeys per head or per family and many of those journeys are lamentably short, as the hon. Member for Bath said when he quoted figures for London. Clearly, we do not want to go further in that direction, because it is not good for human health or the environment and it contributes to congestion.

Secondly, the hon. Member for Bath was right to mention air pollution and to link with that both noise and vibration. Those are serious and linked problems, as I know from my constituency and elsewhere. Air pollution is obviously a contributory cause, although not the only cause, of asthma in children, bronchitis in elderly people, and so forth. Vibration is serious, particularly when lorries and buses go down streets—especially urban streets—that are not sufficiently reinforced or over bridges that are too weak, both of which are typical examples.

In my youth, I lived in Shrewsbury—a lovely old Roman and mediaeval town—which was at the time virtually ruined and shaken to pieces by the traffic going through the centre rather than around the outside. Things may well have changed since then, but that gives an example of what I am talking about.

The noise is a public nuisance. We are legislating against noise from stereos, videos, ghetto blasters and neighbours. Why should we not legislate more rigorously against traffic noise? Carshalton village is a lovely place, but if one stands on the pavement there one can scarcely have a conversation without shouting because of the traffic noise. It is not good news.

Thirdly—I might be slightly argumentative with this point—the media report extensively these days the increasing number of examples of aggression on the roads by drivers when they get behind the wheel, which sometimes lead to the ultimate expression of that weakness, the so-called road rage. Having observed these conditions for many years, I am convinced that, if people are deeply and increasingly frustrated in urban areas by intensive traffic congestion, the moment that they get even 250 yd of clear road, let alone a mile or so, they put their foot firmly down on the accelerator and go like a bat out of hell, venting their anger and frustration in that way. If they are blocked or something goes wrong with their ambition to get from this point to that point a quarter of a mile further on, on a nought to 60 in seven seconds basis, all their anger and frustration come out and there is a danger to pedestrians, cyclists and road safety in general. The Bill might contribute positively towards a solution to that problem, too.

Fourthly, the existence of all this traffic transforms our environment, often adversely. One of the most important issues in my constituency at the moment is the prospect of a huge Sainsbury megastore being built in the heart of Wallington on the corner of Stafford road and Woodcote road. My constituents who live in the nice, quiet, leafy streets around about do not want that store, for the simple reason that they feel that the planning process does not take sufficiently into account the development's traffic congestion implications. The roads are already in gridlock at certain times of the day—particularly when mothers are taking children to and from school by car, which is a new development compared with 20 or 30 years ago. Also, everyone makes greater use of the car, and there is no doubt that, if traffic levels are already near saturation point, it will not contribute to the quality of life, to people's health, the good of the nation or anything else to precipitate further congestion by building a store that is too large for the location.

The store is intended to serve a regional catchment area and, on planning and other grounds, if one is wise one does not put that sort of store in a residential area where there is not the necessary capacity on the roads. That is another reason to support the Bill.

It would be a good thing if planning policy could be a central element in the legislation and could be focused on. For too long, planning policy has been driven, if I may use the pun, by the needs of the motor vehicle industry. One has to get the matter into perspective. I do not have time to go into all the issues, but we must, for example, return to encouraging the use of private rail sidings, which would make it feasible for more freight to be carried on the railways rather than in large lorries, which often have to travel on unsuitable roads.

The heart of the problem is not so much the lorry, bus, taxi, car or motor cycle, although those are all contributory factors; it is the internal—sometimes known as the infernal—combustion engine. Although it is not yet in the marketplace, technology is already available for dual-powered—part-electric and part-petrol or diesel—gas-powered or solely electric vehicles. The only thing holding back the motor manufacturers is their worry about the risks involved in being first into the market; they would much rather be second.

Such developments must come, however, and were the Bill to be introduced in five or 10 years' time, when there were many more electric vehicles, I would not support it so urgently, because the nub of the problem—the means of propulsion—would have been dealt with in a benign way. Even then, people would suffer the disadvantages, frustration and cost of being stuck in a traffic jam: imagine a traffic jam of milk floats, for example, which would not be much better, except at the margin, than a traffic jam of today's cars.

With the information technology revolution, more home working, remote working, or what might be called teleworking, will move from the pages of the New Scientist or Nature to become a reality for more and more people. That will be helpful, because it will reduce the need for many journeys.

What is definitely not part of the solution—I am glad that the hon. Member for Bath did not mention it—is the idea of red routes through suburban areas on circumferential routes. I have in mind in particular the ill-fated and unwanted red route from Bromley to Kingston which now threatens the heart of my constituency. If that goes ahead, it will produce nothing better than a poor man's south circular, somewhere between the real south circular and the M25.

The red route will have a magnetic effect on traffic, not necessarily creating more traffic in the aggregate but drawing more traffic on to that intended corridor and creating mayhem, to the considerable disadvantage of my constituents. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will note that we in Carshalton—especially the nice, traditional parts—are fiercely opposed to the extension of the red route along the A232. I hope that his Department will heed public opinion on this matter.

Most of the solutions that I have to offer are completely compatible with those in the wise speech of the hon. Member for Bath. Many of the main solutions are in clause 2(6), which I commend to the House. The Bill makes a useful contribution in highlighting for the Department of Transport and for local authorities the areas to which they should look for the best way forward.

There are roughly three approaches to the problem, and they have to be taken in combination. The first and mildest approach is that of exhortation, whereby people make speeches in debates such as this, saying, "Isn't it awful? Why don't people get out of their cars and use public transport, walk or cycle? Why don't they copy my virtuous example?" That is all very well, but it will not persuade many people, because they can legitimately argue that they genuinely need their cars, and that public transport does not meet all their requirements.

Many women, for example, are worried about the safety of their children on the school run and prefer to take them in the car, even though they know that they are contributing to the problem, rather than putting their children on public transport or telling them to walk to school. Equally, public transport late at night is not as good as it should be, and women habitually feel unsafe on it. For those reasons, exhortation is not enough.

The second approach is that of encouragement or inducement via the tax system, grants and the other levers available to Government. We all know of the success of the tax relief on lead-free petrol, which is a good precedent, showing how powerful the mechanism can be. We also know that it is the Government's policy to increase, on a sustained basis, the price of petrol by using the tax mechanism in an attempt to discourage, at the margin, the use of all sorts of petrol-engined vehicles. I know that this could have an impact on the cost of living, so it is a double-edged sword. Speaking as someone who represents a suburban constituency, I believe that it would be better to abolish the vehicle licence system and put the tax burden on petrol. That would give the right economic signals to motor manufacturers, as well as others, to develop the leanburn engine.

If we wanted to be really eccentric and brave in our encouragement and inducement, we would look seriously at road pricing. I will not develop the arguments about that today, as that would probably be out of order. However, the issue must be dealt with in some way. I am sure that hon. Members know that the difficulty is that all econometric evidence about transport economics suggests that the cost of petrol and diesel is, in economists' jargon, very price-inelastic. That means that we can go on jacking up the price for a long time, but people will not alter their behaviour very much, at least not in the short term. If the cost were more price-elastic, the economic signals would be more valuable and would play a larger part in the cluster of solutions.

The third approach—this is where it gets toughest of all—is that the House could consider imposing, through the law, explicit prohibitions and requirements on those connected with vehicles. That would move us forward in the right direction. I think, for example, of requiring people to display certain discs on their windscreens if they intend to go into a certain part of an urban area. That already happens in some places. I think also of the Californian example in the United States where, at certain times of the day—especially commuter periods—cars are not allowed to cross bridges on their way in or out of

San Francisco unless they contain at least two or three people. There is another example in Athens, which has some serious environmental problems. On the basis of registration numbers, the authorities try to limit the number of vehicles that can go in and out of Athens on any given day.

My conclusion—you will be delighted to hear those words, Mr. Deputy Speaker—is that all those factors can contribute positively to the solutions that are required. The list that I have just given—like the list given by the hon. Member for Bath in his excellent Bill—is incomplete without large additional investment in appropriate forms of public transport. We need sustained investment in pubic transport and I am glad that the Government have made that possible in recent times. However, it is a lamentable fact that, over the 10-year period from 1976 to 1986—which, as the House will note, straddled two Governments of different persuasions—there was no net new investment in public transport. During that time, both Governments made mistakes, and we are still suffering some of the consequences.

We must have better buses with priority lanes; we have to go for initiatives like the Croydon tram link; we must have better and more frequent trains which are more reliable, such as the south London metro service which is planned for my constituency; and we must have better planning policy, to encourage people to live and work in the same place. That is an important point. Those hon. Members who know anything about inner-London districts, such as Clerkenwell and Bermondsey, will know that, in recent times, there has developed a mixed activity of living and working, retail and commercial. That is very healthy. It means that people can walk to and from work.

I want to follow up something to which I referred earlier. For goodness' sake, let us remember our late colleague, Robert Adley, who used to sit in this very seat. He was always, rightly, banging on about wretched tourist coaches. They are a real pain. They clog up central London and our other great cities. They are not properly policed and they get away with murder. They double-park and pollute the atmosphere, and are full of tourists who get out on the wrong side. They are a safety hazard and bad news. If nothing else results from the debate, let us at least deal with the problem of tourist coaches.

1.9 pm

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington): I shall be brief, to allow as many Back Benchers as possible to speak. I congratulate the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) on his Bill and I am able to be brief because of his eloquent introduction in which he gave so much detail as to why the House should support the measure. It is clear from the names of the Bill's sponsors and of the hon. Members of all parties who supported early-day motions on the issue that there is cross-party support. The Bill is also supported by organisations such as Friends of the Earth and other environmental organisations, and by the many people who have written to hon. Members. I shall not list by name and address the constituents who have written to me, because it would take too long. They are a measure of the wide-ranging support for the Bill throughout the country.

Within its existing budget, Labour fully supports the Bill's principles and aims, which are consistent with Labour policy as set out in our policy document "Consensus for Change". We want an integrated, balanced transport strategy and are committed to working with local communities and business to find effective, equitable and environmentally sustainable solutions to congestion, pollution and traffic growth. Therefore, we welcome the Bill and its detailed provisions to ensure that effective legislation will result.

In introducing the Bill, the hon. Member for Bath gave clear details of the problem. He quoted statistics and it is worth repeating that congestion is currently costing business about £19 billion a year and that that figure could rise to more than £40 billion in 10 years. It is forecast that, by 2005, which is one of the key dates in the Bill, one third of the motorway network will suffer chronic congestion for most of every day, and all but one of London's major roads will become gridlocked. We cannot ignore those statistics.

The effect on health, and the cost to the health service of environmental damage and air pollution, is massive. The hon. Member for Bath gave the estimates and all hon. Members will agree that whether the direct health cost is £3 billion or £4 billion, we cannot ignore it: action must be taken. The Bill is a step in the right direction.

Local authorities have a crucial role in regenerating local transport and should be given increased power to set priorities and to produce and implement local plans in line with a national strategy. The Bill is a move towards that goal but, as the hon. Member for Bath said, it is not in itself the solution, but part of a range of measures, mentioned by the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman), which will form an overall strategy to address the problem.

The Bill will allow for decisions by those who have a detailed knowledge of local needs. At local level, the development of strategies should be based on clearly defined objectives that adopt the package approach. That takes into account all modes of transport, incorporating bus and rail services, roads, cycling and walking, and places a strong emphasis on better management of available facilities. Effective public transport has a crucial role in that package approach and at local level must provide a realistic alternative to the car. From a wider perspective, the effective use of road space is important for the success of local transport plans. We therefore require a coherent set of objectives for our future use of roads. That should focus primarily on the maintenance and better management of existing roads, both nationally and locally, rather than being a first step in the development of new roads.

In addition, it is important that we build on the many opportunities at local level to reduce the number of cars on roads. There are many good examples of good practice that can make a relatively rapid impact on reducing the number of cars. The hon. Member for Bath has already given examples. Throughout Britain, there are many good practices, such as in York, where a road user hierarchy has been successfully introduced, which prioritises pedestrians and cyclists by providing them with better space and conditions. There has been extensive pedestrianisation of roads and the creation of cycle route networks, together with bus priority and park-and-ride schemes.

Similar initiatives have been taken in cities such as Nottingham, Edinburgh, Manchester and many other parts of Britain, to try to find out what is appropriate to local needs. The strength of the Bill is that it allows people with that local knowledge to build on good practice, to consider specifically what is in the interests of local transport needs and to bring forward measures to the Secretary of State for Transport on how those needs should be tackled.

As I said, I intend to be brief because I know that hon. Members on both sides of the House want to speak, but I want to ensure that the support from the Labour Front-Bench team is clear. We recognise good practice throughout Britain, and those good practices will be the backbone of the local plans that will be drawn up to meet the aims and aspirations of the Bill.

We support the Bill because, in the existing framework, it allows local targets for traffic reduction or for a restraint on traffic growth to be set. It allows for consultation with people, businesses and environmental and other organisations, to ensure that plans meet local needs. The proposals will allow for the encouragement of cycling and walking and better public transport provision, and they will speed up the reduction in the use of the car.

As the hon. Member for Bath said, this is not an anti-car Bill, but it considers alternative ways in which people can travel round their community, to limit the environmental damage of car use. It will take into account the way in which funding can be made available to local councils because of the strength of the local plans that they introduce. It allows the Secretary of State to monitor the plans and to co-ordinate good practice throughout Britain. It enables guidance to be forthcoming from the Department of Transport, to ensure that all parts of Britain recognise the opportunities and the way in which good practice is being developed in other parts of Britain, so that they can replicate it where it is appropriate to local needs.

Therefore, I am pleased that the Bill has been introduced. Again, I congratulate the hon. Member for Bath. I am sure that any technical problems can be solved with the Government. I assure him of the Labour Front-Bench team's support for a swift resolution of any outstanding difficulties, to ensure that the Bill, after its Second Reading, which I am sure that it will receive today, has a swift passage into legislation. In that way, we can tackle as quickly as possible the immense problems of congestion and environmental damage throughout Britain.

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): I realise that to express reservations about the Bill is probably like expressing reservations about motherhood and apple pie, but I want to put some words of caution into the debate. I agree with much of what hon. Members on both sides of the House have said, but the Bill falls victim to the delusion that legislation can help to perfect the world. I accept all that has been said about congestion, pollution and the adverse consequences for my constituents and for Britain, and I bow to no one in my determination to drive people back on to the railways. I am a great enthusiast for boosting rail travel. However, I still sniff the smell of an anti-car Bill, despite the reassurances of the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), who introduced his Bill so effectively.

The car offers a degree of personal mobility that is almost comparable in its democratic importance with the freedom of speech, for which we fought in earlier generations. It has enabled a social revolution in terms of mobility of labour and consumer choice. It has also enabled families to take holidays and to maintain links, given the increasingly disparate nature of extended families. It has also provided safety for children on the school run, as mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman).

I accept, of course, that those who have been left behind by those who own cars, especially those marooned in rural communities, need alternative forms of public transport. That is why I am an enthusiast for the privatisation of the railways—a process that is currently improving rail links in my constituency. That is why I am also an enthusiast for the Local Government and Rating Bill, which gives powers to parish councils to develop alternative means of transport in their area. To me, however, the personal mobility offered by the car is a good thing.

The car is also important to the economy. In my constituency of Worcester and throughout the county of Worcestershire, hundreds, if not thousands, of jobs have been generated by car manufacture at Rover and Land Rover, as well as by component suppliers. Only this week, Opposition Members have criticised Ford in the Chamber because of the jobs lost at Halesowen.

Mr. Forman: Halewood.

Dr. Godman: Poor geography.

Mr. Luff: I am sorry about that; I meant Halewood.

We have unanimously welcomed the inward investment made in this country by Honda, Nissan, Toyota and BMW. Car manufacture is an important part of our economy, with which we must not tamper.

Let us consider some of the issues facing my constituents in relation to the car and shopping, which are more relevant to the Bill. People go to shop by car not just because that is convenient or because the buses do not run at the right time, but because they want to make bulky purchases. It is difficult to cycle home with a heavy weight on the handlebars.

Worcester is in fierce competition with neighbouring towns such as Cheltenham and shopping centres such as Merry Hill, or merry hell as it is sometimes known by the locals. The Merry Hill out-of-town shopping centre depends on the car to get people to it. It is hugely popular. There are plans to expand it, and an inspector's report is now before my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. Worcester city council has written to me to ask me to oppose that expansion, because it recognises that it will damage the vitality of the city—it may or may not be right.

The problem is that the city council's Labour colleagues at the county council have been developing plans for the transport and traffic management of my city that will have exactly the same impact. That is why I am delighted, if I may say so in public, that my hon. Friend the Minister rejected the Worcester package bid for the coming financial year. He did so following representations from myself, Nicholas Bourne, the Conservative prospective parliamentary candidate for Worcester, and Derek Prodger, who is leader of the Conservative group on Worcester city council.

[Mr. Luff]

My hon. Friend the Minister was not convinced that that package would have done more good than harm. Clause 4 refers to regional consideration, and I accept that in relation to Merry Hill and Worcester, it might be possible, should the Bill become law, for my hon. Friend to do something to control the traffic to those two locations. As a result, perhaps there would be equality of treatment—one city doing the wrong thing by driving cars away might not damage it as much as it might at present.

I am concerned about how the plans were drawn up in my area, and that is what concerned my hon. Friend the Minister when he rejected the package bid. The best laid plans of mice, men and Hereford and Worcester county council can go wrong, even if they are well intentioned. The first phase of the Worcester package has been disastrous. It has failed largely because of the failure to consult. The Worcester Civic Society and local businesses were not effectively consulted. I am glad to see that today's Bill includes statutory provision for such consultation. Perhaps the hon. Member for Bath will consider including parish councils as a statutory consultee, when that is relevant. Their expertise would be useful when considering traffic reduction plans.

In Worcester, we have two bus priority schemes. I am all in favour of such schemes, but one of them has been introduced in a narrow part of the main access road from the north of the city, and there is just no room for it. I was involved in a near-accident two or three weeks ago, when a lorry swerved out to avoid a cyclist, which meant that I had to swerve into the bus lane to avoid the lorry—fortunately, there was no bus coming up on the inside.

The Worcester city package bid has had the effect of frustrating cycling from the north of the city into and out of the city centre. As a result of the package, there is now no good northern route in and out of the city. Therefore, although bus priority schemes are a good idea—there is nothing wrong with them—they must be well planned and well operated. The situation is equally bad in the Lowesmoor area of Worcester, where massive traffic chaos and congestion have been created—which I sometimes think may be a conspiracy to make my surgery inaccessible, as it has been very badly affected.

I can cite many examples of how good ideas have had the wrong effect in practice, and I fear that the Bill could pressurise local authorities to rush in hastily with ill-considered schemes that have similar detailed problems. My concerns are shared by national organisations, including the Confederation of British Industry—which the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) quoted in his speech. The CBI describes the Bill as focusing on the wrong goals, as inflexible and unrealistic, and as possibly damaging to the competitiveness of the UK economy.

Therefore, although the Bill contains good intentions, we must be absolutely sure that it provides the right answer to the problem. The Automobile Association shares that concern. It stated that the Bill

"completely ignores the complexities of people's lives and the transport system in the late 1990s."

The Road Haulage Association stated:

"capacity restraints on the movement of goods by road and on road transport based consumer services will only harm industrial efficiency and impair the quality of life of the vast majority of people in the UK."

The Bill is well meaning, but is it the right approach to the problem? My hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington suggested some specific alternative mechanisms. There are many other options which, if I had the time, I should have liked to bring to the attention of the House. I shall not oppose the Bill, but I have severe reservations about it.

1.26 pm

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke–on–Trent, North): My speech will be brief because I know that many hon. Members wish to speak on the Bill, and I also do not wish to do anything to delay its passage. I am very proud to be a sponsor of the Bill, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) on promoting it through the private Members' lottery.

The Bill is important, and I was amazed to discover so much cross-party support for it. When I was first elected a Member of Parliament 10 years ago, it was unthinkable that we would debate, in such a calm manner, a way in which to put road traffic reduction on the political map. I hope that today's debate will help the Bill to secure a speedy passage through the House.

Friends of the Earth must be congratulated on the work that it has done across the country in campaigning on the issue. I also pay tribute to all hon. Members who have already signed early-day motion 289, and I urge them to ensure that the Bill is passed rapidly.

It is incredible that the House is no longer discussing whether we should support such a Bill, but how we can support it. The time has come to deal with the issue of road traffic reduction. However, we must examine the issue not only from the top down, but from the bottom up. The Bill provides a real opportunity to do so—even with the concessions that will have to be made to speed its passage, which we hope will be completed before the general election.

Why should we support the Bill? The hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) has just expressed some reservations about the Bill, but I believe that we must support it. The air that we breathe has been polluted; the quiet of the countryside has been affected; and traffic congestion has caused business to lose money, as we have heard, to the tune of £19 billion annually. Excess traffic is also a social problem. Many people, particularly the elderly and those on low incomes, are becoming isolated because they no longer have proper access to public transport.

Road traffic reduction is not only an environmental issue but one of social equity. Figures show that 5 per cent. of people in the top 20 per cent. income bracket do not own cars, whereas 60 per cent. of those in the bottom 20 per cent. income bracket do not own cars. We must deal with social equity and ensure that we do not create even greater divisions in an already divided society.

I am delighted that the Minister is supporting the Bill. However, in the past 10 years, we have suffered from the tunnel vision of the Government's multi-billion pound roads programme. This morning, I was happy to hear him say on Radio 4 that, perhaps in three years' time, we shall not be so committed to the current programme and will move to a more balanced programme. We should have done that and turned the oil tanker around, as it were, long ago.

The proposals cannot be implemented soon enough. I note that the Government have finally recognised the need to act, and I believe that we are on course to discovering how an integrated transport policy, as set out in the Bill, can take account of what local communities want and reflect that in the national policy laid down by the Department of Transport.

Many organisations have contributed to the preparation of the Bill. I support all that the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds has done in identifying the sites of special scientific interest that are under threat from road building, and the species and their habitats that are under threat from acidification. Transport 2000 and SUSTRANS in particular have done a great deal of work to promote not only cycle networks but safer routes to schools across the country, including in my constituency. It gave me great heart to be campaigning alongside an organisation such as the Townswomen's Guilds, which recognises the legitimacy of the issue.

I believe that we face a real challenge, but the Bill is a milestone that will ensure that much can be achieved more quickly. It will enable us to bring local communities and businesses, parish councils and any other groups that have a stake in the community, together in a partnership to plan policy—it is no good having a national transport programme that has no regard for local needs.

Time is limited, but I shall end by reading a letter from a constituent, which has just arrived on my desk by chance. It is from Stacy Stonier, a pupil in class 6O'B at Holden Lane primary school in Sneyd Green, Stoke-on-Trent. She says:

"I am ten years old. I go to Holden Lane Primary School in Staffordshire. We are doing a topic about Environmental change. We are looking at the proposed matter of widening the M6 around Staffordshire.

I feel it will be a deplorable idea to widen parts of the M6 around Staffordshire, because if it is widened more people will go onto the M6 expecting it to be clear, but they will join more people thinking the same thing. Then it will be the same as it is now."

It is not easy to tackle traffic problems, but if the Bill is enacted and if we have a partnership of business, industry, local authorities and local people, we shall find a way to meet the challenges. That gives me great optimism for the future, and I am proud to have had the opportunity to speak, albeit briefly, in support of the Bill.

1.32 pm

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) on being successful in securing the opportunity to introduce the Bill. Should it become law, it could become one of the most important pieces of traffic legislation for some time. I am pleased that the concepts of the Bill are very much in line with Liberal Democrat transport policy, as set out in our paper entitled "Transporting People, Tackling Pollution".

We all agree that traffic congestion, the pollution and the damage that it causes to our environment, and its effect on the quality of life and health of our citizens, is a serious problem. Much was made earlier of the incidence of respiratory illnesses aggravated by traffic pollution. It is important to note that work carried out at Birmingham university a couple of years ago showed a direct correlation between the closeness of major urban roads to centres of population, and the traffic levels on those roads, and the incidence of respiratory illness. It found conclusively that if traffic levels increased, hospital admissions for respiratory illness rose quite significantly a few days later. We have to face that major problem.

As the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) said, electric cars might be a help, but the generation of electricity also releases pollutants into the atmosphere.

Traffic growth is not a new problem. It is fascinating to reflect that, back in the 1960s, an eminent professor, Mr. Buchanan, produced a famous report entitled "Traffic in Towns". He recognised the problems of traffic growth even then. I recall a study at about the same time, which showed that, if we were to attempt to meet the traffic demand in London—let us remember that this was in the 1960s—we would, in order to build the necessary roads, have ended up covering the whole of London with asphalt. It is not a new problem; we have known about it for many years but have done very little about it. The problem is that politicians—of all parties—like to build things. They like to leave their mark. How many city or town relief roads can hon. Members think of that are named after an eminent local politician? [AN HON. MEMBER: "The Rendel bypass."] Not quite.

Although one can name a relief road the Alderman Smith bypass, one cannot put a plaque on a traffic reduction scheme. That is the essence of the problem. We have to recognise that there is a far greater dependence on the car, particularly for short trips. The problem does not relate to car ownership levels, which will continue to increase. We have to govern how people use their cars. We have to recognise that there is a new approach now to managing traffic. It is not just about managing the growth in traffic but about managing to reduce that growth.

I welcome the Bill because it sets out the measures that local authorities can use. I particularly like the example given of introducing cycleways. My constituency of Eastleigh has worked hard to create a network of cycleways throughout the borough, to provide an alternative means of transport around the town.

We have to address the problem of planning guidelines. That is a major point. Too many planning authorities throughout the country are forced into allowing more and more developments on the borders of their area, thereby generating more dependency on the car. We must change planning guidelines so that we can reduce dependency on the car and make it much more viable to walk, cycle or use public transport.

I welcome the Bill. It is indeed a milestone in transport legislation. I welcome the all-party support that it has received, from the Opposition Front Bench and from the Minister, who has been particularly helpful. I can assure the House that the Liberal Democrats will do all we can to ease the Bill's passage through the House. I sincerely hope that it will become law before the end of this Parliament. I shall do all that I can to support it. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bath once again.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I offer my compliments to the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) for his Bill.

The hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) and I travel different political roads, but if I thought for one moment that this was an anti-car Bill, I would not support it, because for many people living in Scotland—from many different classes—on our islands and those in our far-flung communities, the car is an essential mode of transport.

I agree with the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) who is sitting to the right—perhaps where he should be—of the hon. Gentleman. One of the finest examples of the utility of a bypass is at that tragic town of Dunblane, which experienced dreadful road conditions until that bypass was built. Anyone travelling through Perthshire up to the highlands had to wend their way through that small, lovely town, but with the bypass it is far easier to travel north and south in that part of Scotland.

I asked the hon. Member for Bath earlier about the role of the Secretary of State for Scotland in the implementation of the Bill. My concern centred on individual councils drawing up local plans. In the west of Scotland we have the Strathclyde passenger transport authority, which is made up of representatives from 12 councils. It is chaired by Councillor Charles Gordon, of Glasgow, the biggest council on the authority. One of the smallest is my authority, Inverclyde council. Strathclyde passenger transport authority used to be part of Strathclyde regional council, but it is now a body bringing together those 12 councils.

I hope that the Bill takes into account the fact that the 12 councils are together in one authority. Over the years, the authority has developed an integrated passenger transport system which embraces buses, trains and ferries. We must not forget how important passenger ferries are to the communities in my part of Scotland.

Similarly, superb cycleways and walkways have been developed under the aegis of Strathclyde passenger transport authority. I would not want its role to be diminished in any way. It is a trail blazer in Scotland; it is the only one of its kind. In other areas of Scotland, however, authorities are looking at the Strathclyde passenger transport authority as a model that they can introduce in their regions.

If we reduced road traffic as the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) proposes, a consequence, perhaps unintended, would be speedier response times for our emergency services. Not long ago, I was heading back towards my office in No. 1 Parliament street when I saw an ambulance.

Mr. Forman indicated assent.

Dr. Godman: The hon. Gentleman may have witnessed a similar scene.

The ambulance was attempting to navigate its way through the traffic in Parliament square. I timed the ambulance as the driver sought to escape along the Embankment, and it took him six minutes just to get through Parliament square. Some London Members may say that that is not surprising. However, a consequence of the plans proposed in the Bill might be that ambulances, the police and the fire services could respond much more quickly.

Even in my constituency, where the problems are far less serious than those of the big cities, we are concerned about the response times of the emergency services. Much more needs to be done to control traffic, so that our first-class fellow citizens who staff the emergency services can go about their work unimpeded by being snarled up in a traffic jam as that poor ambulance man was in London. For that reason alone, we should talk about the need to control road traffic.

I should have declared a personal interest, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My wife is a baillie on Glasgow council and she is a member of the passenger transport authority. I must say that before someone comes back to me on the point. I would like to see the developments in Strathclyde take place elsewhere in Scotland. As long as the Bill would enhance rather than impede such developments, I warmly welcome it.

1.42 pm

The Minister for Railways and Roads (Mr. John Watts): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) for providing the opportunity for us to discuss these important issues today by introducing his Bill. We have seen the House at its best, looking at a serious problem in a serious way. The Bill is important and constructive. I thank him in passing for his warm tribute to my officials, and, indeed, to me. I think that I surprised some of my officials, who I am sure had me marked down as an unreconstructed J. Bonnington Jagsworth.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): I hate to rain on the House's parade today; unfortunately I have not been able to be here for the whole debate, which I shall read with interest.

Does my hon. Friend agree that the Bill's title would not pass the Trade Descriptions Act 1968? Nothing in the Bill will reduce traffic. The Bill would take valuable resources, which should be used by councils to reduce traffic, to be spent on plans. Local authorities such as mine will probably spend more money—perhaps all the money they have available—doing that rather than taking the action that hon. Members are asking for.

Mr. Watts: I hope that it will be possible for us to agree on arrangements that do not impose enormous new burdens on local authorities, but enable them to implement measures that help relieve traffic problems and, where appropriate, reduce them.

As the hon. Member for Bath said, some elements of the Bill will require further consideration if we are able to offer Government support. However, I am sure that we have a basis for agreement.

In the transport debate which culminated in the publication of our Green Paper last spring, the issue of traffic growth took centre stage. The Green Paper stated:

> "The central issue arising from the debate is the level of concern about the impact of transport on the environment and about how far present levels of traffic growth are sustainable. The Government believes that a change of emphasis is needed, towards recognising the long term consequences of traffic growth. But other factors need to be taken into account, especially competitiveness and freedom of choice"— themes raised by hon. Members during the debate.

Against that background, the Green Paper proposed a number of specific measures, including a better system for the planning of trunk roads as part of the regional planning guidance system. It may well be the way in which we bring together individual local plans for consideration on a regional basis. It proposed measures to make more efficient use of the existing transport infrastructure and to reduce car dependence—especially in towns—through giving more responsibility to local decision makers.

It was also against that background that the Green Paper considered traffic targets—whether national or local—which are at the crux of the Bill. A number of organisations, including the Royal Commission on environmental pollution, have proposed national targets. The targets fall into two categories: those for the absolute level of car or public transport use, with a decrease in one and an increase in the other, and those for the relative use of cars and public transport against total traffic movements.

The first and most obvious question is how, within any meaningful national target, we can allow for the wide variation between different parts of the country—or countries, as we are considering the four countries of the United Kingdom—in terms of the proportion of total transport represented by the use of cars, buses and trains. For example, public transport use represents nearly 90 per cent. of commuting journeys to central London but is typically only a few percentage points in rural areas. Those are the extremes; there is a wide range in between.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) mentioned the importance of cars for those who live in the island communities in Scotland. A single national target would bite on different parts of the country in different ways.

Secondly, targets are often proposed without those who propose them having a clear idea of the measures required to achieve them. At national level, very few measures could reduce traffic substantially and clearly relate to any change in traffic pattern. Generally, more measures are available at the local level, especially in towns and cities—for example, tougher parking restrictions.

Given some of the press stories about the Bill that appeared over the past few days, I should make it clear—as have the hon. Members for Bath and for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth)—that the Government have not suddenly become anti-car. Nor is the Bill anti-car. After all, if we fail the tackle the problems of congestion, that will not do much good for people who want to use their cars, or for the important industrial uses of road transport. Unless we can ensure that road capacity is available for essential road use by encouraging the switch of less essential journeys to other transport modes, we shall not meet the requirements of any part of the economy or society.

Accessibility is a key issue. In particular, urban local authorities will need to make it a priority to achieve good accessibility for all transport users as well as pedestrians, whether they are residents, commuters, shoppers or local businesses. Local authorities in particular will need to give serious consideration to the effect on the local economy and the vitality of our towns and cities of any transport measures that they introduce.

Thirdly, targets based simply on increasing public transport use will not necessarily have a corresponding effect in reducing road traffic, because a large part of the increase in the use of public transport might come from people who would have otherwise not made the journey, or have made it on cycle or on foot.

Fourthly, we already have a range of targets that bite directly on the environmental impact of transport, which is sometimes forgotten. Those include our targets for reducing carbon dioxide emissions from all sources to 1990 levels by 2000, and air quality targets that are proposed in the draft air quality management strategy. The hon. Member for Bath did not forget them. Indeed, he drew specific attention to them.

As we made clear in the Green Paper, the Government are keeping the case for national traffic targets under review. Indeed, we have already accepted the case for national cycling targets. They are to double cycling levels by 2002 and to double them again by 2012. As the House knows, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport is a very enthusiastic cyclist.

Our view is that target setting is likely to make most sense in the local context, and in our Green Paper we said that we would be interested to discuss local authorities' experience of local target setting. The local dimension is crucial. The Green Paper makes clear the need to strike the right balance in local transport measures. That means that local authorities are generally best placed to take the lead for their areas within a broad framework, although it is of course vital that they consult widely locally with residents and business interests. Where they do not, the measures they devise are unlikely to be the best available.

There may be common policy elements between areas, and it is inevitable that local factors such as the degree of local public transport provision, development pressures and local economic growth will influence the strategy that needs to be adopted. Consequently, it must make more sense to pursue targets, whether they relate to the reduction of road traffic or encouraging alternative modes of transport, at a local level.

We are therefore looking with local authorities at potential measures that might be needed to manage traffic in their areas. Local authorities, of course, already have extensive powers to regulate traffic and restrain car use. Due to lack of time, I shall not recite them all. I suspect that they will be familiar to hon. Members who take a close interest in this topic.

I believe that local authorities will be broadly sympathetic to the idea of setting local targets as an integral part of their local transport strategy. Indeed, a number are already choosing to make use of such targets. It is, however, important that targets are useful tools to help local authorities achieve their goals and that they do not tie their hands unnecessarily. The Government would consequently want to see a number of clauses in the draft Bill changed before we felt able to offer our support right the way through to the statute book. Such changes would not, however, work against the spirit of what the Bill is trying to achieve.

I cannot accept that it would be sensible to compel all authorities to set targets for reductions in traffic whatever their local circumstances. An authority covering a largely urban area, for example, is likely to regard controlling traffic growth as a more pressing problem than one whose setting is predominantly rural.

There would also be little sense in obliging local authorities to set targets for reducing traffic levels in areas where traffic growth was expected to accompany new development arising out of regeneration initiatives. All that that would achieve is the undermining of such initiatives. I have in mind the regeneration of the Dearne valley and the need for the remaining missing road link to be completed, about which three hon. Members came to see me earlier this week.

All such examples point towards giving local authorities the main voice in deciding whether targets to control traffic volume have a useful role to play in their areas. There is no reason, though, why such flexibility should cause them to treat the issue with any less seriousness. We therefore believe that the Bill should create a statutory obligation for local authorities to undertake a review to consider the need to set local targets for absolute volumes or for forecast traffic growth. It would then be open to them to decide, following their review, not to set targets, but, if they reached that conclusion, we would expect them to give clear reasons why they thought that the appropriate response in their circumstances.

Another point that I have raised with the hon. Member for Bath is that the Bill should focus more specifically on those local authorities with key transport responsibilities. At present, the Bill extends to county, district, unitary and London borough councils. However, in England at least, the local highways authorities, given their role in determining local transport strategies, are best placed to consider the need for targets, and no useful purpose would be served by extending that requirement to district councils.

I accept, however, that the whole range of local authorities should be involved in the consultation processes that the Bill suggests, including the parish councils mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff). If local plans and targets are to be achievable, it is important that they have credibility for the whole community.

Ms Walley: The real point is how we can promote partnership at the local level in consultation with all the groups that should be involved. It would helpful if the Minister could clarify that point further before Committee stage.

Mr. Watts: The consultation phase is important, and when we consider whether to support transport packages, we will want to be convinced that there has been proper, widespread consultation and that there is a consensus of support for the measures proposed—if not, they are less likely to succeed. That is a point that we will discuss further.

I shall now explain how we envisage that the system of reviewing and setting targets will fit into the existing procedures for considering local transport strategies. Given the differing local government structures and financial mechanisms for providing support to local authorities in England, Wales Scotland and Northern Ireland, it will be necessary to give further thought to how to proceed in each country. Therefore, the Bill should not attempt to set hard and fast rules about the mechanisms to be used to undertake such reviews.

Those mechanisms can and should be agreed in due course outside the legislative terms of the Bill, not least because of the need for consultation with local authorities to ensure that we devise workable mechanisms. In Northern Ireland, the roads and transport functions that lie with local authorities in the remainder of the United Kingdom are the responsibilities of the Secretary of State, and therefore a legislative framework is not needed to implement those polices in Northern Ireland. The Bill should not perhaps be extended to include Northern Ireland.

I shall confine myself in my remaining remarks to discussing the situation in England, although I am not suggesting that the Bill is in any way less important in Scotland and Wales. There is no reason why a review of the need for targets should be a free-standing exercise in a vacuum. On the contrary, it would make sense to consider further how local authorities might choose to incorporate it into their existing transport planning systems. That brings me to the question of the package approach and the present arrangements in England for providing capital support to local authorities' transport programmes.

Given the nature of the transport policies and programme—TPP—system, we wish to consider whether it might offer a suitable mechanism for local authorities examining whether targets have a role to play and what those targets should be. I note that the latest edition of the Transport 2000 "Streets Ahead" bulletin accepts the TPP submission as an appropriate vehicle for setting targets to reduce the rate of traffic growth and to stabilise traffic volumes. I should add that my Department has already made it clear to local authorities that the use of targets has a helpful role to play in devising and monitoring transport strategies for their areas.

However, given what I have said about the differing needs of individual parts of the country and the circumstances of separate authorities, I do not believe that it would be right to lay down inflexible conditions in the Bill for the setting of targets, such as the measures to be adopted or the statistical bases against which changes in traffic volume should be measured. That is far better left to the guidance that is issued regularly.

I therefore believe that that part of the Bill needs to be simplified to concentrate on the principles and not the detail of the mechanisms. That detail will flow from our consultation with local authorities, with whom we will work in partnership. That said, the Government clearly have a role to play in assisting local authorities to undertake their reviews, and again our help could be given through guidance.

Clause 2(6) suggests that the measures that local authorities cite in their plans could include areas for which they do not currently have powers. That is flawed. As I have said, we are consulting local authorities on the further powers that they might like, but if the plans to achieve the targets are to be realistic, they must be based on powers that can be exercised and for which funding can be provided.

I wish to bring my remarks rapidly to a close, and I would like to suggest to the hon. Member for Bath what I believe to be a way forward. I have pointed out the key changes that I believe will be necessary to ensure continuing Government support, and I suggest to him that the way to achieve that is to resume the constructive dialogue between my officials and those who have assisted him in drawing up the Bill. I believe that we could then resolve the matter and produce the amendments that are required. I extend to him an offer of help with the technical drafting, so that, if amendments are incorporated, the Bill will be able to go on the statute book.

We will initiate discussions with local authorities on the practical mechanisms for undertaking reviews and setting targets within the TPP process. Those can go in parallel so that, by the time we reach the later legislative stages, we have at least a broad idea of what is acceptable to the local authorities and what is workable. If I have the agreement of the hon. Member for Bath to that basis for proceeding—I believe that I have his agreement, from earlier discussions and from what he has said today—I am content to recommend to the House that the Bill be granted a second reading.

Mr. Don Foster: This has been a useful and constructive debate, and I thank all those who have taken part. Like the hon. Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) earlier, I do not want my winding-up speech to delay subsequent business. It was a shame that the only discordant voice we heard came from the hon. Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce), who breezed in and out. Perhaps, if he had stayed a little longer, he might not have made the remarks that he did.

Otherwise, there has been a great deal of support, and I am very pleased to accept publicly the Minister's offer—I have made it clear to him privately that I would do so—to work together constructively to get the Bill through as quickly as possible. This debate has done something that has never really happened before in this House—it has put traffic reduction firmly on the political map, and I am grateful to all hon. Members for enabling us to do so.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee, pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

Criminal Evidence (Amendment) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

2.3 pm

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I am grateful for the opportunity to propose the Bill, and I can only hope that I am as successful in the national lottery tomorrow as I was in the ballot for private Member's Bills. I am grateful for the words of support from the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) on behalf of the Opposition home affairs team and his hon. Friend the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), who wishes me well with the Bill today.

After looking at the Bills that I might have proposed, I decided to do something about law and order because of its importance to the vast majority of my constituents who, for the past five years, have spoken to me about many issues. But one overriding issue has been mentioned time and time again—law and order. I decided to introduce a Bill, therefore, that would be effective and simple, as I believe it is.

The sorts of crimes that the Bill will deal with happen far too often. Far too many of the criminals involved receive a lesser sentence even though they might face a life sentence. In 1994, of the 217 offenders convicted of a second or subsequent serious sexual or violent crime, only 10 received a life sentence. Other research has shown that men convicted of rape, when interviewed under confidential or anonymous conditions, have on average admitted to having carried out six or seven more rapes as well as other less serious offences. The median figure, however, is one or two rapes, which suggests that a small number of offenders may be responsible for a much larger proportion of sexual offences.

It is clear that deterrence fails only because the odds of being caught and imprisoned are not high enough or the sentences not harsh enough. The simple truth is that rapists who are locked up do not commit crimes, and that violent offenders cannot commit violence when they are behind bars. I hope that my Bill will put more of these criminals behind bars.

The development of DNA profiling techniques and the creation and use of a national DNA database—the first of its kind in the world—has gone some way to increasing the number of convictions for serious sexual crime. It can also tell us for sure whether a small number of criminals are responsible for the majority of sex crimes. The database, which is managed and operated by the Forensic Science Service in Birmingham, is an investigative tool used to link suspects with a stain found at the scene of a crime or to identify serial offences by linking two or more criminal scenes. It has been an enormous success.

To date, 26 mass screenings have been conducted, identifying 13 suspects. Only this week, the trial began of the alleged killer of 15-year-old schoolgirl Naomi Smith. She was sexually assaulted and murdered in September 1995. A 19-year-old man was betrayed in a mass screen by his DNA, which proved extremely rare.

The Association of Chief Police Officers has identified six benefits that the DNA database brings to society, including the early identification of linked cases, the early arrest of offenders, valuable intelligence, early exoneration of innocent suspects, easier identification of bodies and, finally, deterrence, because the risk of being caught is so great. The database could also help to clear up hitherto unsolved crimes. A number of people who are serving prison sentences might well, if tested for inclusion on the DNA register, prove to have been involved in other as yet unsolved crimes.

The establishment of the register was a great leap forward in combating crime and DNA testing will soon be as routine as fingerprinting is today. One significant group of people, however, has eluded being tested even though they are guilty of sex crimes and crimes of violence. These are people who were convicted before the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 became law. The Bill aims to amend this serious anomaly.

As I said, there is evidence to suggest that the majority of offences are committed by a small number of people, some of whom may be included in that group. We should not waste the opportunity presented to us today to test them. We may be saving a life. We could be stopping more rapes. It is chilling to think that, every day that we delay passing this legislation, some people may be released from prison who were convicted before DNA testing came in and who might go on to reoffend. We should waste no time in adding those people to the DNA database.

The technique, which has been used to identify a suspect or exonerate an innocent man, arose from a fairly straightforward genetic concept. We inherit our DNA blueprint from our parents—half from our mother and half from our father. When the egg and sperm cells, with their half complements of DNA, are created in the parents, the genetic material is purposefully jumbled up or reshuffled. The unique make-up of a person is therefore generated by different sequences of DNA on the chromosomes.

Every cell in the human body carries a complete copy of the individual's genetic make-up inside a nucleus, except red blood cells, which have no nucleus. It follows that, as each person, except identical twins, has an individual make-up, one cell should provide a unique genetic profile sufficient to identify the individual.

DNA can be extracted from any sample containing cells with a nucleus, so hair roots, muscle, organs and bones can be used. A swab can be taken from inside the cheek, and saliva may or may not contain enough cells. The technique that the Forensic Science Service uses to get DNA profiles is called the short tandem repeats, and involves the amplification of areas of the DNA molecule that show length variation in short blocks. The test uses the technique known as polymerised chain reaction, although other techniques have been used elsewhere in the world.

PCR amplification is a procedure that is used to reproduce the desired sequence of DNA thousands of times extremely rapidly, rather like a molecular photocopier; it can copy millions of times over in a test tube the minute amounts of DNA found in one cell, until the sample is large enough to be seen in a test tube.

A Scotland Yard detective working on the database project before it became operational said:

"We are on the brink of something like police officers faced a hundred years ago with fingerprints."

A fingerprint could prove that someone had been at the scene of a crime even if it could not prove that he had committed it. The same is broadly true of DNA profiling, except that in some cases, especially sex cases, it can prove guilt or, conversely, innocence. Because there is such a high chance of being caught if one is on the database, it acts as a major incentive not to commit the crime.

In a recent edition of The Sunday Times, Charles Murray wrote:

"America's experience has been the same as Britain's: risk of imprisonment goes down, crime goes up."

For example, in 1954 the number of people sentenced to prison for rape was one in four. In 1994, the figure fell to one in 12—down 69 per cent. That is not because of worse policing, but simply because the number of rapes and serious offences has increased, not only here but throughout the industrialised western world.

I believe that, if the chances of being caught for a further offence increase, criminals will think twice before reoffending. For example, Denis Adams, a convicted rapist, was jailed on the evidence of his DNA sample. He was trapped when police used a computer to search through all unsolved sex attacks from which DNA samples had been collected. He thought that he had got away with the rape, but a blood sample was taken after he was arrested for a second sex attack. His DNA profile showed that the chances of its being anyone else were 200 million to one. He had already served five years for indecent assault, and if my Bill had been law while he was in prison, he would have been charged with the earlier attack much sooner and would not have been at liberty to threaten the public. I am sure that there have been similar cases.

The police know that the database has been a tremendous success, and I believe that they have come to rely on it more than a little. I have received letters of support from Pauline Clare, chief constable of Lancashire, and from Ray White, CBE, president of the Association of Chief Police Officers. Pauline Clare wrote:

"The National DNA database is already proving to be valuable in respect of providing information with regard to possible offenders. Currently, for Lancashire, the successes relate to burglary offences. 46 offenders have been linked to scenes via the database, 18 of these hits being across forces. Additionally series of undetected burglaries have been linked together providing extremely valuable intelligence for officers to investigate further."

That is support from someone who has to face criminals and crimes on a daily basis, and I am extremely grateful for it.

We must ensure that people who have escaped DNA testing to date are put on the record. The DNA database can deal with up to 5 million samples. It began operating in 1995, and it has grown to hold samples from more than 100,000 suspects, and about 8,500 crime scene stain profiles. By April this year, the capacity of the Forensic Science Service to carry out DNA testing will have risen from 8,000 to 300,000 tests per annum. The database has been a victim of its own success, in that there is a backlog; but the service is currently sorting that out.

The total cost when the Bill becomes law will be £326,000, and I believe that that is an extremely cost-effective way of deterring criminals from reoffending again and again. To those who would say that it is an infringement of civil liberties—we hear that from time to time—let me say that the people targeted by the Bill are hardened criminals, guilty of crimes such as rape, violence or child molestation; they are not innocent parties. In some respects, they gave up their civil liberties when they infringed upon the civil liberties of their victims. People have a right to be protected from serial offenders.

The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children has written to me supporting my Bill. It said:

"There is no doubt that this process will offer additional protection to potential victims."

I could not agree more.

The only people who have something to fear from the passage of this Bill today are those who will be convicted of serious violent and sexual offences, and who were serving sentences prior to the introduction of DNA testing. They are the only people who have anything to fear from the Bill. Those people who will have something to fear if my Bill is not passed will be everybody else.

The Bill will give a push to the police to enhance their detection and improve their deterrence. That alone should help to speed the Bill on its way.

2.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Timothy Kirkhope): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) on introducing the Bill. Although some of what he had to say, and some of what I shall say, may sound a little technical and complex, the actual issue is, as always, the need to help the police to catch criminals and deter crime.

There is no question that, since the national DNA database was introduced in April 1995, it has proved to be a very powerful investigative tool for the police. Indeed, it has been an outstanding success—a success that many other countries are anxious to learn about, because the United Kingdom is leading the world in that technology, which is a tool to help law enforcement.

The Bill will help to build on that success by adding to the database the DNA profiles of up to 7,750 sex, violent and burglary offenders convicted before April 1995, who are still in custody. There are now more than 103,000 profiles of individuals on the database and more than 8,400 crime scene stain profiles. In the 21 months of operation, there have been more than 3,000 matches. Some 1,900 of those have matched a convict to a crime scene and more than 1,100 have matched one crime scene to another. The number of matches is increasing at the rate of 100 per week. For anyone whose DNA profile is held on the database, the risks involved in further crime are very high.

Under the provisions of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, as amended by the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, the police have the power to take non-intimate samples from persons convicted of a recordable offence. However, the power applies only to people whose convictions were on or after 10 April 1995. As a result, the database does not contain the DNA profiles of people convicted before that date. It is precisely that anomaly that the Bill will address. Effectively, the Bill backdates the power in respect of those offenders—sex, violent and burglary—who are still in custody. It will also allow DNA samples to be taken from offenders who were not convicted but were either found not guilty by reason of insanity or found to be unfit to plead.

It would not be practicable or desirable to take a DNA sample from all offenders with a pre-April 1995 conviction for a recordable offence. Clause 1 is therefore targeted at the narrow group of past offenders whom I have just described. As a captive audience, so to speak, those offenders will be easy to identify and locate. Clause 2 allows non-intimate samples to be taken from certain detained mentally disordered offenders dealt with under the criminal insanity legislation.

I have explained that one of the circumstances in which the police may take a non-intimate sample is where a person has been convicted of a recordable offence. The criminally insane may not have been convicted of an offence but may have been found not guilty by reason of that insanity or found unfit to plead. For DNA sampling purposes, clause 2 will ensure that such offenders will be treated as if they had been convicted of an offence.

The power to take a non-intimate sample will apply only when an offender is detained under part III of the Mental Health Act 1983. In the case of mentally disordered offenders dealt with under the criminal insanity legislation on or after the passing of the legislation, the power to take a sample will apply to those who have been detained in respect of a recordable offence. In the case of offenders who have been acquitted on the ground of insanity or who have been found unfit to plead before the passing of the legislation, the power to take a sample will apply to those who have been detained for a sex, violent or burglary offence.

Clause 3 enables the power to take non-intimate body samples from detained mentally disordered or juvenile offenders to be exercised in the place of detention. Clause 4 is a tidying-up provision which corrects an omission in section 63A(5a) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act. Under the provisions of section 63A, a constable may require a person who has been charged with a recordable offence or informed that he will be reported for such an offence to attend a police station so that a non-intimate sample may be taken. That power is intended to be subject to a time limit as set out in subsection (5a). While the limit of one month is specified in respect of a person who has been charged with a recordable offence, no time limit is imposed in respect of a person who has been informed that he will be reported for such an offence. The clause amends subsection (5a) so that a one-month time limit will apply in both circumstances.

We estimate that about 7,750 offenders who are detained in prison or subject to the Mental Health Act will be caught by the Bill's provisions. As those people will have been convicted before April 1995—some two years or more ago—by definition they will be some of the country's most serious offenders. The entry of their profiles on the DNA database may not deter them from reoffending on release. If they are not, they will lay themselves open to early arrest and conviction as a result of a match between a stain left at the scene of their crime and their DNA profile on the DNA database. Those offenders should beware. They commit further crimes at their peril, and that is the way it should be.

The amendments to PACE by the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 came into force on 10 April 1995 at the same time as the national DNA database came into being. The database is operated by the Forensic Science Service on behalf of the police, and contains the DNA profiles of persons suspected of, charged with, reported for or convicted of an offence. While the powers exist to take samples in connection with all recordable offences, the Association of Chief Police Officers has agreed that, initially, the police should concentrate on taking samples from sex, violent and burglary offenders. The database also contains the DNA profiles of stains left at scenes of crime.

Every new profile entered on the database is tried for a match against all others and the search throws up a number of possible outcomes. In the case of a profile derived from a person, the search could show that there were no matches or that there was a match with a profile that had been obtained from a person previously analysed. That would indicate either a duplicate record or the use of an alias, or it could show a match with an unsolved crime stain profile indicating a possible link between that individual and the crime.

Similarly, a search using a crime stain profile could produce one of three outcomes. First, no match would be found; secondly, a match would be found with a profile obtained from a person previously analysed, indicating a possible link between that person and the crime; and thirdly, a match would be found with another unsolved crime stain profile potentially linking the two unsolved crimes.

There are more than 103,000 profiles of individuals on the database and more than 8,400 crime scene stain profiles. There have been more than 3,000 matches: 1,900 of those have matched a suspect to a scene and 1,100 have matched one crime scene to another.

Those statistics represent all too real crimes. DNA has played a major part in solving an increasing number of serious crimes. In Northumbria, a triple murderer was caught following the recovery of DNA from his final victim. In the west midlands, the database helped to solve a rape. A DNA profile of the offender was taken from the victim. The search against the database resulted in a match against a profile taken from a person after a robbery offence in north London. In Devon and in Cornwall, DNA derived from the head hair pulled from the offender by the victim of a burglary and assault resulted in identification on the database.

I have mentioned the importance of the national DNA database. It is a vital aid in the fight against crime. The Association of Chief Police Officers has specifically identified six benefits: early identification of linked cases—serial crimes—the early arrest of offenders, valuable intelligence, early exoneration of innocent suspects, easier identification of bodies, and deterrence. The database is a vital tool to the police. There have been amendments to the definition of intimate and non-intimate samples, to which I have referred, in section 65 of PACE, but the basic approach has continued and has been useful for the police.

Questions regarding safeguards and the quality of the results obtained have been raised from time to time. Samples and the profiles derived from them, provided by volunteers as part of a mass screen, are not the subject of a speculative search on the database and are not retained unless they volunteer their use for the statistical database, or if another person involved in the mass screen is subsequently convicted, as the samples may be required for further analysis in any later miscarriage of justice proceedings. There is no difference in our approach in relation to prevention of terrorism samples. There is no statutory requirement to destroy samples taken in such cases.

On the safeguarding of the interests of innocent members of the public, frankly, DNA can eliminate the innocent as well as associate the guilty. A databasing unit is essentially secure. Samples submitted incorrectly or where continuity is in doubt will be rejected by the forensic science service before testing takes place. In the event of a match, each sample is tested twice and certain parts of the process are duplicated as a matter of course. In addition, the database is registered under the Data Protection Act 1984.

Of course there are concerns that things could go wrong. It would be wrong to say that mistakes can never happen, but the Forensic Science Service has taken all possible steps to minimise that possibility, including the double testing of samples when a match is reported, followed by a full case work testing of a further sample. On the question that samples might be contaminated during collection and analysis, extensive experimentation with samples of known origin has demonstrated that adequate safeguards and controls are in place to ensure that the sample is not contaminated by DNA from any other source. In the unlikely event of contamination before the sample reaches the laboratory, the results would clearly demonstrate a mixing of the samples, and the results would not be accepted.

I have given quite a number of examples, and, in introducing the Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley also gave many examples of the proven value of DNA throughout Britain. One should also note its value internationally as well as the value of the technology that we are able to provide to other countries.

The Bill is excellent and will build on the proven success of DNA screening and the DNA database. I commend it to the House.

Accessible Housing

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

2.36 pm

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): The variety of the business of the House and the speed with which it has been dispatched have left me gasping slightly, but I shall do my best to address the issue of this Adjournment debate. I confess that I requested such a debate because I was leaned on by my friends at Age Concern—who are celebrating "Age Concern month"—and asked whether I would bring the matter to the attention of the House. I was delighted to do so, because I have long been interested in the concept of lifetime homes and in our building convenient and accessible houses that are fit to live in.

In 1986, I published the results of a seminar that I had conducted, and we also produced a report urging a variety of improvements in the design of modern houses. Although Age Concern has been my prompter in applying for this debate, I should say that the remarks I shall make are not confined to housing for disabled and elderly people. I passionately believe that current housing design is inappropriate for the vast majority of the population, and I hope to make one or two points later in my speech to support that belief.

It is worth reminding my hon. Friend the Minister—as if he needed reminding—that we have just passed the second anniversary of the start of consultation on regulations governing housing design. I have been told that, to celebrate the second birthday, he recently took possession of a cake shaped like a house—which, I am happy to say, was designed with level access to the front door. I hope that he enjoyed the cake very much.

As I said, the Department of the Environment has been consulting the building industry and all other interested parties on whether new regulations should require the industry to make some desirable changes. When we asked when the results of the inquiry would be available, those at the Department told us that they would love to do so but that they could not because they had been swamped by the responses, which numbered about 1,000.

We asked how many people in the Department were dealing with that flood of responses. We were told that one hapless official was trying to wade through it. It is laughable to suggest that having one official deal with such a massive response is a way of giving the issue priority. Even worse, the Department is now saying that it needs to examine the cost of the proposals, but why on earth could an analysis of the costs not have been carried out concurrently over the past two years?

Accessible housing matters, because too many people are prisoners in their own homes. It used to be said that an Englishman's home was his castle but, for far too many, it is a prison. It is extraordinarily difficult for the elderly or the injured to get in and out of their home. I stress that the problem is not confined to the elderly. I have a constituent whose 17-year-old son broke his leg in two places playing rugger and was in plaster from hip to ankle. She said that it nearly killed the family having to get him upstairs to the lavatory because there was none on the ground floor.

Accessibility also matters because the population mix is changing. In 25 years' time, there will be twice as many 75-year-olds as there are now, and the enormous advances in medical care will mean that many disabled people who would not previously have been able to live at home will be able to do so if their home is in any way suitable. In addition, the whole purpose of the Government's community care policy is to enable people to live at home, but frequently the kind of homes in which they are asked to live makes that extraordinarily difficult. For many people, getting in and out of and around their home is like negotiating an obstacle course.

Change is necessary, because this country's housing stock is expensively inflexible, and the problem is getting worse. In 1980, 800 wheelchair homes, as they were then called, and 5,200 mobility homes were built. By 1993, the numbers had fallen to 247 wheelchair homes and 1,150 mobility homes. That is movement in the wrong direction.

Inflexibility is enormously expensive in terms not only of cost but of time. For example, it can take a year to adapt a home to make it liveable. If new homes were made accessible for all generations, the Government's own figures suggest that it would cost between £100 and £300 to adapt a house, depending on the size. As about 140,000 homes are built each year, adaptation could cost £28 million per annum, but it currently costs £350 million each year to adapt houses.

It has been estimated that as many as one in three homes will need to be adapted in the next 30 years, but if every new home built during that time were built to lifetime standard—we can assume a life expectancy of 60 years, but a hell of a lot of houses in this country last much longer—about £2.337 billion would be saved in that period.

Where does the opposition lie? I think that the building industry is the source of it. Builders appear to want to build only the type of homes that their fathers built, except that they use modern materials to do so. There is huge resistance to building level-entry homes, even though it has been proved a thousand times that level entry is convenient for mothers with buggies, old people with shopping trolleys and young kids with bicycles, as well as for people who find going up and down steps almost impossible. It has also been proved time and again that water does not come under the door in a level-entry home, as has been suggested. In any event, if there is a risk of it doing so, something that costs £5.40 can exclude it.

The building industry's interest in this matter is well demonstrated. Age Concern sent to 200 builders a report on the difficulties of older people and a check list on how houses might be better adapted. Two replied—one favourable, the other hostile—whereas, of the architects to whom the report was sent, 95 per cent. replied, as did 85 per cent. of housing associations and 92 per cent. of local authorities. Why are builders so stubbornly hostile?

There are costs, and the biggest single cost in a whole lifetime home programme is the greater space required, for example, for a hallway in which a wheelchair can turn around, or a downstairs lavatory in which it is possible for a disabled person to have a shower as well as use the lavatory. It might mean that, in one hectare, one might lose one housing unit, and that is expensive; I accept that. We need to look at that cost against the cost of the inflexibility that we currently have.

What on earth is stopping the building industry designing into the houses that they build the things that do not cost anything? I have already mentioned level entry. It does not cost anything in most locations, but it costs a huge amount not to have it: older people fall and stumble, at great cost to themselves and to the national health service; young people frequently cannot have their elderly relatives to stay because of the difficulty of negotiating the steps; and going up and down steep steps is a nightmare for visiting people with wheelchairs.

There is absolutely no reason why electricity sockets should not be placed at a height that all of us can easily reach. In most houses, electricity sockets are accessible to only one member of the family—the infant who crawls on the floor. I understand that infants are discouraged, by the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents, and others, from putting their little fingers into sockets. Why on earth are sockets not placed at a level where they can be reached easily?

Why are windows not lowered slightly, so that, if somebody is confined to bed or is sitting in a chair, he or she can look out of the window? It would not cost any more. The window could be the same size. It would just be a foot or 18 in lower. Where that is done, the measure is extremely well received.

When these wonderful kitchen units are put in when kitchens are redesigned, it is possible to have adjustable surface heights, which would help people like my old aunt who recently died; because she was small, she used to stand on a rickety stool to preside over the pot on her cooker. By the time she was 95, she had shrunk to the point where she could not see what she was cooking.

To the building industry and to my hon. Friend on the Front Bench I stress that, where these modifications are introduced, nobody notices. That is the interesting bit. I have been to the Joseph Rowntree estate in York, where every house has level entry. If people who drove into that estate without knowing that fact were asked, when they got out of their car, "What is different about this estate?" they would say something like, "It is wonderfully clean," or, "It is very nice." They would not say, "Isn't it interesting that there's not a single step to be seen?"

These changes will not put off potential buyers brought up by the building industry to believe that they must have a house just like their grandfather. What is more—this is the crux of the debate—all my contacts in the building world are far more concerned about losing a competitive edge than they are about the minimal basic additional cost that such adaptations might incur.

If everybody was made to build houses for every generation and for convenience for us all, they would all do it. It is just because they are frightened of adding perhaps £150 to the cost of their house that they will not do it. That is part of the reason.

Not only Age Concern but every other group interested in the quality of life of our population wants the consultation to come to a conclusion. They want regulations to be introduced so that we start building houses that are adapted to the changing needs of the population, which will increase over the next century. I very much hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will give us some comfort today.

2.49 pm

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) and the Minister for allowing me to make a short contribution. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for raising this important subject and for explaining in a lucid and persuasive way why it is essential that we make progress with the concept of lifetime homes. We are talking about raising standards and reducing obstacles for people with reduced mobility, whether temporary or long-lasting, that prevent them from being able to use houses.

Although adaptations can be carried out in certain cases, they are often expensive and time-consuming, and they can only be carried out in the individual's home. That does not help a person who wants to be able to visit friends and who will have great difficulty in doing so if the entry makes it impossible for him to get easy access, or if there is no space for his wheelchair to turn around.

The concept of lifetime homes is creating a framework for the future which will remove obstacles for people with reduced mobility, in terms of accessing not only their home but other people's. It must be right; there is a case for action. Consultation has been going on for two years and there is no question in Labour Members' minds, as is also the case with the hon. Member for Mid–Kent, that the new part M regulations must be introduced without further delay. This subject should not have dragged on for so long, and I hope that the Minister can give us some reassurance that the Government, even though time is running out before the general election, will act quickly so that there is no need to wait until the election of a different Government for the introduction of the new regulations.

The Parliamentary Under–Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. James Clappison): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid–Kent (Mr. Rowe) on having secured a debate on a subject in which he has long taken an interest. His speech exemplified that interest and his knowledge of the subject. I appreciate what he said about the Government's approach towards the extension of part M of the building regulations.

I am sure that my hon. Friend appreciates that we need to strike the right balance between costs and benefits to ensure that house buyers get worthwhile improvements for any additional costs they may be asked to pay. As my hon. Friend has said, the Government received more than 1,000 responses to the consultation, giving diverse opinions. Assessment of the responses has been a long and complex task, which is continuing. The comments we have received about the costs of the proposals require further work, because the Government have a duty to produce a compliance cost assessment for the extension of the regulations. Without such an assessment, the Government would face heavy criticism from the business sector.

My hon. Friend questions why we did not calculate costings at the time of issuing the consultation exercise—concurrently, as he put it. My answer to him is that we did. However, the responses from house builders consistently expressed concern that the Department's compliance cost assessment had underestimated the costs of the proposals, particularly for smaller, low-cost units and high-density schemes, typically on infill sites. My hon. Friend the Minister for Construction, Planning and Energy Efficiency met the House Builders Federation to discuss their concerns and agreed to a further, short independent study into the cost and design implications for those particular schemes. The study will be carried out jointly with the House Builders Federation.

To date, we have written to eight local authorities asking for their help in selecting suitable schemes for the study. Once that information has been received, we shall be able to let the contract. It is expected to run for some three months, but clearly we cannot give a completion date until we have let the work.

Of course we are sympathetic to the needs of disabled and elderly people with mobility problems, but the vast majority of them will not wish to move from their existing housing, so regulating to improve accessibility in new homes would have no impact on their lives. We believe that grants to allow the elderly and disabled to carry out essential modifications to their home are an effective way in which to help people with mobility problems. I am sure that my hon. Friend, with his knowledge of the subject, will be aware of disabled facilities grants, and the form in which they emerged from last year's legislation.

Disabled facilities grants payable by local housing authorities play an important role in providing help to elderly and disabled people who need essential adaptations such as modifications to their homes to provide better access into and around the home and to provide suitably adapted facilities for cooking and washing. They enable many people to remain in their homes and to manage as independently as possible. I am pleased to say that local authorities have approved more than 125,000 disabled facilities grants since they were introduced in 1990.

As a clear demonstration of our commitment to ensure that disabled and elderly people continue to receive the help that they need to enable them to live comfortably in their homes, we retained mandatory disabled facilities grant in an otherwise discretionary renovation grant system under part I of the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996. The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford), who is a veteran of the Act, will be aware of those provisions. We have also made a number of improvements designed to provide more help to those least able to afford costly adaptations.

Authorities now have discretion to pay grant above the £20,000 limit where costly adaptations are needed. Help is now available for works to make the home safe for a disabled occupant or other household members such as children. It will benefit households where a disabled person has behavioural problems and may be a danger to himself and others in the home. Furthermore, we have relaxed the means test to ensure that other household members are not penalised when the disabled occupant applies for grant. Disabled people are also eligible for home repair assistance, which provides speedy help with small works of repair, improvement or adaptation.

That is not the only way in which we are providing assistance to disabled people. We are also helping them through the work of the home improvement agencies, which have an important role in helping elderly and disabled people and those on low incomes to carry out improvement works to their property to enable them to stay in the comfort and security of their own homes.

The importance of the work of the agencies is reflected in the Government's decision to continue the grant programme for at least another five years from April 1995. Our commitment is further demonstrated by the fact that £4.8 million has been provided in 1996–97 to fund the home improvement agency movement. That represents an increase of 13 per cent. compared with 1995–96. The number of home improvement agencies receiving grant from my Department has increased substantially since 1991.

I heard the comments that have been made about lifetime homes and we are aware of the arguments in support of the benefits of lifetime homes. Although we take a keen interest in new developments, we must be cautious, because lifetime homes tend to be more spacious than ordinary housing and the additional floor space required will add to costs, particularly where land prices are high. We do not consider it worth while to build all homes to the specification of lifetime homes, as only a small number of people are likely to need all the facilities lifetime homes can provide. Many will be older people who wish to move from family housing to smaller homes which are easier to manage.

With the projected increase of more than 4 million new households in England over the next 20 years, there is pressure on us to make the best available use of land for housing.

Mr. Rowe: I hope that my hon. Friend will address the fact that a substantial number of the features that I suggested not only cost less but take up no more land. Even if we cannot provide lifetime homes for everyone, why on earth can some of the more useful features not be incorporated in the regulations?

Mr. Clappison: My hon. Friend makes an important point. As I said, we are following developments keenly, but we have to consider the wider context and making the best use of the available land for housing given the projected increase in the number of households. Policies that may encourage some people to live in housing that is larger than required will not help us in that respect.

We have done a great deal to assist disabled people in the ways that I have outlined and through the high standards that we expect of social housing through the housing corporation scheme development standards and the work of local authorities in conjunction with registered social landlords. We take into account the needs of elderly and disabled people in all those areas and give them assistance through grants. This subject, especially the extension of part M of the building regulations, is important. I hope that I have explained to my hon. Friend's satisfaction that we are approaching the issue with a keen interest and some caution. We shall certainly reflect on the important points that he has made.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Three o'clock.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Ministerial Leave

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Attorney-General (1) how many days leave he has taken in the Easter, Whitsun and summer adjournments; and how many days leave he took during the time in which Parliament was prorogued this year; [9802]

(2) how many days of leave he plans to take during the Christmas adjournment. [9803]

The Attorney-General: I refer to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Consultants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Attorney-General what estimates he has made of the amount spent on external consultants by his Department's non-departmental public bodies in each of the last five years. [10174]

The Attorney-General: I am not responsible for any such bodies.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list the actions his Department has taken on each of the recommendations contained in the Cabinet Office report on the Government's use of external consultants. [10175]

The Attorney-General: The departments and agencies for which I am responsible are not large users of external consultants. A number of recommendations in the report related to other named Departments. Of those of general application, some were already established working practices in my departments and agencies. Measures taken to implement the remaining recommendations include the introduction of a new internal guidance manual by the Crown Prosecution Service, and arrangements under which departments submit to me plans showing the expected use of external consultants and obtain my approval for proposals involving expenditure of more than £50,000.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Public Appointments

Dr. John Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what changes have been made to the appointment procedures for non-departmental public bodies within her Department since July 1995; and if she will make a statement. [10152]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: New procedures have been implemented based on the "Guidance on Appointments to Executive Non-Departmental Public Bodies and NHS Bodies" issued by the Office of the Commissioner for Public Appointments in April 1996.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if the appointments of (a) the chairman of the Independent Television Commission, (b) the chairman and deputy chairman of the Broadcasting Standards Commission and (c) the chairman of the Broadcasting Complaints Commission were made on the advice of an independent appointment committee. [10276]

Mrs. Bottomley: The appointment of the chairman of the Independent Television Commission was made following an executive search exercise and consideration by an advisory panel with independent membership. The appointments of the chairman and deputy chairman of the Broadcasting Standards Commission pre-dated the introduction of the advisory panels that were set up as a result of Lord Nolan's report.

The Broadcasting Complaints Commission will cease to exist as a separate body on 31 March 1997. In order to ensure continuity, only candidates who were already members of the commission were considered for appointment as its chairman when the previous chairman resigned in September. The decision was made without recourse to an advisory panel.

Listed Buildings

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when she expects to announce the outcome of her Department's review of listed buildings in Buxton. [9843]

Mr. Sproat: The draft review for Buxton is currently being considered by my Department with the aim of issuing the revised list in early February.

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many buildings have been listed in each category in Sheffield for each of the last three years. [10329]

Mr. Sproat: The figures are as follows: in 1994, five buildings—all in grade II; in 1995, 376 buildings—all in grade II. In addition, three buildings were upgraded from grade II to II*. In 1996, three buildings—all grade II. Following a re-survey, a revised list for Sheffield was issued in December 1995; this accounts for the high number of new listings during that year.

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what criteria are used by English Heritage to determine which buildings should be listed. [10328]

Mr. Sproat: Before recommending a building for listing to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, English Heritage must be satisfied that it is of special architectural or historic interest. The criteria against which buildings are assessed for listing are set out in paragraphs 6.10 to 6.16 of "planning policy guidance note 15: "Planning and the Historic Environment", published jointly by my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment and for National Heritage in September 1994.

Ministerial Leave

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) how many days of leave she plans to take during the Christmas adjournment; [9821]

(2) how many days leave she has taken in the Easter, Whitsun and summer adjournments; and how many days leave she took during the time in which Parliament was prorogued this year. [9820]

Mr. Sproat: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given toady by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Legislation

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many items of legislation relating to her Department have been repealed since January 1994; how many statutory instruments were introduced during the same period; and how many of the latter were (a) deregulatory and (b) fee orders. [9365]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 17 December 1996]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Bates) on 17 December 1996, Official Report, column 492.

Museums and Galleries

Sir Timothy Sainsbury: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what revenue has been raised from admission charges to museums and galleries sponsored by her Department for each institution, broken down to show (a) revenue from (i) general admission charges, (ii) charges for entry to temporary exhibitions and (b) the proportion of total museum revenue accruing from (a) in the last year for which figures are available. [8939]

Mr. Sproat: For 1995–96, the information is as follows:

	Revenue from general admission charges (£000)	Revenue from temporary exhibition charges (£000)	Revenue generated from admissions charges as a percentage of total revenue
British Museum	—	102	0
Imperial War Museum	3,049	243	15

[1] In addition, voluntary entrance donations amounted to £996,000.

Television Licences

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when she plans to introduce regulations amending the television licence concessionary scheme. [10644]

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when she plans to bring forward new consolidated television licensing regulations. [10664]

Mr. Sproat: As I indicated on 3 December 1996, in my reply to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), Official Report, column 588, the Government intend that new, consolidated television licence fee regulations will come into force from 1 April 1997. In accordance with the Government's undertaking during the passage of the Broadcasting Act 1996, these regulations will include an amendment to address the anomalous situation where the residents of a sheltered housing scheme, which meets all the other qualifying criteria, fail to qualify for concessionary television licences because a small number of units within the scheme were purchased under the right-to-buy provisions before the accommodation was designated as sheltered housing. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will announce this month details of the changes to be effected in the regulations, which will also bring into force the new licence fees announced on 18 December last year. The regulations themselves will be laid before Parliament as soon as possible thereafter.

Sir Michael Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when she expects the regulations to take account of the changes in the use of television in recent years, referred to in the answer to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. Hargreaves) on 18 July, Official Report, column 601, to be introduced. [9212]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 16 December 1996]: As I indicated on 3 December in my reply to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) Official Report, column 588, the Government intend that new, consolidated television licence fee regulations will come into force from 1 April 1997. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State hopes to announce this month details of the changes to be effected in the regulations and the level of the licence fee also coming into force from 1 April. The regulations themselves will be laid before Parliament as soon as possible thereafter.

Consultants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list the actions her Department has taken on each of the recommendations contained in the Cabinet Office report on the Government's use of external consultants. [10159]

Mr. Sproat: The Cabinet Office report on the Government's use of external consultants had 34 recommendations. Six of these relate to other Government Departments—recommendations numbers 4, 5, 7, 10, 19 and 21.

In respect of the remaining 28, my Department has implemented four in full—recommendations numbers 3, 6, 9 and 20; the rest are to be implemented in the context of a new procurement strategy on which my Department is currently working.

Staff

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many (a) permanent and (b) non-permanent staff there have been in (i) her Department and (ii) executive agencies of her Department in each year since 1992. [9630]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 18 December 1996]: The number of permanent and non-permanent staff within the Department of National Heritage and agencies since 1992 is shown in the table:

	Permanent	Non-Permanent
DNH
1992–93	264	4
1993–94	317	18
1994–95	337	22
1995–96	355	15
1996–97	353	8
Historic Royal Palaces
1992–93	322	109
1993–94	368	145
1994–95	423	129
1995–96	[1]312	159
1996–97	316	202
The Royal Parks
1993–94	272	12
1994–95	266	19
1995–96	263	18
1996–97	242	15

[1] The Historic Royal Palaces figure decreased between 1994–95 and 1995–96 due to contracting out of 70 warding staff at Hampton Court.

The Royal Parks/Royal Parks Constabulary are unable to provide details of staff for 1992–93 because they did not become an agency until 1993.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list for her Department (a) how many people in total are employed, (b) how many of the total number of staff are (i) male and (ii) female and (c) how many (I) men and (II) women are employed on a (1) full-time and (2) part-time basis. [9483]

Mr. Sproat: The current staff in post for the Department of National Heritage is:

	Full time	Part time	Total staff
Male	185	1	186
Female	169	6	175
Total	354	7	361

National Lottery

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage, pursuant to her answer of 6 November, Official Report, column 533, what funds have been allocated to Sheffield-based charities by the National Lottery Charities Board since its inception; if she will identify the charities and voluntary organisations receiving each amount; and if she will make a statement. [10506]

Mr. Sproat: Since my hon. Friend's earlier question, the National Lottery Charities Board has awarded grants under its third grants round to almost 2,000 organisations across the United Kingdom. Of these, 30 are based in Sheffield. This means that a total of 88 grants, worth over £6.45 million, have been made by the National Lottery Charities Board since its inception to organisations based in Sheffield. The details of the awards concerned are as follows:

Millennium Projects, Wales

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how much Millennium Commission grant aid has been offered to projects in Wales to date; how many projects this figure covers; and what is grant aid per head of population in Wales. [7616]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 16 December 1996]: The Millennium Commission has supported eight capital projects in Wales, two capital projects which cover England and Wales, and four projects which cover the whole of the UK. Of the eight capital projects supported specifically in Wales, the total grant aid to date is £92,824,028. Of the projects which cover more than one country, £11.2 million has been allocated to Wales, making a total capital projects allocation of £104,024,028. The commission has also offered grant to six millennium award schemes. These grants are allocated in response to applications. Four will cover the whole of the UK and one scheme for £365,134 is specifically targeted at Wales. Thus, the total grant allocation is £104,389,162. Working on the basis that the population of Wales is 2,906,500, grant aid per head is £35.92.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Statutory Instruments

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make statutory instruments available on the Internet. [10407]

Mr. Freeman: I have been asked to reply.

With effect from the first printed statutory instrument of 1997, all new statutory instruments will be placed on the Internet within 15 working days of publication in printed form, at the following address: http://www.hmso.gov.uk/stat.htm.

Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if the new Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland has ever been a member of a political party. [10289]

Mr. Streeter: Judicial appointments are made on professional and personal merit. The Lord Chancellor does not require candidates for, or holders of, judicial office to declare their political affiliation.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what procedures were followed in appointing the next Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland; in what ways the procedures differ from that for other United Kingdom jurisdictions; and when the appointment was announced. [10287]

Mr. Streeter: The Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland is appointed by the Queen on the advice of the Lord Chancellor. In England and Wales, the Lord Chief Justice is appointed by the Queen on the advice of the Prime Minister, as is the Lord President in Scotland. The appointment of the right hon. Sir Robert Carswell as Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland was announced on 29 November 1996, and took effect on 6 January 1997.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department which (a) bodies and (b) individuals were consulted about the appointment of the new Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland. [10288]

Mr. Streeter: In making recommendations to the Queen in respect of senior judicial appointments, the Lord Chancellor has discretion to consult as he thinks fit, and such consultations are confidential.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if the next Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland is or has been a member of (a) the Masonic Order, (b) the Orange Order and (c) other societies membership of which must be declared. [10545]

Mr. Streeter: Judicial appointments are made on professional and personal merit. The Lord Chancellor does not require candidates for, or holders of, judicial office to declare membership of any lawful organisation.

Consultants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what estimates he has made of the amount spent on external consultants by his Department's non-departmental public bodies in each of the last five years. [10176]

Mr. Streeter: The amount spent by the Department's NDPBs during the relevant financial years was as follows:

1991–92: £128,843

1992–93: £209,794

1993–94: £155,947

1994–95: £110,650

1995–96: £96,659.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the actions his Department has taken on each of the recommendation contained in the Cabinet Office report on the Government's use of external consultants. [10177]

Mr. Streeter: In response to the Cabinet Office report on the use of external consultants, the Lord Chancellor's Department corporate board issued a policy statement in June 1995 designed to help ensure value for money in the employment of consultants. It set the criteria for their use, operating principles and monitoring arrangements and included a requirement for ministerial approval for contracts where the final cost could exceed £20,000 and for an annual report to the Department's corporate board on the use of consultants. It covered recommendations 1, 2 and 12 of the Cabinet Office report.

Other actions taken are as follows:

The implications of recommendations 8, 11 to 18, 22 to 25 and 26 to 31 are dealt with by way of central guidance. The Department's procurement manual will be amended to reflect these recommendations.

Arrangements are in place to review the central guidance periodically and the internal assurance division has included the use of external consultants in its audit programme (recommendation 33).

Expenditure on consultants is identified separately in the departmental accounts (recommendation 3).

Arrangements are in place which require a business case and senior management authority for consultancy projects costing more than £10,000 (recommendation 6).

There are centres of expertise in the purchasing of consultancy skills. Each centre keeps under review, in consultation with managers, the contracts typically used for the employment of consultants (recommendations 9 and 20 to 21).

Although the DTI database for the use of consultants is not available, the LCD is establishing its own (recommendation 10).

The LCD's procurement services division submitted its first annual report to the corporate board, which was approved on 3 October 1996 (recommendation 32).

Although recommendations, 5, 7, 10, 19 and 34 are supported, they are not for the LCD to implement.

Legal Services

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what estimate he has made of the average length of time that cases were before the legal services ombudsman before an investigating officer was appointed in each of the last three years. [10445]

Mr. Streeter: The legal services ombudsman considers that cases are properly before him only when he is satisfied that the matter falls within his jurisdiction and he has obtained the case file from the relevant professional body. The average interval from receipt of the professional body file to allocation to an investigating officer is:

1994 four to five months

1995 five to six months

1996 six to seven months.

Green Form Scheme

Mr. Keith Hill: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what percentage of (a) the population of and (b) households in England and Wales were eligible for (i) civil legal aid and (ii) legal advice and assistance under the green form scheme, in each of the last five years for which figures are available. [10438]

Mr. Streeter: We have no reliable means of estimating the percentage of the population eligible for civil legal aid. The most recent estimates of the percentage of households eligible for civil legal aid in each of the five years up to 1996–97 are:

Financial year	Percentage
1992–93	53
1993–94	48
1994–95	50
1995–96	50
1996–97	48

We do not collect information on eligibility for legal advice and assistance under the green form scheme.

Ernest Saunders

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the amount of legal aid paid to Mr. Ernest Saunders in the cases resulting from the Guinness affair. [10485]

Mr. Streeter: The sum of £1,286,234 was paid to Mr. Saunders' legal representatives for work done in relation to the Crown court proceedings resulting from investigations into the takeover by Guinness of the Distillers Group. A further amount of £296,111 was paid in relation to proceedings in the Court of Appeal. Legal aid is not available for proceedings before the European Court of Human Rights.

The total amount paid in legal aid in relation to R v. Saunders is therefore £1,582,345.

Transaction Criteria

Mr. Keith Hill: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list (a) the areas in which transaction criteria have been published and the date of publication and (b) the areas in which transaction criteria are still being developed and the expected date of publication. [10436]

Mr. Streeter: Transaction criteria were published, ahead of the introduction of the Legal Aid Board's franchising scheme, in July 1994, in the nine franchised areas of work, as follows: family matrimonial, personal injury, employment, debt, contract, housing, immigration, welfare benefits, criminal litigation. I am informed by the chief executive that the Legal Aid Board is currently looking at areas where the scope of transaction criteria might be extended.

Transaction criteria have recently been drafted to extend the audit scope within the welfare benefits and housing categories. It is expected that these will be published in April 1997, ahead of implementation.

Franchising Advisory Committee

Mr. Keith Hill: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department on how many occasions the franchising advisory Committee has met; when it plans to meet next; and if he will make a statement. [10435]

Mr. Streeter: The franchising advisory committee—FAC—was established to facilitate communication and consultation with the legal profession and its representative bodies during the early development of the Legal Aid Board's franchising scheme following its introduction in August 1994. I am informed by the board's chief executive that the committee met on two occasions. In December 1996, the Legal Aid Board decided that the committee should be discontinued, as more effective mechanisms for communication and consultation had been developed. Members of the FAC have been informed of this decision.

Emergency Legal Aid

Mr. Keith Hill: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department on how many occasions the decision to grant an emergency legal aid certificate by a solicitor's practice with devolved powers under a legal aid franchise has subsequently been overruled by a legal aid area office in each of the last five years. [10437]

Mr. Streeter: The number of occasions on which a legal aid area office has overruled the decision of a franchised solicitor to use their desolved powers to grant emergency civil legal aid is given below. Also given is the number of occasions on which the terms of the grant decisions was amended by the area office.

Year	Overruled decisions	Amended decisions
August 1994 to March 1995	62	61
April 1995 to March 1996	197	185
April 1996 to December 1996	365	261

Franchising was introduced in August 1994.

Magistrates Courts Committees

Mr. Butcher: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what representations he has received from Coventry and Solihull magistrates in respect of the proposed amalgamation of Birmingham, Solihull and Coventry magistrates courts committees; and if he will abandon the project. [10745]

Mr. Streeter: I have received 145 individual representations and a petition from Coventry magistrates and 36 individual representations from Solihull magistrates on this subject. A decision on the way forward will be made after consideration of all the representations received.

Probate Districts

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the running costs of each probate district and the income generated for the latest year for which figures are available. [10798]

Mr. Streeter: The question concerns a matter which has been assigned to the Court Service under the terms of its framework document. I have therefore asked the chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from M. D. Huebner to Mr. Paddy Tipping, dated 13 January 1997:

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department has asked me to reply to your Question about the running costs of and income generated by each Probate District.

The following table details the running costs of each district for the financial year 1995–1996 and the fees recovered for the calendar year 1995:

Probate district	Fees recovered (calendar year 1995)	Running costs (financial year 1995–96)
Birmingham	3,097,675	333,404
Brighton	4,091,954	356,055
Bristol	3,349,502	400,071

[2] This figure is the overall running cost of the Principal Registry of the Family Division in London which houses the Family Proceedings Department and the PRFD Secretariat as well as the Probate Department.

Additionally, £2,996,597 was paid for probate accommodation centrally during the financial year 1995–96.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Ministerial Leave

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) how many days of leave he plans to take during the Christmas adjournment; [9807]

(2) how many days leave he has taken in the Easter, Whitsun and summer adjournments; and how many days leave he took during the time in which Parliament was prorogued this year. [9806]

Mr. Freeman: Ministers are required to be available for Government business at all times. Subject to this overall requirement they may take leave as and when Government business permits.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister (1) how many days of leave he plans to take during the Christmas adjournment; [9805]

(2) how many days leave he has taken in the Easter, Whitsun and summer adjournments; and how many days leave he took during the time in which Parliament was prorogued this year. [9804]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Minister without Portfolio (1) how many days of leave he plans to take during the Christmas adjournment; [9809]

(2) how many days leave he has taken in the Easter, Whitsun and Summer adjournments; and how many days leave he took during the time in which Parliament was prorogued this year. [9808]

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Consultants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) when each Department produced its (a) initial report on progress and achievements and (b) final report on formulating an action plan in response to paragraph 31, page 9 of the efficiency unit's report. "The Government's Use of External Consultants", August 1994; [9993]

(2) what assessments have been made on the use of external consultants since the August 1994 efficiency unit report reviews. [9995]

Mr. Freeman: All Departments have taken action to implement the recommendations of the scrutiny. Action plans were received from all Departments shortly after publication of the scrutiny report and all Departments have carried out, or have programmes in place to carry out, implementation as described in those plans. As part of the continuing initiative to improve value derived from expenditure on consultancy, the Prime Minister's adviser on efficiency, at the end of 1995, conducted as assessment of the processes Departments use to subject related expenditure to ministerial approval. The efficiency unit continues to monitor Departments' expenditure on consultants.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in what form advice and guidance is issued to (a) individual Government Departments and (b) non-departmental public bodies on the use of external consultants. [9983]

Mr. Freeman: Comprehensive and relevant advice and guidance on good practice is contained in the efficiency unit's scrutiny, "The Government's Use of External Consultants" (HMSO: August 1994); this is available to all Departments and non-departmental public bodies. Many Departments have produced and issued their own guidance in light of the report.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will update his estimate of the 20 most used external consultant firms as contained in the efficiency unit's report "The Government's Use of External Consultants", August 1994. [9994]

Mr. Freeman: I have no plans to do so.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what estimate he has made of the amount spent on external consultants by his Department's non-departmental public bodies in each of the last five years. [10190]

Mr. Freeman: No money has been spent on external consultants by my Department's non-departmental public bodies in the last five years.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will list the actions his Department has taken on each of the recommendations contained in the Cabinet Office report "The Government's Use of External Consultants". [10191]

Mr. Freeman: The Cabinet Office has acted on the 34 recommendations contained in the report. In implementing the recommendations it has improved its management and control of the use of consultants, including monitoring expenditure and value gained. Guidance on buying and using external consultancy has been circulated to staff.

Ministerial Resignations

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list those Ministers who have resigned from Government office since the 1992 general election, indicating from which ministerial position they resigned, how much severance was paid following their resignation and the date in each case on which payment was made. [10277]

Mr. Freeman: Ministers and Government office holders who have resigned since the 1992 general election are as listed. Unless otherwise noted, each was paid a severance payment in accordance with the terms of the Ministerial and other Pensions and Salaries Act 1991.

Under the Act, payments are made no less than three weeks after the date of resignation. The actual dates on which payments were made by Departments were not held centrally before February 1994. However, the dates of payments made after February 1994 are as listed.

Business Appointment Rules

Mr. Derek Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what steps he has taken to monitor the effectiveness of the business appointment rules and the way in which they are followed in individual Departments. [9780]

Mr. Freeman: The Cabinet Office—Office of Public Service—continually monitors the general effectiveness of the rules as part of its consideration of the cases which Departments and agencies are required to refer to it under the rules. The chairman and deputy chairman of the Advisory Committee on Business Appointments review a sample of these cases annually.

Mr. Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the business appointment rules; and if he will make a statement. [9884]

Mr. Freeman: The business appointment rules for Crown servants are at chapter 4.3 annexes A and B of the "Civil Service Management Code", a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Government Policy Reviews

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster which reviews of Government policies have been undertaken by the Cabinet Office in each of the last five years. [9996]

Mr. Freeman: The process of policy review is continuous and integral to much of the work of Cabinet Office. The Cabinet secretariat supports the work of the Cabinet and its Committees in all areas of Government policy. The Office of Public Service has policy responsibility for: the citizens charter programme; deregulation initiative; competitiveness agenda; efficiency scrutiny programme; co-ordination of the market testing programme and the next steps executive agencies programme; and development of an inter-departmental strategy for information technology. OPS also has responsibility for a number of civil service management, personnel and organisational issues.

Several Cabinet Office reviews of Government policies have culminated in the publication of a White Paper, including:

"Realizing our Potential; Strategy for Science, Technology and Engineering"—Cm. 2250

"The Citizen's Charter: 1st Report"—Cm. 2101

"The Citizen's Charter: 2nd Report"—Cm. 2540

"The Citizen's Charter: Facts and Figures"—Cm. 2970

"The Citizen's Charter: 5 years on"—Cm. 3370

PRIME MINISTER

Consultants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Prime Minister (1) what estimates he has made of the amount spent on external consultants by his Department's non-departmental public bodies in each of the last five years; [10170]

(2) if he will list the actions his Department has taken on each of the recommendations contained in the Cabinet Office report on the Government's use of external consultants. [10171]

The Prime Minister: For these purposes my office is part of the Cabinet Office. I refer the hon. Member to the replies given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

TREASURY

Local Government Finance

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 20 November, Official Report, column 570, about the total amount spent by local government, what was the total amount spent by local government in 1979 at current prices. [5902]

Mr. Waldegrave: In the financial year 1979–80 the total amount spent by local government, by national accounts definitions, and adjusted to 1996–97 prices was £68 billion.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 20 November, Official Report, column 570, about local government funding, what was the figure for 1995–96 at current prices. [5903]

Mr. Waldegrave: As set out in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1997–98" (HC 90), total central Government support to local authorities in the United Kingdom in 1995–96, including credit approvals, was £61,815 million; in 1996–97 prices this is equivalent to £63,360 million.

Computers

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect which the century date change for computer systems will have on the introduction of a single currency; what discussions he has had with his European Union colleagues on this matter; and if he will make a statement. [6664]

Mrs. Angela Knight: In assessing the implications of the century date change, the Treasury has made no assessment of the effect on the introduction of the single currency. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, has not had any discussions with colleagues in the Council of Economic and Finance Ministers—ECOFIN—on this matter.

Economic and Monetary Union

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will investigate the reasons for the delay in the delivery of his letter dated 31 October concerning the European Monetary Institute report on economic and monetary union to the Select Committee on European Legislation; and if he will make a statement on his Department's liaison with the Committee. [6805]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The letter in question was misdirected as a result of an administrative error. I shall ensure that the correct procedures are followed in future.

The European Legislation Committee published a report on 9 December entitled "European Documents on Economic and Monetary Union: The Scrutiny Process". Paragraph 29 of its report said—

"we acknowledge the Chancellor's punctilious approach to the requirements of scrutiny in this case as in many others. Timely information, often exceeding the strict requirements of the scrutiny process, and good explanatory memoranda, have made our task easier."

Nuclear Power Stations (Decommissioning)

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the cost savings to the Treasury from changing the time scale over which nuclear power stations are to be decommissioned. [8048]

Mr. Waldegrave: There are no plans to change the time scale over which nuclear power stations are decommissioned and therefore no estimates of cost savings have been produced.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions (i), he, (ii) his Ministers and (iii) his officials have had regarding changing the time scale over which nuclear power stations are to be decommissioned. [8049]

Mr. Waldegrave: The time scale for decommissioning nuclear power stations was addressed in the White Paper, "The Prospects for Nuclear Power in the UK" (Cm 2860) published in May 1995. The financial effects of different decommissioning strategies were considered prior to the privatisation of British Energy. Since then this issue has not been the subject of discussions by me, by my ministerial colleagues or by my officials.

Taxation Statistics

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of earnings of a married couple with two children and with one earner on average male earnings is estimated to have been paid (a) in income tax, (b) in income tax and national insurance and (c) in total direct and indirect tax in (i) 1978–79 and (ii) 1992–93; and what the corresponding figures are expected to be in 1997–98. [9499]

Mr. Jack: I refer to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr, Darling), Official Report, 11 December 1996, column 190–202 and to the "Tax Benefit Reference Manual", a copy of which has been placed with the House of Commons Library.

Staff

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for his Department (a) how many people in total are employed, (b) how many of the total number of staff are (i) male and (ii) female and (c) how many (I) men and (II) women are employed on a (1) full-time and (2) part-time basis. [9493]

Mrs. Angela Knight: To total number of current Treasury staff in post is as follows:

	Male	Female	Total
Full-time	524	353	877
Part-time	0	39	39
Total	524	392	916

Ministerial Leave

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many days of leave he plans to take during the Christmas adjournment; [9817]

(2) how many days leave he has taken in the Easter, Whitsun and summer adjournments; and how many days leave he took during the time in which Parliament was prorogued this year. [9816]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has given today.

Insurance Premium Tax

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his policy towards disparities in the insurance premium tax applying to (a) travel agents and (b) insurance dealers; and what representations he has received from (i) representatives of the travel industry and (ii) consumers on his Budget measures relating to insurance premium tax. [10147]

Mr. Oppenheim: Under Finance Bill proposals, with effect from 1 April 1997, all travel insurance sold through a travel agent, unless supplied free of charge, will be liable to insurance premium tax—IPT—at 17.5 per cent. As with the other insurances affected by this higher rate of IPT—primarily mechanical breakdown insurance on motor vehicles and domestic appliances and insurances sold with television and car hire—this tax measure addresses the VAT revenue currently lost through the disproportionately high margins often applied to ancillary sales of VAT exempt insurance by suppliers of taxable goods and services in these sectors. Those who practise such pricing policies, regardless of whether their prime motivation is commercial or fiscal, have a tax advantage and can distort the market. In the travel sector most travel insurance is sold by travel agents and tour operators despite their charging significantly higher prices than direct insurers. The current pricing and marketing arrangements indicate, therefore, that although insurance purchased direct from an insurer will be subject to IPT at 4 per cent., this tax differential is unlikely to have any significant effect.

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Shore: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the gross domestic product of the United Kingdom in 1995; and what percentage of European Community gross domestic product it comprised in that year. [9777]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the chief executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Peter Shore, dated 13 January 1997.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply as the Director of the Office for National Statistics to your recent question on what was the gross domestic product of the United Kingdom in 1995; and what percentage of the European Community Gross Domestic Product it comprised in that year.

The latest information for UK gross domestic product as published on 21 November in Table A2 of the ONS First Release UK output income and expenditure shows that gross domestic product at current market prices for 1995 was £700,575 million.

International comparisons of GDP for the UK and the European Community are shown in the OECD publication Main Economic Indicators which is available in the House of Commons Library. The latest available issue shows that at current prices and exchange rates expressed in billions of dollars, the UK accounted for 13.1 per cent. of the total gross domestic product of the European Community.

Taxation

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update his answer to the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) of 27 March 1995, Official Report, columns 427-30, relating to taxation by giving figures for (a) 1996–97 and (b) 1997–98. [10225]

Mr. Jack: Provisional estimates are given in the table.

Public Bodies (Christmas Cards)

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the amount of public money spent by public bodies on sending unsigned Christmas cards in 1996; what assessment he has made of the benefits of sending such cards; and if he will make a statement. [10515]

Mrs. Angela Knight: None; none; and no.

Oil and Gas Revenues

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the cumulative total for Government revenues from oil and gas production from 1979–80 to 1996–97 expressed in 1996–97 prices. [7821]

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 6 December 1996]: Using the Budget forecasts of North sea tax revenues and the GDP deflator in 1996–97, the cumulative total for Government revenues from oil and gas production from 1979–80 to 1996–97 expressed in 1996–97 prices is £125 billion. This represents about 1.75 per cent. of general Government receipts over the period.

Monetary Union

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his oral statement of 3 December, Official Report, column 797, if article 3 of the convergence criteria of the treaty of European union is operating. [8119]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [holding answer 9 December 1996]: Article 3 of protocol No. 6 on the convergence criteria still forms part of the EC treaty, although its interpretation is uncertain because the operation of the exchange rate mechanism has changed considerably since Maastricht. The interpretation of the criterion will be considered by Heads of Government when they meet to decide which member states satisfy the necessary conditions for the adoption of a single currency. These decisions will be taken in early 1998 at the earliest.

Abortion

Mr. Alton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what methods of abortion are included in the term "other surgical method" used in the abortion statistics published by his Department. [7925]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 9 December 1996]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the chief executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. David Alton, dated 13 January 1997:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply to your recent question on what methods of abortion are included in the term other surgical method used within the abortion statistics published by his Department.

An examination of the forms of notification of termination of pregnancy in the most recent two years for which forms are available showed that the Other surgical method was in each case used by clinicians to provide specific information about a procedure which could otherwise have been indicated in another category. The information given fell into three groups:

(a) the induction of labour by means of a surgical procedure, for example intra or extra amniotic prostaglandins administration. (Some practitioners record this procedure under the category Medical termination.);

(b) where the initial procedure preceding the abortion involved procedures to stop the fetal heart, such as injection of intra-cardiac potassium chloride. (Some practitioners record this information under Other medical agents.);

(c) where it was necessary to carry out surgical procedures post-termination, for example removal of the placenta, insertion of an intrauterine contraceptive device or other gynecological procedures.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the number of abortions performed from 21 weeks' gestation by "other surgical methods" in the last year for which figures are available. [7926]

Mrs. Knight [holding answer 9 December 1996]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the chief executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. David Alton, dated 13 January 1997:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply as the Director of the the Office for National Statistics to your recent question on the number of abortions performed from 21 weeks gestation by other surgical methods in the last year for which figures are available.

There are four cases at 21 weeks and over in 1995, the most recent year for which information is available.

Revenue and Expenditure Balance (Scotland)

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) pursuant to his answer of 25 November, Official Report, column 68, if he will estimate the total relative surplus or deficit of Government expenditure and revenue in Scotland for each year from 1978–79, assuming a constant relationship between the Scottish deficit, as published in the "Government Expenditure and Revenue in Scotland 1994–95", and the United Kingdom general Government borrowing requirement, excluding privatisation proceeds and North sea revenues and included in Scotland's revenue total a 90 per cent. share of North sea revenue and a gross domestic product share of privatisation proceeds; [8877]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 25 November Official Report, column 68, if he will estimate the total relative surplus or deficit of Government expenditure and revenue in Scotland, excluding the gross domestic product share of the United Kingdom surplus or deficit of the general Government borrowing requirement, for each year from 1978–79, assuming a constant relationship between the Scottish deficit, as published in the "Government Expenditure and Revenue in Scotland 1994–95", and the United Kingdom general Government borrowing requirement, excluding privatisation proceeds and North sea revenues and including in Scotland's revenue total a 90 per cent. share of North sea revenue and a gross domestic product share of privatisation proceeds. [8876]

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 12 December 1996]: The table shows the calculations requested. The assumptions made to produce these figures—particularly for the allocation of North Sea oil revenues to Scotland—are inevitably imprecise.

Prednisolone

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people have (a) become crippled and (b) died from taking the steroid Prednisolone in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [9645]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 17 December 1996]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the chief executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Paul Flynn, dated 13 January 1997:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply as the Director of the Office for National Statistics to your recent question on how many people have (a) become crippled and (b) died from taking the steroid Prednisolone in England in each of the last five years.

Data are not held centrally by ONS or the Department of Health on the number of people crippled as a result of taking Prednisolone. Death records with the relevant ICD9* codes for 1993 to 1995 were searched for a mention of Prednisolone. One death in 1993 and one death in 1994 was recorded as having a mention of Prednisolone on the death certificate. To search the data for deaths occurring before 1993 would have incurred disproportionate cost.

*International Classification of Diseases, 9th revision, underlying cause codes E932.0 and 305.9 and secondary cause code 962.0.

Information Technology (Euro)

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what tenders his Department has put out to convert its information technology systems to be euro compliant; what is the cost and person hours required to convert the systems to handle the euro; and when he expects his Department's systems to be fully economic and monetary union compliant. [9453]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [holding answer 18 December 1996]: My Department and agencies will need to assess the impact which a single currency, at present assumed to be starting on 1 January 1999, would have on their information systems whether or not the United Kingdom decides to participate in the third stage of economic and monetary union.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

"Tackling Drugs Together"

35. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Lord President of the Council what new proposals he has in respect of the initiatives in "Tackling Drugs Together". [8750]

Mr. Newton: "Tackling Drugs Together", contains 19 new specific tasks for the current year, and 20 such tasks for the year 1997–98. I am also announcing today the second drugs challenge fund which provides £2 million additional Government money to be bid for by local drug action teams, in partnership with private business and voluntary groups, for innovative and effective projects.

Sitting Hours

36. Mr. Spearing: To ask the Lord President of the Council on how many occasions the House rose before 10.30 pm on Thursdays (a) in the last Session and (b) since the beginning of the present Session. [8749]

Mr. Newton: The House has risen at or before 10.30 every Thursday last session and so far this Session, apart from once, on 18 April 1996.

Parliamentary Reforms

37. Mr. Steen: To ask the Lord President of the Council what assessment he has made of the operation of the reforms implemented following the Jopling report. [8748]

Mr. Newton: I believe the reforms have been a great success.

Recesses

38. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will review the distribution over the year of parliamentary (a) Sessions and (b) recesses. [8747]

Mr. Newton: This matter was reviewed in 1992 by the Select Committee on Sittings of the House—the Jopling Committee—whose principal recommendation was that the House should rise for the summer recess by mid-July.

Parliamentary Business

39. Mr. MacShane: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will increase the amount of parliamentary business taken in the morning. [8746]

Mr. Newton: I have no plans to do so.

40. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Lord President of the Council what plans he has to extend the period for which he routinely announces the future business of the House. [8745]

Mr. Newton: In addition to announcing the business of the House for the following week, I try to give as much information as I can, on a provisional basis, about the likely business for the following week. I also use my best endeavours to give early notification of some major debates. I see no reasonable prospect of being able to go beyond this.

Defamation Act 1996

41. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Lord President of the Council what assessment he has made of the impact of the Defamation Act 1996 on the proceedings of the House. [8744]

Mr. Newton: I have not made any such assessment.

Points of Order

42. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will make a statement on the procedure for raising points of order during a Division. [8743]

Mr. Newton: I refer my hon. Friend to page 366 of the 21st edition of Erskine May and to the Second Report from the Sessional Committee on Procedure (HC 152 (1976–77)).

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Royal Family (Overseas Visits)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 20 November, Official Report, column 555, how much of the sums paid for clothing to members of the royal family and those accompanying them went to (a) the Duke and Duchess of Kent and (b) the Duke and Duchess of Gloucester; and what sum was devoted to hiring charges. [9950]

Mr. Rifkind: In 1995–96, the cost to my Department for clothing for official overseas visits by the Duke and Duchess of Kent and those accompanying them was £5,300; for the Duke and Duchess of Gloucester and those accompanying them, it was £3,000.

None of these sums was devoted to hiring charges.

North Korea

Mr. Elletson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last discussed the situation in North Korea with the United States Government; and if he will make a statement. [9830]

Mr. Hanley: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary discussed North Korea with the US Secretary of State on 10 December when he raised our concern over the increased tension on the Korean peninsula since the submarine incident in September. Since then, the North Korean Government have issued a statement of apology on 29 December.

Mr. Elletson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last discussed the situation in North Korea with the Government of the Republic of South Korea; and if he will make a statement. [9831]

Mr. Hanley: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary had a meeting with the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Korea on 3 December, and I held talks with the Vice-Minister on 17 December. At both we discussed the situation on the Korean peninsula in the aftermath of the submarine incident. The statement of apology issued by North Korea on 29 December undertaking to ensure no recurrence of such incidents has led to a welcome easing of tension on the peninsula.

Ministerial Visits (Accommodation)

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the occasions when Cabinet Ministers on official visits to (a) Singapore, (b) Thailand, (c) Malaysia, (d) Japan and (e) South Korea have used (i) the official residence and (ii) a residence other than the official residence since 1994, indicating the cost involved. [9960]

Mr. Hanley: The official visits made by Cabinet Ministers to Singapore, Thailand, Malaysia, Japan and South Korea since 1994 are shown in the table.

We are still awaiting information from other Departments which may add to this list. I shall write when it has been received.

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the official residences owned by his Department in south America; and if he will indicate the occasions when Cabinet Ministers on official visits to each country have used (a) the official residence and (b) a residence other than the official residence since 1994, indicating the cost involved. [9955]

Mr. Hanley: Official residences are owned in the following cities: Asuncion, Belmopan, Bogota, Brasilia, Buenos Aires, Caracas, Guatemala City, La Paz, Lima, Montevideo, Panama City, Quito, Rio de Janiero, San Jose, San Salvador, Santiago, Sao Paulo.

Information currently at hand indicates the following visits by Cabinet Ministers to the area since 1994:

Lord Chancellor

Chile 25 to 28 May 1996 (accommodation at Santiago residence);

Peru 29 to 31 May 1996 (Lima residence);

Secretary of State for the Home Department

Argentina 22 to 24 August (Buenos Aires residence);

Bolivia 25 to 28 August 1994 (La Paz residence);

Colombia 29 August to 2 September 1994 (Bogota residence);

Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs

Brazil 4 to 11 April 1994 (Maksoud Plaza hotel);

Sao Paulo Copacabana Palace hotel, Rio de Janiero, Brasilia residence) — No cost—guest of Government

Brazil and Bolivia 8 to 17 April 1996 (Brasilia residence);

Copacabana Palace hotel, Rio de Janiero; Hotel Moferraj Sheraton, Sao Paulo — No cost—guest of Government

Lord Presidence of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons:

Ecuador, Paraguay, Uraquay and Brazil, 7 to 22 August 1996 (Quito residence, Asuncion residence, Montevideo residence, hotel International Brasilia (Cost not available));

Secretary of State for Education and Employment:

Chile and Colombia, 28 May to 4 June 1996 (Residences at Santiago and Bogota but for one night in hotel—cost £362);

Secretary of State for Defence:

Chile December 1996 to January 1997 (Santiago residence).

We are still awaiting information from other Departments which may add to this list. I shall write separately when it has been received.

Ministerial Leave

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many days of leave he plans to take during the Christmas adjournment. [9799]

Mr. Rifkind: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many days leave he has taken in the Easter, Whitsun and summer adjournments; and how many days leave he took during the time in which Parliament was prorogued this year. [9798]

Mr. Rifkind: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Former Prisoners of War

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the response to date from Japanese business men to the Minister of State's invitation to them to extend help to British prisoners of war held in Japan during the second world war; and if he will make a statement. [9882]

Mr. Hanley: As I made clear in the debate on 4 December, Official Report, columns 969–73 our policy is to encourage all initiatives which promote reconciliation and recognise the sacrifices made by former prisoners of war. The British Government have made extensive efforts to develop non-governmental approaches and some activities such as exchange visits are going ahead.

Consultants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the actions his Department has taken on each of the recommendations contained in the Cabinet Office report on the Government's use of external consultants. [10163]

Mr. Hanley: Following the efficiency scrutiny on the Government's use of external consultants, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Overseas Development Administration produced action plans which were agreed with Ministers and submitted to the efficiency unit. Both Departments produced guidelines to cover all the points made in the report. The revised guidelines, in the form of office instructions, were brought to the attention of all staff to whom they were relevant.

In addition to revising their guidelines, the FCO and ODA have also tightened up their procedures on the use of consultants. Last year, it was agreed that consultancies for internal purposes costing more than £50,000 should be authorised by Ministers.

The great majority of ODA expenditure on consultants is undertaken at the request of, and for the benefit of, overseas Governments and institutions; where relevant to this type of activity, the scrutiny recommendations have been implemented in full.

International Agreements

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy with respect to the nomenclature for the United Kingdom and the country to the south and west, utilised on both copies of agreements that he signs with that country; and if he will make a statement. [10481]

Mr. Rifkind: The UK original of treaties and agreements between the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland uses the nomenclature appropriate under UK law which is "the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland" and "the Government of the Republic of Ireland". The Irish original of such treaties and agreements uses the nomenclature for the two countries which the Irish Government consider appropriate.

Intergovernmental Conference

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the article of (a) the treaty on European Union, and (b) its associated treaties, under which the Commission of the European Committees has a locus in respect of the June intergovernmental conference concerning amendments to the treaty; and what communications he has received from the Commission of the Community relating to this matter. [10874]

Mr. David Davis: The Commission of the European Community has a locus in respect of the intergovernmental conference—IGC—under article N of the treaty of European union. The Commission submitted its opinion on convening the IGC on 28 February 1996. This was submitted to Parliament for scrutiny. The Commission has submitted a number of other proposals to the IGC, which have been placed in the Library of the House. The outcome of the IGC will be decided by member states, by unanimity.

Indonesia

Mrs Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the frequencies and the locations of the transmitters supplied under the contracts which followed on from the shortwave radio transmitters project in Indonesia; and who were the contracting parties. [10715]

Mr. Nelson: I have been asked to reply.

I understand from GEC Marconi Communications Ltd. that the shortwave radio transmitters project in Indonesia has helped in securing three follow-on items of business on commercial terms. The details are:

(i) a turnkey project near Jakarta, including the provision of three 250kW high frequency transmitters and antennae system. The contracting parties were Marconi Communications International Ltd. and the directorate of radio television and film of the Department of Information of the Government of Indonesia. The transmitters are to provide an external overseas broadcasting service and operate on frequencies in the internationally recognised broadcasting bands in the 4-26 MHz range.

(ii) the supply and installation of transmitting equipment for 19 sites in Malaysia. The contracting parties were Eddystone Radio Ltd., GEC Malaysia and the Malaysian Ministry of Information. The transmitters operate in the 88-108MHz broadcasting band.

(iii) the supply of medium frequency transmitters and a directional antennae system in Vietnam. The contacting parties were Marconi Communications International Ltd. and Radio Voice of Vietnam. The equipment operates on the fixed frequencies of 549kHz and 675kHz.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police Cells

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of nights spent by prisoners in police cell accommodation in each month this year. [9105]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. George Howarth, dated 13 January 1997:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the number of nights spent by prisoners in police accommodation this year.

No nights have been spent by prisoners in police accommodation this year as a result of overcrowding at establishments. This key objective has applied since June 1995 and continues to be achieved in spite of extreme population pressures.

Under completely separate arrangements, prisoners have, from time to time, to be accommodated overnight in police accommodation following court appearances. This is usually because a late court sitting or the distance involved make it impossible for an escort contractor to get the prisoner back before reception at the establishment closes for the evening.

This continues a practice developed when all prisoner escorts to and from court were undertaken by the Police or Prison Service and is of many years standing. Prison reception times were developed to meet local circumstances. If prisoners could not be delivered before the prison closed for the night the police held them overnight and delivered them the next morning. The number of prisoners lodged overnight by the police in these circumstances prior to contracting out is not available centrally.

The general service to courts, prisons and police forces has improved significantly since the contracting out of escort services. Court contractors are required to get prisoners back to prison by a certain time. This is not always possible for reasons which may be outside their control. However, if they fail to meet this commitment as a result of an error or omission on their part they have to meet any subsequent costs that may arise as a result of the use of police cell accommodation. Well over 99 per cent. of prisoners are admitted to establishments each evening.

The table below gives the number of nights in which prisoners have been accommodated in police cells in these circumstances between January and October this year. Information for November is not yet available. The figures are affected by the fact that during the period in question more escort contracts have started. As a result, better management information on these cases within the contract areas is now available.

Month	Number
January	124
February	171
March	177
April	160
May	129
June	181
July	142
August	185
September	176
October	250

As you will see this amounts to an average of about five prisoners per night.

Prison Accommodation

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of prisoners sharing two to a cell designed for one by prison type in each month this year. [9103]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. George Howarth, dated 13 January 1996.

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the number of prisoners sharing two to a cell designed for one by prison type in each month this year.

Data concerning prisoners sharing cells designed for one is only collected for the prison as a whole. It is therefore not possible to provide information by prison type because many prisons have multiple roles. A list of all prisons which have two prisoners sharing cells designed for one and the various roles they undertake, is provided in the attached table.

Europol

Mr. David Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what international obligations or guidelines apply in the United Kingdom in respect of harmonising practices regarding the interception of communications, with particular reference to the work of Europol. [10217]

Mr. Howard: None. Such practices are a matter for national law.

Ministerial Leave

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many days of leave he plans to take during the Christmas adjournment; [9793]

(2) how many days leave he has taken in the Easter, Whitsun and summer adjournments; and how many days leave he took during the time in which Parliament was prorogued this year. [9792]

Mr. Howard: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster today.

Interception of Communications

Mr. David Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research his Department has evaluated into recent developments in the interception of communications; and what proposals he has to introduce legislation in this area. [10218]

Mr. Howard: The adequacy of legislation is kept under review in the light of developments in the interception field.

Mr. Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many staff, and at what grades, are deployed in undertaking the work required under the Interception of Communications Act 1985, separately identifying the work of (a) the commissioner and (b) the relevant division of his Department; and what other costs are involved in this work. [10216]

Mr. Howard: The commissioner appointed under the Interception of Communications Act 1985 is assisted by a secretary (higher executive officer grade). Within the intelligence and security liaison unit of the Home Office, one grade 7, one higher executive officer, two executive officers, one administrative officer and one typist are engaged on casework under the 1985 Act. Members of the senior civil service are also involved in the consideration of applications. Other costs fall to the agencies requesting interception; it is not the Government's practice to give details of such costs.

Mr. Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the safeguards adopted to deal with interception of communications procedures, including the clandestine listening to telephone calls, in the Commonwealth, the Council of Europe countries and the United States of America; and if he will place such assessment in the Library together with a listing of the principal procedures in each country and the source of that information. [10432]

Mr. Howard: I have made no such assessment. Procedures concerning interception in other countries are a matter for the Governments concerned.

Mr. Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what methods exist for establishing whether the police have been responsible for an unlawful interception of communications procedure. [10429]

Mr. Howard: A person who believes that his or her communications have been intercepted in the course of transmission by post or by means of a public telecommunications system may apply to the tribunal established under section 7 of the Interception of Communications Act 1985 for an investigation of whether a relevant warrant has been issued and, if so, whether there has been any contravention of the Act. The investigation of an allegation that interception has taken place without the authority of a warrant is, like the investigation of other allegations of criminal offences, a matter for the police.

Illegal Immigrants

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many employers have been prosecuted for employing illegal immigrants in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement. [9788]

Mr. Kirkhope: Prior to the introduction of section 8 of the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996, which comes into force on 27 January 1997, it has not been an offence for an employer to employ an illegal entrant.

Prisons (Sanitation)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in how many prisons in England and Wales inmates do not currently have access to sanitation at all times; and if he will make a statement. [9770]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Archy Kirkwood, dated 13 January 1997:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about prisons where inmates do not have access to sanitation at all times.

An extensive programme of work in recent years resulted in the ending of the practice of slopping out in April 1996. There are now no prisons in England and Wales where prisoners housed in normal accommodation do not have access to sanitation at all times.

Most of our establishments have retained a small amount of accommodation where integral sanitation would not be appropriate for example special cells or dirty protest cells. These do not form part of the certified normal accommodation of the establishment.

There are also exceptional occasions when essential maintenance work requires the temporary suspension of access to sanitation.

Hand Grenades and Balaclavas

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps his Department is taking to control the sale of imitation hand grenades and SAS-style balaclavas. [9844]

Mr. Maclean: None.

Police Scientific Development Branch

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how much has been spent to date on the prior options review of the police scientific development branch; and from which budget these sums were paid; [10058]

(2) what estimate he has made of the future costs of the prior options review of the police scientific development branch; and from which budget these sums will be paid. [10059]

Mr. Maclean: The costs of the prior options review of the police scientific development branch are estimated to be £64,000. This figure represents the costs of the review team and of consultancy advice obtained by PSDB. The sums were paid from the budget of the police policy directorate.

The review was completed in March 1996 and, as such, no future costs are anticipated. The findings of the review remain under consideration.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many (a) United Kingdom, (b) European and (c) international committees include employees of the police scientific development branch as representatives of United Kingdom interests; and how many of these employees are leading the United Kingdom team on their committee; [10060]

(2) how many (a) United Kingdom, (b) European and (c) international committees are chaired by employees of the police scientific development branch. [10061]

Mr. Maclean: Employees of the police scientific development branch sit on 84 United Kingdom committees, five European committees and eight committees with a wider international membership. PSDB staff take the lead for the United Kingdom on three of these European committees and six of the wider international committees.

Nine United Kingdom committees and one European committee are chaired by employees of PSDB.
